Then my good friend I said do not use compulsion, but let early education be a sort of amusement [537] you will then be better able to find out the natural bent.

That is a very rational notion, he said.

Do you remember that the children, too, were to be taken to see the battle on horseback and that if there were no danger they were to be brought close up and, like young hounds, have a taste of blood given them?

Yes, I remember

The same practice may be followed, I said in all these things—labours, lessons, dangers—and he who is most at home in all of them ought to be enrolled in a select number

At what age?

At the age when the necessary gymnastics are over the period whether of two or three years which passes in this sort of training is useless for any other purpose for sleep and exercise are unpropitious to learning and the trial of who is first in gymnastic exercises is one of the most important tests to which our youth are subjected.

Certainly he replied

After that time those who are selected from the class of twenty years old will be promoted to higher honour and the sciences which they learned without any order in their early education will now be brought together and they will be able to see the natural relationship of them to one another and to true being

Yes, he said, that is the only kind of knowledge which takes lasting root.

Yes, I said and the capacity for such knowledge is the great criterion of dialectical talent the comprehensive mind is always the dialectical

I agree with you, he said.

These, I said, are the points which you must consider and those who have most of this comprehension, and who are more steadfast in their learning, and in their military and other appointed duties when they have arrived at the age of thirty will have to be chosen by you out of the select class and elevated to higher honour and you will have to prove them by the help of dialectic in order to learn which of them is able to give up the use of sight and the other senses and in company with truth to attain absolute being And here my friend great caution is required

Why great caution?

Do you not remark I said how great is the evil which dialectic has introduced?

What evil? he said

The students of the art are filled with lawlessness

Quite true he said

Do you think that there is anything so very unnatural or inexcusable in their case? or will you make allowance for them?

In what way make allowance?

I want you I said by way of parallel to imagine a supposititious son who is brought up in great wealth [538] he is one of a great and numerous family and has many flatterers When he grows up to manhood he learns that his alleged are not his real parents but who the real are he is unable to discover Can you guess how he will be likely to behave towards his flatterers and his supposed parents first of all during the period when he is ignorant of the false relation and then again when he knows? Or shall I guess for you?

If you please

Then I should say that while he is ignorant of the truth he will be likely to honour his father and his mother and his supposed relations more than the flatterers he will be less inclined to neglect them when in need or to do or say anything against them and he will be less willing to disobey them in any important matter

He will

But when he has made the discovery I should imagine that he would diminish his honour and regard for them and would become more devoted to the flatterers their influence over him would greatly increase he would now live after their ways, and openly associate with them and unless he were of an unusually good disposition he would trouble himself no more about his supposed parents or other relations

Well all that is very probable But how is the image applicable to the disciples of philosophy?

In this way you know that there are certain principles about justice and honour which were taught us in childhood and under their parental authority we have been brought up, obeying and honouring them

That is true

There are also opposite maxims and habits of pleasure which flatter and attract the soul, but do not influence those of us who have any sense of right and they continue to obey and honour the maxims of their fathers

True

Now when a man is in this state, and the questioning spirit asks what is fair or honourable and he answers as the legislator has taught him and then arguments many and diverse refute his words until he is driven into believing that nothing is honourable any more than dishonourable or just and good any more than the reverse, and so of all the notions which he most valued do you think that he will still honour and obey them as before?

Impossible

And when he ceases to think them honourable and natural as heretofore, [539] and he fails to discover the true, can he be expected to pursue any life other than that which flatters his desires?

He cannot

And from being a keeper of the law he is converted into a breaker of it?

Unquestionably

Now all this is very natural in students of philosophy such as I have described and also, as I was just now saying most excusable.

Yes, he said and I may add pitiable

Therefore that your feelings may not be moved to pity about our citizens who are now thirty years of age every care must be taken in introducing them to dialectic

Certainly

There is a danger lest they should taste the dear delight too early for youngsters, as you may have observed when they first get the taste in their mouths argue for amusement, and are always contradicting and refuting others in imitation of those who refute them like puppy dogs they rejoice in pulling and tearing at all who come near them

Yes, he said there is nothing which they like better

And when they have made many conquests and received defeats at the hands of many they violently and speedily get into a way of not believing anything which they believed before, and hence not only they but philosophy and all that relates to it is apt to have a bad name with the rest of the world

Too true, he said

ut when a man begins to get older he will longer be guilty of such insanity he will tate the dialectician who is seeking for truth, l not the eristic, who is contradicting for the e of amusement and the greater moderation his character will increase instead of dimin in the honour of the pursuit.

Very true, he said.

And d d we not make special provision for is, when we said that the disciples of philosophy were to be orderly and steadfast, not, as ow any chance aspirant or intruder?

Very true.

Suppose, I said, the study of philosophy to ake the place of gymnastics and to be con tinued diligently and earnestly and exclusively for twice the number of years which were passed in bodily exercise—will that be enough?

Would you say six or four years? he asked

Say fi e years, I replied at the end of the time they must be sent down again into the den and compelled to hold any military or other of fice which young men are qualified to hold in this way they will get their experience of life, and there will be an opportunity of trying whether when they are drawn all manner of ways by temptation, they will stand firm or flinch.

[540] And how long is this stage of their lives to last?

Fifteen years, I answered and when they have reached fifty years of age, then let those who still survive and have distinguished themselves in every action of their lives and in every branch of knowledge come at last to their consummat on th time has now arrived at which they must raise the eye of the soul to the universal light which li htens all things, and be hold the absolute good for that is the pattern according to which they are to order the State and the lives of indi iduals, and the remainder of their own li es also making philosophy their chief pursuit, but, when their turn comes, toiling also at pol tics and ruling for the public good, not s though they were performing some heroic action, but simply as a matter of duty and when they have brought up in each gener ation oth rs like themsel es and left them in their place to be go ernors of the State, then they will depart to the Islands of the Blest and dwell there and the city will give them public memorials and sacrifices and honour them, if the Pythian oracle consent, as demigods, but if not, a in any case blessed and di ine.

You are a sculptor Socrates, and have made statues of our governors faultless in beauty

Yes, I said, Glaucon, and of our governesses too for you must not suppose that what I have been saying applies to men only and not to women as far as their natures can go.

There you are right he said, since we have made them to share in all things like the men

Well, I said, and you would agree (would you not?) that what has been said about the State and the government is not a mere dream and although difficult not impossible, but only possible in the way which has been supposed that is to say when the true philosopher kings are born in a State, one or more of them despising the honours of this present world which they deem mean and worthless, esteeming above all things right and the honour that springs from right, and regarding justice as the greatest and most necessary of all things, whose ministers they are, and whose principles will be exalted by them when they set in order their own city?

How will they proceed?

They will begin by sending out into the country all the inhab tants of the city who are more than ten years old, and will take possession of their children, who will be unaffected by the habits of their parents these they will train in their own habits and laws, I mean in the laws which we have given them and in this way the State and constitution of which we were speak ing will soonest and most easily attain happi ness, and the nation which has such a constitution will gain most

Yes, that will be the best way And I think, Socrates, that you have very well described how if ever such a constitution might come into being

Enough then of the perfect State and of the man ho bears its image—there is no difficulty in seeing how we shall describe him.

There s no difficulty he replied and I agree with you in thinking that nothing more need be said

BOOK VIII

[543] AND so Glaucon we have arrived at the conclus on that in the perfect State wives and children are to be in common and that all edu cation and the pursuits of war and peace are also to be common, and the best philosophers and the bravest warriors are to be their kings?

That, replied Glaucon, has been acknowledged

Yes, I said and we have further acknowledged that the governors, when appointed themselves will take their soldiers and place them in houses such as we were describing which are common to all and contain nothing private, or individual and about their property you remember what we agreed?

Yes I remember that no one was to have any of the ordinary possessions of mankind they were to be warrior athletes and guardians receiving from the other citizens in lieu of annual payment only their maintenance and they were to take care of themselves and of the whole State

True I said and now that this division of our task is concluded let us find the point at which we digressed, that we may return into the old path

There is no difficulty in returning you implied then as now that you had finished the description of the State you said that such a State was good and that the man was good who answered to it although [544] as now appears you had more excellent things to relate both of State and man And you said further that if this was the true form then the others were false and of the false forms you said as I remember that there were four principal ones and that their defects and the defects of the individuals corresponding to them were worth examining When we had seen all the individuals and finally agreed as to who was the best and who was the worst of them we were to consider whether the best was not also the happiest and the worst the most miserable I asked you what were the four forms of government of which you spoke and then Polemarchus and Adeimantus put in their word and you began again and have found your way to the point at which we have now arrived

Your recollection I said is most exact

Then, like a wrestler he replied you must put yourself again in the same position and let me ask the same questions and do you give me the same answer which you were about to give me then

Yes if I can I will I said

I shall particularly wish to hear what were the four constitutions of which you were speaking

That question I said is easily answered the four governments of which I spoke so far as they have distinct names are first those of Crete and Sparta which are generally applauded what is termed oligarchy comes next this is not equally approved and is a form of government which teems with evils thirdly democracy which naturally follows oligarchy although very different and lastly comes tyranny great and famous which differs from them all and is the fourth and worst disorder of a State I do not know do you? of any other constitution which can be said to have a distinct character There are lordships and principalities which are bought and sold and some other intermediate forms of government But these are nondescripts and may be found equally among Hellenes and among barbarians

Yes he replied we certainly hear of many curious forms of government which exist among them

Do you know I said that governments vary as the dispositions of men vary and that there must be as many of the one as there are of the other? For we cannot suppose that States are made of oak and rock and not out of the human natures which are in them and which in a figure turn the scale and draw other things after them?

Yes he said the States are as the men are they grow out of human characters

Then if the constitutions of States are five, the dispositions of individual minds will also be five?

Certainly

Him who answers to aristocracy and whom we rightly call just and good [545] we have already described

We have

Then let us now proceed to describe the inferior sort of natures being the contentious and ambitious who answer to the Spartan polity also the oligarchical democratical and tyrannical Let us place the most just by the side of the most unjust and when we see them we shall be able to compare the relative happiness or unhappiness of him who leads a life of pure justice or pure injustice The enquiry will then be completed And we shall know whether we ought to pursue injustice, as Thrasymachus advises or in accordance with the conclusions of the argument to prefer justice

Certainly he replied we must do as you say

Shall we follow our old plan which we adopted with a view to clearness of taking the State first and then proceeding to the individual and begin with the government of honour?—I know of no name for such a government other than timocracy, or perhaps timarchy We will compare with this the like character in the individual and after that, consider oligarchical man and then again we will turn our attention to democracy and the democra cal man and lastly we will go and view the city of tyranny and once more take a look into the tyrant's soul, and try to arrive at a satisfactory decision

That way of viewing and judging of the matter will be very suitable.

First, then, I said let us enquire how timocracy (the government of honour) arises out of aristocracy (the government of the best) Clearly all political changes originate in divisions of the actual governing power a government which is united, however small, cannot be moved.

Very true, he said.

In what way then, will our city be moved, and in what manner will the two classes of auxiliaries and rulers disagree among themselves or with one another? Shall we, after the manner of Homer pray the Muses to tell us how discord first arose? Shall we imagine them in solemn mockery to play and jest with us as if we were children, and to address us in a lofty tragic vein, making believe to be in earnest?

How would they address us?

[546] After this manner —A city which is thus constituted can hardly be shaken but, seeing that everything which has a beginning has also an end, even a constitution such as yours will not last for ever but will in time be dissolved And this is the dissolution —In plants that grow in the earth, as well as in animals that move on the earth's surface, fertility and sterility of soul and body occur when the circumferences of the circles of each are completed which in short-lived existences pass over a short space, and in long-lived ones over a long space But to the knowledge of human fecundity and sterility all the wisdom and education of your rulers will not attain the laws which regulate them will not be discovered by an intelligence which is alloyed with sense, but will escape them, and they will bring children into the world when they ought not. Now that which is of divine birth has a period which is contained in a perfect number[1] but the period of human birth is comprehended in a number in which first increments by involution and evolution [or squared and cubed] obtaining three intervals and four terms of like and unlike, waxing and waning numbers, make all the terms commensurable and agreeable to one another The base of these (3) with a third added (4) when combined with five (20) and raised to the third power furnishes two harmonies the first a square which is a hundred times as great (400=4×100) and the other a figure having one side equal to the former but oblong, consisting of a hundred numbers squared upon rational diameters of a square (i.e. omitting fractions) the side of which is five (7×7=49×100=4900) each of them being less by one (than the perfect square which includes the fractions, sc. 50) or less by two perfect squares of irrational diameters (of a square the side of which is five=50+50=100) and a hundred cubes of three (27×100=2700+4900+400=8000) Now this number represents a geometrical figure which has control over the good and evil of births. For when your guardians are ignorant of the law of births, and unite bride and bridegroom out of season, the children will not be goodly or fortunate. And though only the best of them will be appointed by their predecessors, still they will be unworthy to hold their fathers places, and when they come into power as guardians, they will soon be found to fail in taking care of us, the Muses, first by undervaluing music which neglect will soon extend to gymnastic and hence the young men of your State will be less cultivated In the succeeding generation rulers will be appointed who have lost the guardian power of testing the metal of your different races, which, like Hesiod's, are of gold and silver and brass and iron. [547] And so iron will be mingled with silver and brass with gold and hence there will arise dissimilarity and inequality and irregularity which always and in all places are causes of hatred and war This the Muses affirm to be the stock from which discord has sprung wherever arising and this is their answer to us.

Yes, and we may assume that they answer truly

Why yes, I said, of course they answer truly how can the Muses speak falsely?

And what do the Muses say next?

When discord arose then the two races were

[1] A cyclical number such as 6, which is equal to the sum of its divisors 1, 2, 3, so that when the circle or time represented by 6 is completed, the lesser times or rotations represented by 1, 2, 3 are also completed.

Probably the numbers 3, 4, 5, 6 of which the three first=the sides of the Pythagorean triangle. The terms will then be 3^3, 4^3, 5^3 which together $=6^3=216$.

Or the first a square which is 100×100=10,000. The whole number will then be 17,500=a square of 100, and an oblong of 100 by 75.

Or consisting of two numbers squared upon irrational diameters, &c.=100.

drawn different ways the iron and brass fell to acquiring money and land and houses and gold and silver but the gold and silver races not wanting money but having the true riches in their own nature, inclined towards virtue and the ancient order of things There was a battle between them and at last they agreed to distribute their land and houses among individual owners and they enslaved their friends and maintainers whom they had formerly protected in the condition of freemen, and made of them subjects and servants and they themselves were engaged in war and in keeping a watch against them

I believe that you have rightly conceived the origin of the change

And the new government which thus arises will be of a form intermediate between oligarchy and aristocracy?

Very true

Such will be the change and after the change has been made how will they proceed? Clearly the new State being in a mean between oligarchy and the perfect State will partly follow one and partly the other, and will also have some peculiarities

True he said

In the honour given to rulers in the abstinence of the warrior class from agriculture, handicrafts and trade in general in the institution of common meals and in the attention paid to gymnastics and military training—in all these respects this State will resemble the former

True

But in the fear of admitting philosophers to power because they are no longer to be had simple and earnest but are made up of mixed elements and in turning from them to passionate and less complex characters [548] who are by nature fitted for war rather than peace and in the value set by them upon military stratagems and contrivances and in the waging of everlasting wars—this State will be for the most part peculiar

Yes

Yes, I said and men of this stamp will be covetous of money like those who live in oligarchies they will have a fierce secret longing after gold and silver which they will hoard in dark places having magazines and treasuries of their own for the deposit and concealment of them also castles which are just nests for their eggs and in which they will spend large sums on their wives, or on any others whom they please

That is most true he said

And they are miserly because they have no means of openly acquiring the money which they prize they will spend that which is another man s on the gratification of their desires stealing their pleasures and running away like children from the law their father they have been schooled not by gentle influences but by force for they have neglected her who is the true Muse the companion of reason and philosophy and have honoured gymnastic more than music

Undoubtedly he said, the form of government which you describe is a mixture of good and evil

Why there is a mixture, I said but one thing, and one thing only is predominantly seen—the spirit of contention and ambition and these are due to the prevalence of the passionate or spirited element

Assuredly he said

Such is the origin and such the character of this State which has been described in outline only the more perfect execution was not required for a sketch is enough to show the type of the most perfectly just and most perfectly unjust and to go through all the States and all the characters of men omitting none of them would be an interminable labour

Very true he replied

Now what man answers to this form of government—how did he come into being and what is he like?

I think said Adeimantus that in the spirit of contention which characterises him he is not unlike our friend Glaucon

Perhaps I said he may be like him in that one point but there are other respects in which he is very different

In what respects?

He should have more of self assertion and be less cultivated and yet a friend of culture [549] and he should be a good listener but no speaker Such a person is apt to be rough with slaves, unlike the educated man who is too proud for that and he will also be courteous to freemen, and remarkably obedient to authority he is a lover of power and a lover of honour claiming to be a ruler not because he is eloquent or on any ground of that sort, but because he is a soldier and has performed feats of arms he is also a lover of gymnastic exercises and of the chase

Yes that is the type of character which answers to timocracy

Such an one will despise riches only when he is young but as he gets older he will be more and more attracted to them, because he has a piece of the avaricious nature in him, and is not single-minded towards virtue, having lost his best guardian.

Who was that? said Adeimantus.

Philosophy I said, tempered with music, who comes and takes her abode in a man and is the only saviour of his virtue throughout life.

Good, he said.

Such, I said, is the timocratical youth, and he is like the timocratical State.

Exactly

His origin is as follows —He is often the young son of a brave father who dwells in an ill-governed city of which he declines the honours and offices, and will not go to law or exert himself in any way but is ready to waive his rights in order that he may escape trouble.

And how does the son come into being?

The character of the son begins to develop when he hears his mother complaining that her husband has no place in the government, of which the consequence is that she has no precedence among other women. Further when she sees her husband not very eager about money and instead of battling and railing in the law courts or assembly taking whatever happens to him quietly and when she observes that his thoughts always centre in himself while he treats her with very considerable indifference, she is annoyed, and says to her son that his father is only half a man and far too easy going adding all the other complaints about her own ill-treatment which women are so fond of rehearsing.

Yes, said Adeimantus, they give us plenty of them, and their complaints are so like themselves.

And you know I said, that the old servants also, who are supposed to be attached to the family from time to time talk privately in the same strain to the son and if they see any one who owes money to his father or is wronging him in any way and he fails to prosecute them, [550] they tell the youth that when he grows up he must retaliate upon people of this sort, and be more of a man than his father He has only to walk abroad and he hears and sees the same sort of thing those who do their own business in the city are called simpletons, and held in no esteem, while the busy-bodies are honoured and applauded The result is that the young man, hearing and seeing all these things —hearing, too the words of his father and having a nearer view of his way of life, and making comparisons of him and others—is drawn opposite ways while his father is watering and nourishing the rational principle in his soul the others are encouraging the passionate and appetitive and he being not originally of a bad nature but having kept bad company is at last brought by their joint influence to a middle point, and gives up the kingdom which is within him to the middle principle of contentiousness and passion, and becomes arrogant and ambitious.

You seem to me to have described his origin perfectly

Then we have now I said the second form of government and the second type of character?

We have.

Next, let us look at another man who, as Aeschylus says,

Is set over against another State or rather as our plan requires, begin with the State

By all means.

I believe that oligarchy follows next in order

And what manner of government do you term oligarchy?

A government resting on a valuation of property in which the rich have power and the poor man is deprived of it.

I understand, he replied.

Ought I not to begin by describing how the change from timocracy to oligarchy arises?

Yes.

Well I said, no eyes are required in order to see how the one passes into the other

How?

The accumulation of gold in the treasury of private individuals is the ruin of timocracy they invent illegal modes of expenditure for what do they or their wives care about the law?

Yes, indeed.

And then one seeing another grow rich, seeks to rival him, and thus the great mass of the citizens become lovers of money

Likely enough.

And so they grow richer and richer and the more they think of making a fortune the less they think of virtue for when riches and virtue are placed together in the scales of the balance, the one always rises as the other falls.

True.

[551] And in proportion as riches and rich men are honoured in the State, virtue and the virtuous are dishonoured.

Clearly

And what is honoured is cultivated and that which has no honour is neglected

That is obvious

And so at last instead of loving contention and glory men become lovers of trade and money they honour and look up to the rich man and make a ruler of him and dishonour the poor man

They do so

They next proceed to make a law which fixes a sum of money as the qualification of citizenship the sum is higher in one place and lower in another as the oligarchy is more or less exclusive and they allow no one whose property falls below the amount fixed to have any share in the government These changes in the constitution they effect by force of arms if intimidation has not already done their work

Very true

And this speaking generally is the way in which oligarchy is established

Yes he said but what are the characteristics of this form of government and what are the defects of which we were speaking?

First of all I said consider the nature of the qualification Just think what would happen if pilots were to be chosen according to their property and a poor man were refused permission to steer, even though he were a better pilot?

You mean that they would shipwreck?

Yes and is not this true of the government of anything?

I should imagine so

Except a city?—or would you include a city?

Nay he said the case of a city is the strongest of all inasmuch as the rule of a city is the greatest and most difficult of all

This then will be the first great defect of oligarchy?

Clearly

And here is another defect which is quite as bad

What defect?

The inevitable division such a State is not one but two States the one of poor the other of rich men and they are living on the same spot and always conspiring against one another

That surely is at least as bad

Another discreditable feature is that for a like reason they are incapable of carrying on any war Either they arm the multitude and then they are more afraid of them than of the enemy or if they do not call them out in the hour of battle they are oligarchs indeed few to fight as they are few to rule And at the same time their fondness for money makes them unwilling to pay taxes

How discreditable!

And as we said before, under such a constitution the same persons have too many callings —they are husbandmen [552] tradesmen warriors all in one Does that look well?

Anything but well

There is another evil which is perhaps the greatest of all and to which this State first begins to be liable

What evil?

A man may sell all that he has and another may acquire his property yet after the sale he may dwell in the city of which he is no longer a part being neither trader nor artisan, nor horseman nor hoplite but only a poor helpless creature

Yes that is an evil which also first begins in this State

The evil is certainly not prevented there for oligarchies have both the extremes of great wealth and utter poverty

True

But think again In his wealthy days while he was spending his money was a man of this sort a whit more good to the State for the purposes of citizenship? Or did he only seem to be a member of the ruling body although in truth he was neither ruler nor subject but just a spendthrift?

As you say he seemed to be a ruler but was only a spendthrift

May we not say that this is the drone in the house who is like the drone in the honeycomb, and that the one is the plague of the city as the other is of the hive?

Just so Socrates

And God has made the flying drones Adeimantus all without stings whereas of the walking drones he has made some without stings but others have dreadful stings of the stingless class are those who in their old age end as paupers of the stingers come all the criminal class, as they are termed

Most true he said

Clearly then whenever you see paupers in a State somewhere in that neighbourhood there are hidden away thieves and cut purses and robbers of temples and all sorts of malefactors

Clearly

Well I said and in oligarchical States do you not find paupers?

[1] Cf 544

Yes, he said nearly everybody is a pauper who is not a ruler

And may we be so bold as to affirm that there are also many criminals to be found in them rogues who have stings and whom the authorities are careful to restrain by force?

Certainly we may be so bold

The existence of such persons is to be attributed to want of education ill training and an evil constitution of the State?

True.

Such then, is the form and such are the evils of oligarchy and there may be many other evils.

Very likely

[553] Then oligarchy or the form of government in which the rulers are elected for their wealth may now be dismissed Let us next proceed to consider the nature and origin of the individual who answers to this State.

By all means

Does not the timocratical man change into the oligarchical on this wise?

How?

A time arrives when the representative of timocracy has a son at first he begins by emulating his father and walking in his footsteps but presently he sees him of a sudden foundering against the State as upon a sunken reef, and he and all that he has is lost he may have been a general or some other high officer who is brought to trial under a prejudice raised by informers, and either put to death or exiled or deprived of the privileges of a citizen and all his property taken from him.

Nothing more likely

And the son has seen and known all this—he is a ruined man, and his fear has taught him to knock ambition and passion headforemost from his bosom s throne humbled by poverty he takes to money making and by mean and miserly savings and hard work gets a fortune together Is not such an one likely to seat the concupiscent and covetous element on the vacant throne and to suffer it to play the great king within him girt with tiara and chain and scimitar?

Most true, he replied

And when he has made reason and spirit sit down on the ground obediently on either side of their sovereign and taught them to know their place, he compels the one to think only of how lesser sums may be turned into larger ones and will not allow the other to worship and admire anything but riches and rich men, or to be ambitious of anything so much as the acquisition of wealth and the means of acquiring it.

Of all changes he said there is none so speedy or so sure as the conversion of the ambitious youth into the avaricious one.

And the avaricious I said, is the oligarchical youth?

Yes, he said at any rate the individual out of whom he came is like the State out of which oligarchy came.

Let us then consider whether there is any likeness between them.

[554] Very good

First then they resemble one another in the value which they set upon wealth?

Certainly

Also in their penurious laborious character the individual only satisfies his necessary appetites, and confines his expenditure to them his other desires he subdues, under the idea that they are unprofitable

True

He is a shabby fellow who saves something out of everything and makes a purse for himself and this is the sort of man whom the vulgar applaud Is he not a true image of the State which he represents?

He appears to me to be so at any rate money is highly valued by him as well as by the State.

You see that he is not a man of cultivation I said

I imagine not, he said had he been educated he would never have made a blind god director of his chorus, or given him chief honour

Excellent! I said Yet consider Must we not further admit that owing to this want of cultivation there will be found in him drone like desires as of pauper and rogue, which are forcibly kept down by his general habit of life?

True

Do you know where you will have to look if you want to discover his rogueries?

Where must I look?

You should see him where he has some great opportunity of acting dishonestly as in the guardianship of an orphan.

Aye

It will be clear enough then that in his ordinary dealings which give him a reputation for honesty he coerces his bad passions by an enforced virtue not making them see that they are wrong, or taming them by reason but by necessity and fear constraining them, and because he trembles for his possessions.

To be sure

Yes indeed my dear friend but you will find that the natural desires of the drone com monly exist in him all the same whenever he has to spend what is not his own

Yes and they will be strong in him too

The man then will be at war with himself, he will be two men and not one but in general, his better desires will be found to prevail over his inferior ones

True

For these reasons such an one will be more respectable than most people yet the true virtue of a unanimous and harmonious soul will flee far away and never come near him

I should expect so

[555] And surely, the miser individually will be an ignoble competitor in a State for any prize of victory or other object of honourable ambition he will not spend his money in the contest for glory so afraid is he of awakening his expensive appetites and inviting them to help and join in the struggle in true oligarchical fashion he fights with a small part only of his resources and the result commonly is that he loses the prize and saves his money

Very true

Can we any longer doubt then that the miser and money maker answers to the oligarchical State?

There can be no doubt

Next comes democracy of this the origin and nature have still to be considered by us and then we will enquire into the ways of the democratic man and bring him up for judgment

That he said is our method

Well I said and how does the change from oligarchy into democracy arise? Is it not on this wise?—The good at which such a State aims is to become as rich as possible a desire which is insatiable?

What then?

The rulers being aware that their power rests upon their wealth refuse to curtail by law the extravagance of the spendthrift youth because they gain by their ruin they take interest from them and buy up their estates and thus increase their own wealth and importance?

To be sure

There can be no doubt that the love of wealth and the spirit of moderation cannot exist together in citizens of the same State to any considerable extent one or the other will be disregarded

That is tolerably clear

And in oligarchical States from the general spread of carelessness and extravagance men of good family have often been reduced to beggary?

Yes often

And still they remain in the city there they are ready to sting and fully armed and some of them owe money some have forfeited their citizenship a third class are in both predicaments and they hate and conspire against those who have got their property and against everybody else and are eager for revolution

That is true

On the other hand the men of business, stooping as they walk and pretending not even to see those whom they have already ruined insert their sting—that is their money—into some one else who is not on his guard against them and recover the parent sum many times over multiplied into a family of children and so they make drone and pauper to abound in the State

[556] Yes, he said there are plenty of them —that is certain

The evil blazes up like a fire and they will not extinguish it either by restricting a man's use of his own property or by another remedy

What other?

One which is the next best and has the advantage of compelling the citizens to look to their characters —Let there be a general rule that every one shall enter into voluntary contracts at his own risk and there will be less of this scandalous money making and the evils of which we were speaking will be greatly lessened in the State

Yes they will be greatly lessened

At present the governors induced by the motives which I have named treat their subjects badly while they and their adherents especially the young men of the governing class are habituated to lead a life of luxury and idleness both of body and mind they do nothing and are incapable of resisting either pleasure or pain

They themselves care only for making money and are as indifferent as the pauper to the cultivation of virtue

Yes quite as indifferent.

Such is the state of affairs which prevails among them And often rulers and their subjects may come in one another's way whether on a pilgrimage or a march as fellow soldiers or fellow sailors aye and they may observe the behaviour of each other in the very moment of danger—for where danger is there is no fear that the poor will be despised by the rich—and very likely the wiry sunburnt poor man may be placed in battle at the side of a wealthy one who has never spoilt his complexion and has plenty of superfluous flesh—when he sees such an one puffing and at his wit's end how can he avoid drawing the conclusion that men like him are only rich because no one has the courage to despoil them? And when they meet in private will not people be saying to one another Our warriors are not good for much ?

Yes he said I am quite aware that this is their way of talking

And as in a body which is diseased the addition of a touch from without may bring on illness, and sometimes even when there is no external provocation a commotion may arise within—in the same way wherever there is weakness in the State there is also likely to be illness of which the occasions may be very slight the one party introducing from without their oligarchical the other their democratical allies, and then the State falls sick, and is at war with herself [557] and may be at times distracted even when there is no external cause

Yes, surely

And then democracy comes into being after the poor have conquered their opponents slaughtering some and banishing some while to the remainder they give an equal share of freedom and power and this is the form of government in which the magistrates are commonly elected by lot.

Yes, he said that is the nature of democracy whether the revolution has been effected by arms or whether fear has caused the opposite party to withdraw

And now what is their manner of life, and what sort of a government have they? for as the government is such will be the man

Clearly he said

In the first place are they not free and is not the city full of freedom and frankness—a man may say and do what he likes?

'Tis said so he replied

And where freedom is, the individual is clearly able to order for himself his own life as he pleases?

Clearly

Then in this kind of State there will be the greatest variety of human natures?

There will

This then, seems likely to be the fairest of States, being like an embroidered robe which is spangled with every sort of flower And just as women and children think a variety of colours to be of all things most charming so there are many men to whom this State, which is spangled with the manners and characters of mankind will appear to be the fairest of States

Yes

Yes my good Sir and there will be no better in which to look for a government

Why?

Because of the liberty which reigns there—they have a complete assortment of constitutions and he who has a mind to establish a State, as we have been doing must go to a democracy as he would to a bazaar at which they sell them and pick out the one that suits him then when he has made his choice he may found his State

He will be sure to have patterns enough

And there being no necessity I said for you to govern in this State even if you have the capacity or to be governed unless you like or go to war when the rest go to war or to be at peace when others are at peace, unless you are so disposed—there being no necessity also because some law forbids you to hold office or be a dicast, [558] that you should not hold office or be a dicast, if you have a fancy—is not this a way of life which for the moment is supremely delightful?

For the moment yes

And is not their humanity to the condemned in some cases quite charming? Have you not observed how in a democracy many persons although they have been sentenced to death or exile, just stay where they are and walk about the world—the gentleman parades like a hero and nobody sees or cares?

Yes, he replied, many and many a one.

See too I said, the forgiving spirit of democracy and the don't care about trifles and the disregard which she shows of all the fine principles which we solemnly laid down at the foundation of the city—as when we said that except in the case of some rarely gifted nature there never will be a good man who has not from his childhood been used to play amid things of beauty and make of them a joy and a study—how grandly does she trample all these fine notions of ours under her feet never giving a thought to the pursuits which make a statesman and promoting to honour any one who professes to be the people's friend

Yes, she is of a noble spirit

These and other kindred characteristics are proper to democracy which is a charming form of government, full of variety and disorder and dispensing a sort of equality to equals and unequals alike

We know her well

Consider now I said what manner of man

the individual is or rather consider as in the case of the state how he comes into being

Very good he said

Is not this the way—he is the son of the miserly and oligarchical father who has trained him in his own habits?

Exactly

And, like his father, he keeps under by force the pleasures which are of the spending and not of the getting sort, being those which are called unnecessary?

Obviously

Would you like for the sake of clearness to distinguish which are the necessary and which are the unnecessary pleasures?

I should

Are not necessary pleasures those of which we cannot get rid and of which the satisfaction is a benefit to us? And they are rightly so because we are framed by nature to desire both what is beneficial and what is necessary and cannot help it

[559] True

We are not wrong therefore in calling them necessary?

We are not

And the desires of which a man may get rid if he takes pains from his youth upwards—of which the presence moreover does no good and in some cases the reverse of good—shall we not be right in saying that all these are unnecessary?

Yes certainly

Suppose we select an example of either kind in order that we may have a general notion of them?

Very good

Will not the desire of eating that is of simple food and condiments in so far as they are required for health and strength be of the necessary class?

That is what I should suppose

The pleasure of eating is necessary in two ways it does us good and it is essential to the continuance of life?

Yes

But the condiments are only necessary in so far as they are good for health?

Certainly

And the desire which goes beyond this of more delicate food or other luxuries which might generally be got rid of if controlled and trained in youth and is hurtful to the body and hurtful to the soul in the pursuit of wisdom and virtue may be rightly called unnecessary?

Very true

May we not say that these desires spend, and that the others make money because they conduce to production?

Certainly

And of the pleasures of love, and all other pleasures, the same holds good?

True

And the drone of whom we spoke was he who has surfeited in pleasures and desires of this sort, and was the slave of the unnecessary desires whereas he who was subject to the necessary only was miserly and oligarchical?

Very true

Again, let us see how the democratical man grows out of the oligarchical the following, as I suspect is commonly the process

What is the process?

When a young man who has been brought up as we were just now describing in a vulgar and miserly way, has tasted drones honey and has come to associate with fierce and crafty natures who are able to provide for him all sorts of refinements and varieties of pleasure—then, as you may imagine the change will begin of the oligarchical principle within him into the democratical?

Inevitably

And as in the city like was helping like and the change was effected by an alliance from without assisting one division of the citizens, so too the young man is changed by a class of desires coming from without to assist the desires within him that which is akin and alike again helping that which is akin and alike?

Certainly

And if there be any ally which aids the oligarchical principle within him whether the influence of a father or of kindred advising or rebuking him [560] then there arises in his soul a faction and an opposite faction and he goes to war with himself

It must be so

And there are times when the democratical principle gives way to the oligarchical and some of his desires die and others are banished a spirit of reverence enters into the young man s soul and order is restored

Yes he said that sometimes happens

And then again after the old desires have been driven out fresh ones spring up which are akin to them and because he their father does not know how to educate them wax fierce and numerous

Yes he said that is apt to be the way

They draw him to his old associates and holding secret intercourse with them breed and multiply in him.

Very true.

At length they seize upon the citadel of the young man's soul, which they perceive to be void of all accomplishments and fair pursuits and true words, which make their abode in the minds of men who are dear to the gods, and are their best guardians and sentinels

None better

False and boastful conceits and phrases mount upwards and take their place.

They are certain to do so.

And so the young man returns into the country of the lotus-eaters, and takes up his dwelling there in the face of all men and if any help be sent by his friends to the oligarchical part of him, the aforesaid vain conceits shut the gate of the king's fastness and they will neither allow the embassy itself to enter nor if private advisers offer the fatherly counsel of the aged will they listen to them or receive them. There is a battle and they gain the day and then modesty which they call silliness, is ignominiously thrust into exile by them, and temperance, which they nickname unmanliness, is trampled in the mire and cast forth they persuade men that moderation and orderly expenditure are vulgarity and meanness, and so, by the help of a rabble of evil appetites, they drive them beyond the border

Yes, with a will.

And when they have emptied and swept clean the soul of him who is now in their power and who is being initiated by them in great mysteries, the next thing is to bring back to their house insolence and anarchy and waste and impudence in bright array having garlands on their heads, and a great company with them, hymning their praises and calling them by sweet names [561] insolence they term breeding and anarchy liberty and waste magnificence, and impudence courage. And so the young man passes out of his original nature, which was trained in the school of necessity into the freedom and libertinism of useless and unnecessary pleasures.

Yes he said, the change in him is visible enough

After this he lives on, spending his money and labour and time on unnecessary pleasures quite as much as on necessary ones but if he be fortunate, and is not too much disordered in his wits, when years have elapsed, and the heyday of passion is over—supposing that he then re admits into the city some part of the exiled virtues, and does not wholly give himself up to their successors—in that case he balances his pleasures and lives in a sort of equilibrium, putting the government of himself into the hands of the one which comes first and wins the turn and when he has had enough of that, then into the hands of another he despises none of them but encourages them all equally

Very true, he said.

Neither does he receive or let pass into the fortress any true word of advice if any one says to him that some pleasures are the satisfactions of good and noble desires, and others of evil desires, and that he ought to use and honour some and chastise and master the others—whenever this is repeated to him he shakes his head and says that they are all alike, and that one is as good as another

Yes, he said that is the way with him.

Yes, I said, he lives from day to day indulging the appetite of the hour and sometimes he is lapped in drink and strains of the flute then he becomes a water-drinker and tries to get thin then he takes a turn at gymnastics sometimes idling and neglecting everything then once more living the life of a philosopher often he is busy with politics, and starts to his feet and says and does whatever comes into his head and, if he is emulous of any one who is a warrior off he is in that direction, or of men of business, once more in that. His life has neither law nor order and this distracted existence he terms joy and bliss and freedom and so he goes on.

Yes, he replied, he is all liberty and equality

Yes, I said his life is motley and manifold and an epitome of the lives of many—he answers to the State which we described as fair and spangled. And many a man and many a woman will take him for their pattern, and many a constitution and many an example of manners is contained in him.

Just so

[562] Let him then be set over against democracy he may truly be called the democratic man.

Let that be his place, he said.

Last of all comes the most beautiful of all man and State alike, tyranny and the tyrant these we have now to consider

Quite true, he said

Say then, my friend, In what manner does tyranny arise?—that it has a democratic origin is evident.

Clearly

And does not tyranny spring from democracy in the same manner as democracy from oligarchy—I mean, after a sort?

How?

The good which oligarchy proposed to itself and the means by which it was maintained was excess of wealth—am I not right?

Yes

And the insatiable desire of wealth and the neglect of all other things for the sake of money getting was also the ruin of oligarchy?

True

And democracy has her own good of which the insatiable desire brings her to dissolution?

What good?

Freedom I replied which as they tell you in a democracy is the glory of the State—and that therefore in a democracy alone will the freeman of nature deign to dwell

Yes the saying is in everybody s mouth

I was going to observe that the insatiable desire of this and the neglect of other things introduces the change in democracy which occasions a demand for tyranny

How so?

When a democracy which is thirsting for freedom has evil cup bearers presiding over the feast and has drunk too deeply of the strong wine of freedom then unless her rulers are very amenable and give a plentiful draught she calls them to account and punishes them and says that they are cursed oligarchs

Yes he replied a very common occurrence

Yes I said and loyal citizens are insultingly termed by her slaves who hug their chains and men of naught she would have subjects who are like rulers and rulers who are like subjects these are men after her own heart, whom she praises and honours both in private and public Now in such a State can liberty have any limit?

Certainly not

By degrees the anarchy finds a way into private houses and ends by getting among the animals and infecting them

How do you mean?

I mean that the father grows accustomed to descend to the level of his sons and to fear them and the son is on a level with his father he having no respect or reverence for either of his parents and this is his freedom and the metic is equal with the citizen and the citizen with the metic [563] and the stranger is quite as good as either

Yes he said that is the way

And these are not the only evils I said—there are several lesser ones In such a state of society the master fears and flatters his scholars and the scholars despise their masters and tutors young and old are all alike and the young man is on a level with the old and is ready to compete with him in word or deed and old men condescend to the young and are full of pleasantry and gaiety they are loth to be thought morose and authoritative and therefore they adopt the manners of the young

Quite true he said

The last extreme of popular liberty is when the slave bought with money whether male or female is just as free as his or her purchaser nor must I forget to tell of the liberty and equality of the two sexes in relation to each other

Why not as Aeschylus says, utter the word which rises to our lips?

That is what I am doing, I replied and I must add that no one who does not know would believe, how much greater is the liberty which the animals who are under the dominion of man have in a democracy than in any other State for truly the she-dogs as the proverb says are as good as their she mistresses, and the horses and asses have a way of marching along with all the rights and dignities of freemen and they will run at any body who comes in their way if he does not leave the road clear for them and all things are just ready to burst with liberty

When I take a country walk he said I often experience what you describe. You and I have dreamed the same thing

And above all I said and as the result of all see how sensitive the citizens become they chafe impatiently at the least touch of authority and at length as you know they cease to care even for the laws written or unwritten they will have no one over them

Yes he said I know it too well

Such my friend I said is the fair and glorious beginning out of which springs tyranny

Glorious indeed he said But what is the next step?

The ruin of oligarchy is the ruin of democracy the same disease magnified and intensified by liberty overmasters democracy—the truth being that the excessive increase of anything often causes a [564] reaction in the opposite direction and this is the case not only in the seasons and in vegetable and animal life but above all in forms of government.

True

The excess of liberty whether in States or individuals seems only to pass into excess of slavery

Yes, the natural order

And so tyranny naturally arises out of democracy and the most aggravated form of tyranny and slavery out of the most extreme form of liberty?

As we might expect.

That, however was not, as I believe, your question—you rather desired to know what is that disorder which is generated alike in oligarchy and democracy and is the ruin of both?

Just so, he replied

Well, I said, I meant to refer to the class of the spendthrifts, of whom the more courageous are the leaders and the more timid the followers, the same whom we were comparing to drones, some stingless, and others having stings.

A very just comparison.

These two classes are the plagues of every city in which they are generated, being what phlegm and bile are to the body And the good physician and lawgiver of the State ought, like the wise bee master to keep them at a distance and prevent, if possible, their ever coming in and if they have anyhow found a way in, then he should have them and their cells cut out as speedily as possible.

Yes, by all means, he said.

Then, in order that we may see clearly what we are doing, let us imagine democracy to be divided, as indeed it is, into three classes for in the first place freedom creates rather more drones in the democratic than there were in the oligarchical State.

That is true.

And in the democracy they are certainly more intensified.

How so?

Because in the oligarchical State they are disqualified and driven from office, and therefore they cannot train or gather strength whereas in a democracy they are almost the entire ruling power and while the keener sort speak and act, the rest keep buzzing about the bema and do not suffer a word to be said on the other side hence in democracies almost everything is managed by the drones.

Very true he said.

Then there is another class which is always being severed from the mass.

What is that?

They are the orderly class, which in a nation of traders is sure to be the richest.

Naturally so.

They are the most squeezable persons and yield the largest amount of money to the drones.

Why he said, there is little to be squeezed out of people who have little.

And this is called the wealthy class, and the drones feed upon them

[565] That is pretty much the case, he said.

The people are a third class, consisting of those who work with their own hands they are not politicians, and have not much to live upon. This, when assembled, is the largest and most powerful class in a democracy

True, he said but then the multitude is seldom willing to congregate unless they get a little honey

And do they not share? I said. Do not their leaders deprive the rich of their estates and distribute them among the people at the same time taking care to reserve the larger part for themselves?

Why yes, he said, to that extent the people do share.

And the persons whose property is taken from them are compelled to defend themselves before the people as they best can?

What else can they do?

And then, although they may have no desire of change, the others charge them with plotting against the people and being friends of oligarchy?

True.

And the end is that when they see the people, not of their own accord, but through ignorance, and because they are deceived by informers, seeking to do them wrong, then at last they are forced to become oligarchs in reality they do not wish to be, but the sting of the drones torments them and breeds revolution in them.

That is exactly the truth.

Then come impeachments and judgments and trials of one another

True.

The people have always some champion whom they set over them and nurse into greatness.

Yes, that is their way

This and no other is the root from which a tyrant springs when he first appears above ground he is a protector

Yes, that is quite clear

How then does a protector begin to change into a tyrant? Clearly when he does what the man is said to do in the tale of the Arcadian temple of Lycaean Zeus.

What tale?

The tale is that he who has tasted the entrails of a single human victim minced up with the entrails of other victims is destined to become a wolf Did you never hear it?

O yes

And the protector of the people is like him having a mob entirely at his disposal he is not restrained from shedding the blood of kinsmen by the favourite method of false accusation he brings them into court and murders them making the life of man to disappear and with unholy tongue and lips tasting the blood of his fellow citizen some he kills and others he banishes at the same time hinting at the abolition of debts and partition of lands and after this [566] what will be his destiny? Must he not either perish at the hands of his enemies or from being a man become a wolf—that is a tyrant?

Inevitably

This I said is he who begins to make a party against the rich?

The same

After a while he is driven out but comes back in spite of his enemies a tyrant full grown

That is clear

And if they are unable to expel him or to get him condemned to death by a public accusation they conspire to assassinate him

Yes, he said, that is their usual way

Then comes the famous request for a body guard which is the device of all those who have got thus far in their tyrannical career— Let not the people s friend as they say be lost to them

Exactly

The people readily assent all their fears are for him—they have none for themselves

Very true

And when a man who is wealthy and is also accused of being an enemy of the people sees this then my friend as the oracle said to Croesus By pebbly Hermus shore he flees and rests not and is not ashamed to be a coward [1]

And quite right too said he for if he were he would never be ashamed again

But if he is caught he dies

Of course

And he the protector of whom we spoke is to be seen not larding the plain with his bulk but himself the overthrower of many standing up in the chariot of State with the reins in his hand no longer protector but tyrant absolute

No doubt he said

And now let us consider the happiness of the man and also of the State in which a creature like him is generated

Yes he said let us consider that

At first in the early days of his power he is full of smiles and he salutes every one whom he meets—he to be called a tyrant who is making promises in public and also in private! liberating debtors and distributing land to the people and his followers and wanting to be so kind and good to every one!

Of course he said

But when he has disposed of foreign enemies by conquest or treaty [567] and there is nothing to fear from them then he is always stirring up some war or other, in order that the people may require a leader

To be sure

Has he not also another object which is that they may be impoverished by payment of taxes, and thus compelled to devote themselves to their daily wants and therefore less likely to conspire against him?

Clearly

And if any of them are suspected by him of having notions of freedom and of resistance to his authority he will have a good pretext for destroying them by placing them at the mercy of the enemy and for all these reasons the tyrant must be always getting up a war

He must

Now he begins to grow unpopular

A necessary result

Then some of those who joined in setting him up and who are in power speak their minds to him and to one another and the more courageous of them cast in his teeth what is being done

Yes that may be expected

And the tyrant if he means to rule, must get rid of them he cannot stop while he has a friend or an enemy who is good for anything

He cannot

And therefore he must look about him and see who is valiant who is high minded who is wise who is wealthy happy man he is the enemy of them all and must seek occasion against them whether he will or no until he has made a purgation of the State.

Yes he said and a rare purgation

Yes I said not the sort of purgation which the physicians make of the body for they take away the worse and leave the better part but he does the reverse

If he is to rule I suppose that he cannot help himself

What a blessed alternative I said —to be compelled to dwell only with the many bad, and to be by them hated or not to live at all!

[1] Herodotus i. 55

Yes, that is the alternative

And the more detestable his actions are to the citizens the more satellites and the greater devotion in them will he require?

Certainly

And who are the devoted band and where will he procure them?

They will flock to him, he said of their own acco d if he pays them

By the dog! I said here are more drones of e ery sort and from every land.

Yes, he said, there are

But will he not desire to get them on the spot?

How do you mean?

He will rob the citizens of their slaves he will then set them free and enrol them in his body guard

To be sure, he said and he will be able to trust them best of all

What a blessed creature I said, must this tyrant be he has put to death the others and has these for his trusted friends. [568]

Yes, he said they are quite of his sort

Yes, I said and these are the new citizens whom he has called into existence, who admire him and are h s compan ons, while the good hate and a oid him.

Of course

Verily then tragedy is a wise thing and Euripides a great tragedian

Why so?

Why because he is the author of the pregnant saying

Ty nts u by l t g with the wise and he learly meant to say that they are the wise whom the tyrant makes his companions

Yes he said and he also praises tyranny as godlike and many other things of the same kind are said by him and by the other poets

And therefore, I said the tragic poets being wise men will forg e us and any others who li e after our manner if e do not recei e them into our State, because they are the eulogists of tyranny

Yes, he said those who have the wit will doubtless forgi e us.

But they will continue to go to other c t es and attract mobs, and hire voices fair and loud and persuas ve, and dra v the cities over to tyrannies and democracies

Very true.

Moreover they are paid for this and receive honour—the greatest honour as might be expected from tyrants, and the next greatest from democracies but the higher they ascend our constitution hill the more their reputation fails, and seems unable from shortness of breath to proceed further

True

But we are wandering from the subject Let us therefore return and enquire how the tyrant will maintain that fair and numerous and various and ever-changing army of his

If he said there are sacred treasures in the city he will confiscate and spend them and in so far as the fortunes of attainted persons may suffice, he will be able to diminish the taxes which he would otherwise have to impose upon the people.

And when these fail?

Why clearly he said then he and his boon companions, whether male or female will be maintained out of his father s estate

You mean to say that the people, from whom he has derived his being will maintain him and his companions?

Yes, he said they cannot help themsel es

But what if the people fly into a passion and aver that a grown up son ought not to be supported by his father but that the father should be supported by the son? [569] The father did not brin him into being, or settle him in life, in order that when his son became a man he should himself be the servant of his own servants and should support him and his rabble of sla es and companions but that his son should protect him, and that by his help he might be emancipated from the government of the rich and aristocratic as they are termed And so he bids him and his compan ons depart, just as any other father might drive out of the house a riotous son and his undesirable associates

By heaven he said then the parent will disco er what a monster he has been fostering in his bosom and when he wants to dri e him out, he will find that he is weak and his son strong

Why you do not mean to say that the tyrant will use violence? What! beat his father if he opposes him?

Yes, he will having first disarmed him

Then he is a parricide and a cruel guardian of an ag d parent and this is real tyranny about which there can be no longer a mistake as the saying is, the people who would escape the smoke which is the slavery of freemen, has fallen into the fire which is the tyranny of slaves Thus liberty getting out of all order and reason passes into the harshest and bitterest form of slavery

True he said

Very well and may we not rightly say that we have sufficiently discussed the nature of tyranny, and the manner of the transition from democracy to tyranny?

Yes, quite enough, he said

BOOK IX

[571] LAST of all comes the tyrannical man, about whom we have once more to ask how is he formed out of the democratical? and how does he live in happiness or in misery?

Yes he said he is the only one remaining

There is however I said a previous question which remains unanswered

What question?

I do not think that we have adequately determined the nature and number of the appetites and until this is accomplished the enquiry will always be confused

Well he said it is not too late to supply the omission

Very true I said and observe the point which I want to understand Certain of the unnecessary pleasures and appetites I conceive to be unlawful every one appears to have them but in some persons they are controlled by the laws and by reason and the better desires prevail over them—either they are wholly banished or they become few and weak while in the case of others they are stronger and there are more of them

Which appetites do you mean?

I mean those which are awake when the reasoning and human and ruling power is asleep then the wild beast within us gorged with meat or drink starts up and having shaken off sleep, goes forth to satisfy his desires and there is no conceivable folly or crime—not excepting incest or any other unnatural union or parricide or the eating of forbidden food—which at such a time when he has parted company with all shame and sense a man may not be ready to commit

Most true he said

But when a man s pulse is healthy and temperate and when before going to sleep he has awakened his rational powers and fed them on noble thoughts and enquiries collecting him self in meditation after having first indulged his appetites neither too much nor too little but just enough to lay them to sleep and prevent them and their enjoyments and pains from interfering with the [572] higher principle—which he leaves in the solitude of pure abstraction free to contemplate and aspire to the knowledge of the unknown whether in past, present or future when again he has allayed the passionate element if he has a quarrel against any one—I say when after pacifying the two irrational principles he rouses up the third which is reason before he takes his rest, then, as you know he attains truth most nearly and is least likely to be the sport of fantastic and lawless visions

I quite agree

In saying this I have been running into a digression but the point which I desire to note is that in all of us even in good men there is a lawless wild beast nature which peers out in sleep Pray consider whether I am right, and you agree with me

Yes I agree

And now remember the character which we attributed to the democratic man He was supposed from his youth upwards to have been trained under a miserly parent, who encouraged the saving appetites in him but discountenanced the unnecessary which aim only at amusement and ornament?

True

And then he got into the company of a more refined licentious sort of people and taking to all their wanton ways rushed into the opposite extreme from an abhorrence of his father s meanness At last being a better man than his corruptors he was drawn in both directions until he halted midway and led a life not of vulgar and slavish passion but of what he deemed moderate indulgence in various pleasures After this manner the democrat was generated out of the oligarch?

Yes he said that was our view of him and is so still

And now I said years will have passed away and you must conceive this man such as he is, to have a son who is brought up in his father s principles

I can imagine him

Then you must further imagine the same thing to happen to the son which has already happened to the father —he is drawn into a perfectly lawless life which by his seducers is termed perfect liberty and his father and friends take part with his moderate desires and the opposite party assist the opposite ones As soon as these dire magicians and tyrant makers find that they are losing [573] their hold on him they contrive to implant in him a master passion, to be lord o er his idle and spend thrift lusts—a sort of monstrous winged drone —that is the only image which will adequately describe him

Yes he said, that is the only adequate image of him.

And when his other lusts, amid clouds of incense and perfumes and garlands and wines, and all the pleasures of a dissolute life, now let loose, come buzzing around him, nourishing to the utmost the sting of desire which they implant in his drone-like nature, then at last this lord of the soul ha ing Madness for the captain of his guard, breaks out into a frenzy and if he finds in himself any good opinions or appetites in process of formation, and there is in him any sense of shame remaining, to these better principles he puts an end, and casts them forth until he has purged away temperance and brought in madness to the full.

Yes, he said, that is the way in which the tyrannical man is generated

And is not this the reason why of old love has been called a tyrant?

I should not wonder

Further I said, has not a drunken man also the spirit of a tyrant?

He has.

And you know that a man who is deranged and not right in his mind, will fancy that he is able to rule, not only over men, but also over the gods?

That he will.

And the tyrannical man in the true sense of the word comes into being when, either under the influence of nature, or hab t, or both, he becomes drunken, lustful, passionate? O my friend, is not that so

Assuredly

Such is the man and such is his origin And next, how does he li e?

Suppose, as people facetiously say y u were to tell me

I imagine I said, at the next step in his progress, that there will be feasts and carousals and revellings and courtesans, and all that sort of thing Lo e is the lo d of the house with n h m, and orders all the concerns of his soul.

That is certain.

Yes and every day and every night desires grow up many and formidable, and their demands are many

They are indeed, he said.

His revenues, if he has any are soon spent.

True.

Then comes debt and the cutting down of his property

Of course.

When he has nothing left, must not his desires, cro ding in th nest like young ravens, [574] be crying aloud for food and he, goaded on by them, and especially by Love himself, who is in a manner the captain of them is in a frenzy and would fain discover whom he can defraud or despoil of his property in order that he may gratify them?

Yes, that is sure to be the case

He must have money no matter how if he is to escape horrid pains and pangs.

He must.

And as in himself there was a succession of pleasures, and the new got the better of the old and took away their rights, so he being younger will claim to ha e more than his father and his mother and if he has spent his own share of the property he will take a slice of theirs.

No doubt he will.

And if his parents will not give way then he will try first of all to cheat and deceive them.

Very true.

And if he fails, then he will use force and plunder them.

Yes, probably

And if the old man and woman fight for their own, what then, my friend? Will the creature feel any compunction at tyrannizing over them?

Nay he said, I should not feel at all comfortable about his parents.

But, O heavens! Adeimantus, on account of some new fangled love of a harlot, who is any thing but a necessary connection, can you believe that he would strike the mother who is his ancient friend and necessary to his very existence, and would place her under the authority of the other when she is brought under the same roof with her or that, under like circumstances, he would do the same to his withered old father first and most indispensable of friends, for the sake of some newly found blooming youth who is the reverse of indispensable?

Yes, indeed, he said I believe that he would.

Truly then, I said, a tyrannical son is a blessing to his father and mother

He is indeed, he replied

He first takes their property and when that fails, and pleasures are beginning to swarm in the hive of his soul, then he breaks into a house, or steals the garments of some nightly wayfarer next he proceeds to clear a temple. Meanwhile the old opinions which he had when a child, and which gave judgment about good and evil, are overthrown by those others which have just been emancipated and are now the body guard of love and share his empire These in his democratic days when he was still subject to the laws and to his father were only let loose in the dreams of sleep But now that he is under the dominion of Love he becomes always and in waking reality what he was then very rarely and in a dream only he will commit the foulest murder or eat forbidden food or be guilty of any other horrid act [575] Love is his tyrant and lives lordly in him and lawlessly and being himself a king leads him on as a tyrant leads a State to the performance of any reckless deed by which he can maintain himself and the rabble of his associates whether those whom evil communications have brought in from without or those whom he himself has allowed to break loose within him by reason of a similar evil nature in himself Have we not here a picture of his way of life?

Yes indeed he said

And if there are only a few of them in the State and the rest of the people are well disposed they go away and become the body guard or mercenary soldiers of some other tyrant who may probably want them for a war and if there is no war they stay at home and do many little pieces of mischief in the city

What sort of mischief?

For example they are the thieves burglars cut purses footpads robbers of temples man stealers of the community or if they are able to speak they turn informers and bear false witness and take bribes

A small catalogue of evils even if the perpetrators of them are few in number

Yes I said but small and great are comparative terms and all these things in the misery and evil which they inflict upon a State do not come within a thousand miles of the tyrant when this noxious class and their followers grow numerous and become conscious of their strength assisted by the infatuation of the people they choose from among themselves the one who has most of the tyrant in his own soul and him they create their tyrant

Yes he said and he will be the most fit to be a tyrant

If the people yield well and good but if they resist him as he began by beating his own father and mother so now if he has the power he beats them and will keep his dear old fatherland or motherland as the Cretans say in subjection to his young retainers whom he has introduced to be their rulers and masters This is the end of his passions and desires

When such men are only private individuals and before they get power this is their character they associate entirely with their own flatterers or ready tools or if they want anything from anybody they in their turn are equally ready to bow down before them [5,6] they profess every sort of affection for them but when they have gained their point they know them no more

Yes truly

They are always either the masters or servants and never the friends of anybody the tyrant never tastes of true freedom or friendship.

Certainly not

And may we not rightly call such men treacherous?

No question

Also they are utterly unjust if we were right in our notion of justice?

Yes he said and we were perfectly right.

Let us then sum up in a word I said the character of the worst man he is the waking reality of what we dreamed

Most true

And this is he who being by nature most of a tyrant bears rule and the longer he lives the more of a tyrant he becomes

That is certain said Glaucon taking his turn to answer

And will not he who has been shown to be the wickedest, be also the most miserable? and he who has tyrannized longest and most most continually and truly miserable although this may not be the opinion of men in general?

Yes he said inevitably

And must not the tyrannical man be like the tyrannical State and the democratical man like the democratical State and the same of the others?

Certainly

And as State is to State in virtue and happiness so is man in relation to man?

To be sure

Then comparing our original city which was under a king and the city which is under a tyrant how do they stand as to virtue?

They are the opposite extremes he said for one is the very best the other the very worst.

There can be no mistake, I said as to which is which and therefore I will at once enquire whether you would arrive at a similar decision about their relative happiness and misery And here we must not allow ourselves to be panic stricken at the apparition of the tyrant, who is only a unit and may perhaps have a few retainers about him but let us go as we ought into every corner of the city and look all about, and then we will give our opinion

A fair invitation he replied and I see as every one must, that a tyranny is the wretchedest form of government, and the rule of a king the happiest.

And in estimating the men too may I not fairly make a like request, [577] that I should have a judge whose mind can enter into and see through human nature? he must not be like a child who looks at the outside and is dazzled at the pompous aspect which the tyrannical nature assumes to the beholder but let him be one who has a clear insight. May I suppose that the judgment is given in the hearing of us all by one who is able to judge, and has dwelt in the same place with him, and been present at his daily life and known him in his family relations, where he may be seen stripped of his tragedy attire, and again in the hour of public danger—he shall tell us about the happiness and misery of the tyrant when compared with other men?

That again he said is a very fair proposal

Shall I assume that we ourselves are able and experienced judges and have before now met with such a person? We shall then have some one who will answer our enquiries.

By all means.

Let me ask you not to forget the parallel of the individual and the State bearing this in mind, and glancing in turn from one to the other of them, will you tell me their respective conditions?

What do you mean? he asked

Beginning with the State I replied would you say that a city which is governed by a tyrant is free or enslaved?

No city he said can be more completely enslaved.

And yet, as you see, there are freemen as well as masters in such a State?

Yes, he said I see that there are—a few but the people speaking generally and the best of them are miserably degraded and enslaved

Then if the man is like the State I said must not the same rule prevail? his soul is full of meanness and vulgarity—the best elements in him are enslaved and there is a small ruling part, which is also the worst and maddest.

Inevitably

And would you say that the soul of such an one is the soul of a freeman or of a slave?

He has the soul of a slave in my opinion

And the State which is enslaved under a tyrant is utterly incapable of acting voluntarily?

Utterly incapable

And also the soul which is under a tyrant (I am speaking of the soul taken as a whole) is least capable of doing what she desires there is a gadfly which goads her and she is full of trouble and remorse?

Certainly

And is the city which is under a tyrant rich or poor?

Poor

[578] And the tyrannical soul must be always poor and insatiable?

True

And must not such a State and such a man be always full of fear?

Yes indeed

Is there any State in which you will find more of lamentation and sorrow and groaning and pain?

Certainly not.

And is there any man in whom you will find more of this sort of misery than in the tyrannical man, who is in a fury of passions and desires?

Impossible.

Reflecting upon these and similar evils you held the tyrannical State to be the most miserable of States?

And I was right he said

Certainly I said And when you see the same evils in the tyrannical man what do you say of him?

I say that he is by far the most miserable of all men

There I said, I think that you are beginning to go wrong

What do you mean?

I do not think that he has as yet reached the utmost extreme of misery

Then who is more miserable?

One of whom I am about to speak

Who is that?

He who is of a tyrannical nature and instead of leading a private life has been cursed with the further misfortune of being a public tyrant.

From what has been said I gather that you are right.

Yes I replied but in this high argument you should be a little more certain and should not conjecture only for of all questions this respecting good and evil is the greatest

Very true, he said.

Let me then offer you an illustration which may I think throw a light upon this subject

What is your illustration?

The case of rich individuals in cities who possess many slaves from them you may form an idea of the tyrant s condition for they both have slaves the only difference is that he has more slaves

Yes that is the difference

You know that they live securely and have nothing to apprehend from their servants?

What should they fear?

Nothing But do you observe the reason of this?

Yes the reason is that the whole city is leagued together for the protection of each individual

Very true I said But imagine one of these owners the master say of some fifty slaves together with his family and property and slaves carried off by a god into the wilderness where there are no freemen to help him—will he not be in an agony of fear lest he and his wife and children should be put to death by his slaves?

[579] Yes he said, he will be in the utmost fear

The time has arrived when he will be compelled to flatter divers of his slaves and make many promises to them of freedom and other things much against his will—he will have to cajole his own servants

Yes he said that will be the only way of saving himself

And suppose the same god who carried him away to surround him with neighbours who will not suffer one man to be the master of an other and who if they could catch the offender would take his life?

His case will be still worse if you suppose him to be everywhere surrounded and watched by enemies

And is not this the sort of prison in which the tyrant will be bound—he who being by nature such as we have described is full of all sorts of fears and lusts? His soul is dainty and greedy and yet alone of all men in the city he is never allowed to go on a journey or to see the things which other freemen desire to see but he lives in his hole like a woman hidden in the house and is jealous of any other citizen who goes into foreign parts and sees anything of interest

Very true he said

And amid evils such as these will not he who is ill governed in his own person—the tyrannical man I mean—whom you just now decided to be the most miserable of all—will not he be yet more miserable when instead of leading a private life, he is constrained by fortune to be a public tyrant? He has to be master of others when he is not master of himself he is like a diseased or paralytic man who is compelled to pass his life not in retirement but fighting and combating with other men

Yes he said the similitude is most exact

Is not his case utterly miserable? and does not the actual tyrant lead a worse life than he whose life you determined to be the worst?

Certainly

He who is the real tyrant whatever men may think is the real slave and is obliged to practise the greatest adulation and servility and to be the flatterer of the vilest of mankind He has desires which he is utterly unable to satisfy and has more wants than any one and is truly poor if you know how to inspect the whole soul of him all his life long he is beset with fear and is full of convulsions and distractions, even as the State which he resembles and surely the resemblance holds?

Very true he said

[580] Moreover as we were saying before, he grows worse from having power he becomes and is of necessity more jealous, more faithless more unjust more friendless more impious than he was at first he is the purveyor and cherisher of every sort of vice, and the consequence is that he is supremely miserable and that he makes everybody else as miserable as himself

No man of any sense will dispute your words.

Come then I said and as the general umpire in theatrical contests proclaims the result, do you also decide who in your opinion is first in the scale of happiness and who second and in what order the others follow there are five of them in all—they are the royal timocratical, oligarchical democratical tyrannical

The decision will be easily given he replied they shall be choruses coming on the stage, and I must judge them in the order in which they enter by the criterion of virtue and vice, happiness and misery

Need we hire a herald or shall I announce, that the son of Ariston [the best] has decided that the best and justest is also the happiest, and that this is he who is the most royal man and king over himself and that the worst and most unjust man is also the most miserable and that this is he who being the greatest tyrant of himself is also the greatest tyrant of his State?

Make the proclamation yourself, he said.

And shall I add, 'whether seen or unseen by gods and men'?

Let the words be added.

Then this, I said, will be our first proof; and here is another, which may also have some weight.

What is that?

The second proof is derived from the nature of the soul: seeing that the individual soul, like the State, has been divided by us into three principles, the division may, I think, furnish a new demonstration.

Of what nature?

It seems to me that to these three principles three pleasures correspond; also three desires and governing powers.

How do you mean? he said.

There is one principle with which, as we were saying, a man learns, another with which he is angry; the third, having many forms, has no special name, but is denoted by the general term appetitive, from the extraordinary strength and vehemence of the desires of eating and drinking and the other sensual appetites which are the main elements of it; [581] also money-loving, because such desires are generally satisfied by the help of money.

That is true, he said.

If we were to say that the loves and pleasures of this third part were concerned with gain, we should then be able to fall back on a single notion; and might truly and intelligibly describe this part of the soul as loving gain or money.

I agree with you.

Again, is not the passionate element wholly set on ruling and conquering and getting fame?

True.

Suppose we call it the contentious or ambitious—would the term be suitable?

Extremely suitable.

On the other hand, every one sees that the principle of knowledge is wholly directed to the truth, and cares less than either of the others for gain or fame.

Far less.

'Lover of wisdom,' 'lover of knowledge,' are titles which we may fitly apply to that part of the soul?

Certainly.

One principle prevails in the souls of one class of men, another in others, as may happen?

Yes.

Then we may begin by assuming that there are three classes of men—lovers of wisdom, lovers of honour, lovers of gain?

Exactly.

And there are three kinds of pleasure, which are their several objects?

Very true.

Now, if you examine the three classes of men, and ask of them in turn which of their lives is pleasantest, each will be found praising his own and depreciating that of others: the money-maker will contrast the vanity of honour or of learning if they bring no money with the solid advantages of gold and silver?

True, he said.

And the lover of honour—what will be his opinion? Will he not think that the pleasure of riches is vulgar, while the pleasure of learning, if it brings no distinction, is all smoke and nonsense to him?

Very true.

And are we to suppose, I said, that the philosopher sets any value on other pleasures in comparison with the pleasure of knowing the truth, and in that pursuit abiding, ever learning, not so far indeed from the heaven of pleasure? Does he not call the other pleasures necessary, under the idea that if there were no necessity for them, he would rather not have them?

There can be no doubt of that, he replied.

Since, then, the pleasures of each class and the life of each are in dispute, and the question is not which life is more or less honourable, [582] or better or worse, but which is the more pleasant or painless—how shall we know who speaks truly?

I cannot myself tell, he said.

Well, but what ought to be the criterion? Is any better than experience and wisdom and reason?

There cannot be a better, he said.

Then, I said, reflect. Of the three individuals, which has the greatest experience of all the pleasures which we enumerated? Has the lover of gain, in learning the nature of essential truth, greater experience of the pleasure of knowledge than the philosopher has of the pleasure of gain?

The philosopher, he replied, has greatly the advantage; for he has of necessity always known the taste of the other pleasures from his childhood upwards: but the lover of gain in all his experience has not of necessity tasted—or, I should rather say, even had he desired, could hardly have tasted—the sweetness of learning and knowing truth.

Then the lover of wisdom has a great advantage over the lover of gain, for he has a double experience?

Yes, very great

Again has he greater experience of the pleasures of honour or the lover of honour of the pleasures of wisdom?

Nay he said all three are honoured in proportion as they attain their object for the rich man and the brave man and the wise man alike have their crowd of admirers and as they all receive honour they all have experience of the pleasures of honour, but the delight which is to be found in the knowledge of true being is known to the philosopher only

His experience then will enable him to judge better than any one?

Far better

And he is the only one who has wisdom as well as experience?

Certainly

Further the very faculty which is the instrument of judgment is not possessed by the covetous or ambitious man but only by the philosopher?

What faculty?

Reason with whom as we were saying the decision ought to rest

Yes

And reasoning is peculiarly his instrument?

Certainly

If wealth and gain were the criterion then the praise or blame of the lover of gain would surely be the most trustworthy?

Assuredly

Or if honour or victory or courage in that case the judgment of the ambitious or pugnacious would be the truest?

Clearly

But since experience and wisdom and reason are the judges—

The only inference possible he replied is that pleasures which are approved by the lover of wisdom and reason are the truest

And so we arrive at the result, that the pleasure of the intelligent part of the soul is the pleasantest of the three [583] and that he of us in whom this is the ruling principle has the pleasantest life.

Unquestionably he said the wise man speaks with authority when he approves of his own life

And what does the judge affirm to be the life which is next and the pleasure which is next?

Clearly that of the soldier and lover of honour who is nearer to himself than the money maker

Last comes the lover of gain?

Very true he said

Twice in succession then has the just man overthrown the unjust in this conflict and now comes the third trial which is dedicated to Olympian Zeus the saviour a sage whispers in my ear that no pleasure except that of the wise is quite true and pure—all others are a shadow only and surely this will prove the greatest and most decisive of falls?

Yes the greatest but will you explain yourself?

I will work out the subject and you shall answer my questions

Proceed

Say then is not pleasure opposed to pain?

True

And there is a neutral state which is neither pleasure nor pain?

There is

A state which is intermediate, and a sort of repose of the soul about either—that is what you mean?

Yes

You remember what people say when they are sick?

What do they say?

That after all nothing is pleasanter than health But then they never knew this to be the greatest of pleasures until they were ill

Yes I know he said

And when persons are suffering from acute pain you must have heard them say that there is nothing pleasanter than to get rid of their pain?

I have

And there are many other cases of suffering in which the mere rest and cessation of pain and not any positive enjoyment is extolled by them as the greatest pleasure?

Yes he said at the time they are pleased and well content to be at rest

Again when pleasure ceases that sort of rest or cessation will be painful?

Doubtless he said

Then the intermediate state of rest will be pleasure and will also be pain?

So it would seem

But can that which is neither become both?

I should say not

And both pleasure and pain are motions of the soul are they not?

Yes

[584] But that which is neither was just now shown to be rest and not motion and in a mean between them?

Yes

How then can we be right in supposing that the absence of pain is pleasure, or that the absence of pleasure is pain?

Impossible.

This then is an appearance only and not a reality; that is to say, the rest is pleasure at the moment and in comparison of what is painful, and painful in comparison of what is pleasant; but all these representations, when tried by the test of true pleasure, are not real but a sort of imposition?

That is the inference.

Look at the other class of pleasures which have no antecedent pains and you will no longer suppose, as you perhaps may at present, that pleasure is only the cessation of pain, or pain of pleasure.

What are they, he said, and where shall I find them?

There are many of them: take as an example the pleasures of smell, which are very great and have no antecedent pains; they come in a moment, and when they depart leave no pain behind them.

Most true, he said.

Let us not, then, be induced to believe that pure pleasure is the cessation of pain, or pain of pleasure.

No.

Still, the more numerous and violent pleasures which reach the soul through the body are generally of this sort—they are reliefs of pain.

That is true.

And the anticipations of future pleasures and pains are of a like nature?

Yes.

Shall I give you an illustration of them?

Let me hear.

You would allow, I said, that there is in nature an upper and lower and middle region?

I should.

And if a person were to go from the lower to the middle region, would he not imagine that he is going up; and he who is standing in the middle and sees whence he has come, would imagine that he is already in the upper region, if he has never seen the true upper world?

To be sure, he said; how can he think otherwise?

But if he were taken back again he would imagine, and truly imagine, that he was descending?

No doubt.

All that would arise out of his ignorance of the true upper and middle and lower regions?

Yes.

Then can you wonder that persons who are inexperienced in the truth, as they have wrong ideas about many other things, should also have wrong ideas about pleasure and pain and the intermediate state; so that when they are only being drawn towards the painful they feel pain and think the pain which they experience to be real, [585] and in like manner, when drawn away from pain to the neutral or intermediate state, they firmly believe that they have reached the goal of satiety and pleasure; they, not knowing pleasure, err in contrasting pain with the absence of pain, which is like contrasting black with grey instead of white—can you wonder, I say, at this?

No, indeed; I should be much more disposed to wonder at the opposite.

Look at the matter thus:—Hunger, thirst, and the like, are inanitions of the bodily state?

Yes.

And ignorance and folly are inanitions of the soul?

True.

And food and wisdom are the corresponding satisfactions of either?

Certainly.

And is the satisfaction derived from that which has less or from that which has more existence the truer?

Clearly, from that which has more.

What classes of things have a greater share of pure existence in your judgment—those of which food and drink and condiments and all kinds of sustenance are examples, or the class which contains true opinion and knowledge and mind and all the different kinds of virtue? Put the question in this way:—Which has a more pure being—that which is concerned with the invariable, the immortal, and the true, and is of such a nature, and is found in such natures; or that which is concerned with and found in the variable and mortal, and is itself variable and mortal?

Far purer, he replied, is the being of that which is concerned with the invariable.

And does the essence of the invariable partake of knowledge in the same degree as of essence?

Yes, of knowledge in the same degree.

And of truth in the same degree?

Yes.

And, conversely, that which has less of truth will also have less of essence?

Necessarily.

Then, in general, those kinds of things which are in the service of the body have less of truth and essence than those which are in the service of the soul?

Far less

And has not the body itself less of truth and essence than the soul?

Yes

What is filled with more real existence and actually has a more real existence is more really filled than that which is filled with less real existence and is less real?

Of course

And if there be a pleasure in being filled with that which is according to nature that which is more really filled with more real being will more really and truly enjoy true pleasure whereas that which participates in less real being will be less truly and surely satisfied and will participate in an illusory and less real pleasure?

Unquestionably

[586] Those then who know not wisdom and virtue and are always busy with gluttony and sensuality go down and up again as far as the mean and in this region they move at random throughout life but they never pass into the true upper world thither they neither look nor do they ever find their way neither are they truly filled with true being nor do they taste of pure and abiding pleasure Like cattle with their eyes always looking down and their heads stooping to the earth that is to the dining table they fatten and feed and breed and in their excessive love of these delights they kick and butt at one another with horns and hoofs which are made of iron and they kill one another by reason of their insatiable lust For they fill themselves with that which is not substantial and the part of themselves which they fill is also unsubstantial and incontinent

Verily Socrates said Glaucon you describe the life of the many like an oracle

Their pleasures are mixed with pains—how can they be otherwise? For they are mere shadows and pictures of the true and are coloured by contrast which exaggerates both light and shade and so they implant in the minds of fools insane desires of themselves and they are fought about as Stesichorus says that the Greeks fought about the shadow of Helen at Troy in ignorance of the truth

Something of that sort must inevitably happen

And must not the like happen with the spirited or passionate element of the soul? Will not the passionate man who carries his passion into action be in the like case whether he is envious and ambitious or violent and contentious or angry and discontented if he be seeking to attain honour and victory and the satisfaction of his anger without reason or sense?

Yes he said the same will happen with the spirited element also

Then may we not confidently assert that the lovers of money and honour when they seek their pleasures under the guidance and in the company of reason and knowledge, and pursue after and win the pleasures which wisdom shows them will also have the truest pleasures in the highest degree which is attainable to them inasmuch as they follow truth and they will have the pleasures which are natural to them if that which is best for each one is also most natural to him?

Yes certainly the best is the most natural

And when the whole soul follows the philosophical principle and there is no division the several parts are just and do each of them their own business [587] and enjoy severally the best and truest pleasures of which they are capable?

Exactly

But when either of the two other principles prevails it fails in attaining its own pleasure, and compels the rest to pursue after a pleasure which is a shadow only and which is not their own?

True

And the greater the interval which separates them from philosophy and reason the more strange and illusive will be the pleasure?

Yes

And is not that farthest from reason which is at the greatest distance from law and order?

Clearly

And the lustful and tyrannical desires are, as we saw at the greatest distance?

Yes

And the royal and orderly desires are nearest?

Yes

Then the tyrant will live at the greatest distance from true or natural pleasure and the king at the least?

Certainly

But if so the tyrant will live most unpleasantly and the king most pleasantly?

Inevitably

Would you know the measure of the interval which separates them?

Will you tell me?

There appear to be three pleasures one genuine and two spurious now the transgression of the tyrant reaches a point beyond the spuri our he has run a way from the region of law and reason and taken up his abode with cer tain slave pleasures which are his satellites, and the measure of his inferiority can only be ex pressed in a figure

How do you mean?

I assume, I said, that the tyrant is in the third place from the oligarch the democrat was in the middle?

Yes

And if there is truth in what has preceded he will be wedded to an image of pleasure which is thrice removed as to truth from the pleasure of the oligarch?

He will

And the oligarch is third from the royal since we count as one royal and aristocratical?

Yes, he is third

Then the tyrant is removed from true pleasure by the space of a number which is three times three?

Manifestly

The shadow then of tyrannical pleasure de termined by the number of length will be a plane figure.

Certainly

And if you raise the power and make the plane a sol d there is no difficulty in seeing how vast is the interval by which the tyrant is parted from the king

Yes the arithmetician will easily do the sum.

Or if some person begins at the other end and measures the interval by wh ch the king is parted from the tyrant in truth of pleasure he will find him when the multiplicat on is complete, living 729 times more pleasantly and the tyrant more painfully by this same interval

What a wonderful calculation! And how enormous s the d stance which separates the just from the unjust in regard to pleasure [588] and pain!

Yet a true calculation I said, and a number which nearly concerns human life, if human be gs are concerned with days and nights and m nths and years

Ye he said human life is certainly con cerned with them

Then if the good and just man be thus su perior in pleasure to the evil and unjust, his superiority will be infinitely greater in pro priety of life and in beauty and virtue?

Immeasurably greater

Well I said, and now ha ing arrived at this stage of the argument, we may revert to the words which brought us hither Was not some one saying that injustice was a gain to the per fectly unjust who was reputed to be just?

Yes that was said

Now then, having determined the power and quality of justice and injustice let us have a little conversation with him

What shall we say to him?

Let us make an image of the soul that he may have his own words presented before his eyes.

Of what sort?

An ideal image of the soul like the composite creations of ancient mythology such as the Chimera or Scylla or Cerberus and there are many others in which two or more different na tures are said to grow into one

There are said to have been such unions

Then do you now model the form of a multi tudinous many headed monster having a ring of heads of all manner of beasts, tame and wild, which he is able to generate and metamorphose at will

You suppose marvellous powers in the artist but, as language is more pliable than wax or any similar substance, let there be such a model as you propose.

Suppose now that you make a second form as of a lion, and a third of a man the second smaller than the first, and the third smaller than the second

That, he said, is an easier task and I have made them as you say

And now join them and let the three grow into one

That has been accomplished

Next fashion the outside of them into a sin gle image, as of a man, so that he who is not able to look within, and sees only the outer hull may believe the beast to be a single human creature.

I have done so he said

And now to him who maintains that it is profitable for the human creature to be unjust, and unprofitable to be just, let us reply that, if he be right, it is profitable for this creature to feast the multitudinous monster and strength en the lion and the lion-like qualities [589] but to starve and weaken the man who is con sequently liable to be dragged about at the mercy of either of the other two and he is not to attempt to familiarise or harmonise them with one another—he ought rather to suffer them to fight and bite and devour one another

Certainly he said that is what the approver of injustice says.

The figure 729 nearly equals the number of days and n ghts in the year

To him the supporter of justice makes answer that he should ever so speak and act as to give the man within him in some way or other the most complete mastery over the entire human creature He should watch over the many headed monster like a good husbandman fostering and cultivating the gentle qualities and preventing the wild ones from growing he should be making the lion heart his ally, and in common care of them all should be uniting the several parts with one another and with himself

Yes he said that is quite what the maintainer of justice will say

And so from every point of view, whether of pleasure honour or advantage the approver of justice is right and speaks the truth and the disapprover is wrong and false and ignorant?

Yes from every point of view

Come now and let us gently reason with the unjust who is not intentionally in error Sweet Sir we will say to him what think you of things esteemed noble and ignoble? Is not the noble that which subjects the beast to the man or rather to the god in man and the ignoble that which subjects the man to the beast? He can hardly avoid saying Yes—can he now?

Not if he has any regard for my opinion

But if he agree so far we may ask him to answer another question Then how would a man profit if he received gold and silver on the condition that he was to enslave the noblest part of him to the worst? Who can imagine that a man who sold his son or daughter into slavery for money especially if he sold them into the hands of fierce and evil men would be the gainer however large might be the sum which he received? And will any one say that he is not a miserable caitiff who remorselessly sells his own divine being to [590] that which is most godless and detestable? Eriphyle took the necklace as the price of her husband s life but he is taking a bribe in order to compass a worse ruin

Yes said Glaucon far worse—I will answer for him

Has not the intemperate been censured of old because in him the huge multiform monster is allowed to be too much at large?

Clearly

And men are blamed for pride and bad temper when the lion and serpent element in them disproportionately grows and gains strength?

Yes

And luxury and softness are blamed because they relax and weaken this same creature, and make a coward of him?

Very true

And is not a man reproached for flattery and meanness who subordinates the spirited animal to the unruly monster and for the sake of money of which he can never have enough, habituates him in the days of his youth to be trampled in the mire and from being a lion to become a monkey?

True he said

And why are mean employments and manual arts a reproach? Only because they imply a natural weakness of the higher principle the individual is unable to control the creatures within him but has to court them and his great study is how to flatter them.

Such appears to be the reason

And therefore being desirous of placing him under a rule like that of the best, we say that he ought to be the servant of the best, in whom the Divine rules not as Thrasymachus supposed to the injury of the servant but because every one had better be ruled by divine wisdom dwelling within him or, if this be impossible, then by an external authority in order that we may be all as far as possible under the same government friends and equals

True he said

And this is clearly seen to be the intention of the law which is the ally of the whole city and is seen also in the authority which we exercise over children and the refusal to let them be free until we have established in them a principle analogous to the constitution of a state, [591] and by cultivation of this higher element have set up in their hearts a guardian and ruler like our own and when this is done they may go their ways

Yes he said the purpose of the law is manifest

From what point of view then and on what ground can we say that a man is profited by injustice or intemperance or other baseness which will make him a worse man even though he acquire money or power by his wickedness?

From no point of view at all

What shall he profit if his injustice be undetected and unpunished? He who is undetected only gets worse whereas he who is detected and punished has the brutal part of his nature silenced and humanised the gentler element in him is liberated and his whole soul is perfected and ennobled by the acquirement of justice and temperance and wisdom more than the body ever is by receiving gifts of beauty strength and health, in proportion as the soul is more honourable than the body

Certainly he said.

To this nobler purpose the man of under standing will devote the energies of his life. And in the first place, he will honour studies which impress these qualities on his soul and will disregard others?

Clearly he said.

In the next place, he will regulate his bodily habit and training, and so far will he be from yielding to brutal and irrational pleasures, that he will regard even health as quite a secondary matter· his first object will be not that he may be fair or strong or well, unless he is likely thereby to gain temperance, but he will always desire so to attemper the body as to preserve the harmony of the soul?

Certainly he will, if he has true music in him.

And in the acquis tion of wealth there is a principle of order and harmony which he will also observe· he will not allow himself to be dazzled by the foolish applause of the world and heap up riches to his own infinite harm?

Certainly not, he said.

He will look at the city which is within him, and take heed that no disorder occur in t, such as might arise either from superfluity or from want and upon this principle he will regulate his p operty and gain or pend according to his means.

Very true.

And, for the same reason, he will gladly accept and enjoy such honours as he deems likely to make him a better man [592] but those, whether pri ate or public, which are likely to disorder his life, he will avoid?

Then, if that is his motive, he will not be a statesman

By the dog of Egypt, he will! in the city which is his own he certainly will, though in the land of his birth perhaps not, unless he ha e a di ine call

I understand you mean that he will be a ruler in the city of which we are the founders, and which exists in idea only for I do not be lie e that there is such an one anywhere on earth?

In hea en, I replied there is laid up a pat tern f it, methinks, which he who desires may behold, and beholding, may set his own house in order But whether such an one exists, or ever will exist in fact, is no matter for he will li e after the manner of that city having noth in to do with any other

I think so, he said.

BOOK X

[595] Of the many excellences which I perceive in the order of our State, there is none which upon reflection pleases me better than the rule about poetry

To what do you refer?

To the rejection of imitative poetry which certainly ought not to be received as I see far more clearly now that the parts of the soul have been distinguished.

What do you mean?

Speaking in confidence, for I should not like to have my words repeated to the tragedians and the rest of the imitative tribe—but I do not mind saying to you, that all poetical imitations are ruinous to the understanding of the hearers, and that the knowledge of their true nature is the only antidote to them.

Explain the purport of your remark.

Well I will tell you, although I have always from my earliest youth had an awe and love of Homer which even now makes the words falter on my lips, for he is the great captain and teacher of the whole of that charming tragic company· but a man is not to be reverenced more than the truth, and therefore I will speak out.

Very good, he said.

Listen to me then, or rather answer me.

Put your question.

*Can you tell me what imitation is? for I real*ly do not know

A likely thing then, that I should know

[596] Why not? for the duller eye may often see a thing sooner than the keener

Very true, he said but in your presence, even if I had any faint notion, I could not muster courage to utter it. Will you enquire yourself?

Well then, shall we begin the enquiry in our usual manner Whenever a number of individuals ha e a common name, we assume them to ha e also a corresponding idea or form —do you understand me?

I do

Let us take any common instance there are beds and tables in the world—plenty of them, are there not?

Yes.

But there are only two ideas or forms of them —one the idea of a bed, the other of a table.

True.

And the maker of either of them makes a bed or he makes a table for our use, in accordance th the idea—that is our way of speaking in this and similar instances—but no artificer makes the ideas themselves how could he?

Impossible

And there is another artist—I should like to know what you would say of him

Who is he?

One who is the maker of all the works of all other workmen

What an extraordinary man!

Wait a little and there will be more reason for your saying so For this is he who is able to make not only vessels of every kind but plants and animals himself and all other things—the earth and heaven and the things which are in heaven or under the earth he makes the gods also

He must be a wizard and no mistake

Oh! you are incredulous, are you? Do you mean that there is no such maker or creator or that in one sense there might be a maker of all these things but in another not? Do you see that there is a way in which you could make them all yourself?

What way?

An easy way enough or rather there are many ways in which the feat might be quickly and easily accomplished none quicker than that of turning a mirror round and round—you would soon enough make the sun and the heavens and the earth and yourself and other animals and plants and all the other things of which we were just now speaking in the mirror

Yes he said but they would be appearances only

Very good I said you are coming to the point now And the painter too is as I conceive just such another—a creator of appearances is he not?

Of course

But then I suppose you will say that what he creates is untrue And yet there is a sense in which the painter also creates a bed?

Yes he said but not a real bed

[597] And what of the maker of the bed? were you not saying that he too makes not the idea which according to our view is the essence of the bed but only a particular bed?

Yes I did

Then if he does not make that which exists he cannot make true existence but only some semblance of existence and if any one were to say that the work of the maker of the bed or of any other workman has real existence he could hardly be supposed to be speaking the truth

At any rate he replied philosophers would say that he was not speaking the truth

No wonder then, that his work too is an indistinct expression of truth

No wonder

Suppose now that by the light of the examples just offered we enquire who this imitator is?

If you please

Well then here are three beds one existing in nature which is made by God as I think that we may say—for no one else can be the maker?

No

There is another which is the work of the carpenter?

Yes

And the work of the painter is a third?

Yes

Beds, then are of three kinds, and there are three artists who superintend them God the maker of the bed and the painter?

Yes there are three of them

God whether from choice or from necessity made one bed in nature and one only two or more such ideal beds neither ever have been nor ever will be made by God

Why is that?

Because even if He had made but two a third would still appear behind them which both of them would have for their idea and that would be the ideal bed and not the two others

Very true he said

God knew this and He desired to be the real maker of a real bed not a particular maker of a particular bed and therefore He created a bed which is essentially and by nature one only

So we believe

Shall we, then speak of Him as the natural author or maker of the bed?

Yes he replied inasmuch as by the natural process of creation He is the author of this and of all other things

And what shall we say of the carpenter—is not he also the maker of the bed?

Yes

But would you call the painter a creator and maker?

Certainly not

Yet if he is not the maker what is he in relation to the bed?

I think he said that we may fairly designate him as the imitator of that which the others make

Good I said then you call him who is third in the descent from nature an imitator?

Certainly, he said

And the tragic poet is an imitator and therefore like all other imitators he is thrice re moved from the king and from the truth?

That appears to be so.

Then about the imitator we are agreed. And what about the painter? [598]—I would like to know whether he may be thought to imitate that which originally exists in nature, or only the creations of artists?

The latter.

As they are or as they appear? you have still to determine this.

What do you mean?

I mean, that you may look at a bed from different points of view, obliquely or directly or from any other point of view, and the bed will appear different, but there is no difference in reality. And the same of all things.

Yes, he said, the difference is only apparent.

Now let me ask you another question: Which is the art of painting designed to be—an imitation of things as they are, or as they appear—of appearance or of reality?

Of appearance.

Then the imitator, I said, is a long way off the truth, and can do all things because he lightly touches on a small part of them, and that part an image. For example: A painter will paint a cobbler, carpenter, or any other artist, though he knows nothing of their arts; and, if he is a good artist, he may deceive children or simple persons, when he shows them his picture of a carpenter from a distance, and they will fancy that they are looking at a real carpenter.

Certainly.

And whenever any one informs us that he has found a man who knows all the arts, and all things else that anybody knows, and every single thing with a higher degree of accuracy than any other man—whoever tells us this, I think that we can only imagine him to be a simple creature who is likely to have been deceived by some wizard or actor whom he met, and whom he thought all-knowing, because he himself was unable to analyse the nature of knowledge and ignorance and imitation.

Most true.

And so, when we hear persons saying that the tragedians, and Homer, who is at their head, know all the arts and all things human, virtue as well as vice, and divine things too, for that the good poet cannot compose well unless he knows his subject, and that he who has not this knowledge can never be a poet, we ought to consider whether here also there may not be a similar illusion. Perhaps they may have come across imitators and been deceived by them; they may not have remembered when they saw their works that these were but imitations thrice removed from the truth, [599] and could easily be made without any knowledge of the truth, because they are appearances only and not realities? Or, after all, they may be in the right, and poets do really know the things about which they seem to the many to speak so well?

The question, he said, should by all means be considered.

Now do you suppose that if a person were able to make the original as well as the image, he would seriously devote himself to the image-making branch? Would he allow imitation to be the ruling principle of his life, as if he had nothing higher in him?

I should say not.

The real artist, who knew what he was imitating, would be interested in realities and not in imitations; and would desire to leave as memorials of himself works many and fair; and, instead of being the author of encomiums, he would prefer to be the theme of them.

Yes, he said, that would be to him a source of much greater honour and profit.

Then, I said, we must put a question to Homer; not about medicine, or any of the arts to which his poems only incidentally refer: we are not going to ask him, or any other poet, whether he has cured patients like Asclepius, or left behind him a school of medicine such as the Asclepiads were, or whether he only talks about medicine and other arts at second-hand; but we have a right to know respecting military tactics, politics, education, which are the chiefest and noblest subjects of his poems, and we may fairly ask him about them. "Friend Homer," then we say to him, "if you are only in the second remove from truth in what you say of virtue, and not in the third—not an image maker or imitator—and if you are able to discern what pursuits make men better or worse in private or public life, tell us what State was ever better governed by your help? The good order of Lacedaemon is due to Lycurgus, and many other cities great and small have been similarly benefited by others; but who says that you have been a good legislator to them and have done them any good? Italy and Sicily boast of Charondas, and there is Solon who is renowned among us; but what city has anything to say about you?" Is there any city which he might name?

I think not, said Glaucon; not even the Homerids themselves pretend that he was a legislator.

[600] Well but is there any war on record which was carried on successfully by him, or aided by his counsels when he was alive?

There is not

Or is there any invention of his applicable to the arts or to human life, such as Thales the Milesian or Anacharsis the Scythian and other ingenious men have conceived, which is attributed to him?

There is absolutely nothing of the kind

But if Homer never did any public service was he privately a guide or teacher of any? Had he in his lifetime friends who loved to associate with him and who handed down to posterity an Homeric way of life, such as was established by Pythagoras who was so greatly beloved for his wisdom, and whose followers are to this day quite celebrated for the order which was named after him?

Nothing of the kind is recorded of him For surely, Socrates, Creophylus, the companion of Homer that child of flesh whose name always makes us laugh might be more justly ridiculed for his stupidity if as is said Homer was greatly neglected by him and others in his own day when he was alive?

Yes I replied that is the tradition But can you imagine Glaucon that if Homer had really been able to educate and improve mankind —if he had possessed knowledge and not been a mere imitator—can you imagine I say that he would not have had many followers and been honoured and loved by them? Protagoras of Abdera and Prodicus of Ceos and a host of others have only to whisper to their contemporaries You will never be able to manage either your own house or your own State until you appoint us to be your ministers of education —and this ingenious device of theirs has such an effect in making men love them that their companions all but carry them about on their shoulders And is it conceivable that the contemporaries of Homer or again of Hesiod, would have allowed either of them to go about as rhapsodists if they had really been able to make mankind virtuous? Would they not have been as unwilling to part with them as with gold and have compelled them to stay at home with them? Or if the master would not stay then the disciples would have followed him about everywhere, until they had got education enough?

Yes Socrates that, I think is quite true

Then must we not infer that all these poetical individuals beginning with Homer are only imitators, they copy images of virtue and the like [601] but the truth they never reach? The poet is like a painter who as we have already observed will make a likeness of a cobbler though he understands nothing of cobblin and his picture is good enough for those who know no more than he does and judge only by colours and figures

Quite so

In like manner the poet with his words and phrases may be said to lay on the colours of the several arts, himself understanding their nature only enough to imitate them and other people, who are as ignorant as he is, and judge only from his words imagine that if he speaks of cobbling, or of military tactics or of anything else in metre and harmony and rhythm he speaks very well—such is the sweet influence which melody and rhythm by nature have And I think that you must have observed aga n and again what a poor appearance the tales of poets make when stripped of the colours which music puts upon them and recited in simpl prose

Yes he said

They are like faces which were never really beautiful but only blooming and now the bloom of youth has passed away from them?

Exactly

Here is another point The imitator or maker of the image knows nothing of true existence he knows appearances only Am I not right?

Yes

Then let us have a clear understanding and not be satisfied with half an explanation

Proceed

Of the painter we say that he will paint reins and he will paint a bit?

Yes

And the worker in leather and brass will make them?

Certainly

But does the painter know the right form of the bit and reins? Nay hardly even the workers in brass and leather who make them only the horseman who knows how to use them—he knows their right form

Most true

And may we not say the same of all things?

What?

That there are three arts which are concerned with all things one which uses another which makes a third which imitates them?

Yes

And the excellence or beauty or truth of every structure animate or inanimate and of every action of man is relative to the use for which nature or the artist has intended them

True.

Then the user of them must have the greatest experience of them, and he must indicate to the maker the good or bad qualities which develop themsel es in use for example, the flute player will tell the flute maker which of his flutes is satisfactory to the performer- he will tell him how he ought to make them and the other will attend to his instructions?

Of course.

The one knows and therefore speaks with authority about the goodness and badness of flutes, while the other confiding in him, will do what he is told by him?

True.

The instrument is the same, but about the excellence or badness of it the maker will only attain to a correct belief and this he will gain from him who knows, by talking to him and being compelled to hear what he has to say [602] whereas the user will have knowledge?

True.

But will the imitator have either? Will he know from use whether or no his drawing is correct or beautiful? or will he ha e right opinion from being compelled to associate with another who knows and gives him instructions about what he should draw?

Neither

Then he will no more have true opin on than he will ha e knowledge about the goodness or badness of his imitations?

I suppose not.

The imitati e artist will be in a brilliant state of intelligence about his own creations?

Nay ery much the reverse.

And still he will go on imitating without knowing what makes a thing good or bad, and may be expected therefore to imitate only that which appears to be good to the ignorant multitude?

Just so.

Thus far then we are pretty well agreed that the imitator has no knowledge worth mentioning of what he imitates Imitat on is only a kind of play or port, and th tragic poets, whether they write in Iamb c or in Heroic verse, are imitators in the highest degree?

Very true.

And now tell me, I conjure you, has not imitation been shown by us to be concerned with that which thrice remo ed from the truth?

Certainly

And what is the faculty in man to which imitation is addressed?

What do you mean?

I will explain The body which is large when seen near appears small when seen at a distance?

True.

And the same object appears straight when looked at out of the water and crooked when in the water and the concave becomes convex, owing to the illusion about colours to which the sight is liable. Thus every sort of confusion is revealed within us and this is that weakness of the human mind on which the art of conjuring and of deceiving by light and shadow and other ingenious devices imposes, having an effect upon us like magic.

True.

And the arts of measuring and numbering and weighing come to the rescue of the human understanding—there is the beauty of them—and the apparent greater or less, or more or heavier no longer have the mastery over us, but give way before calculation and measure and weight?

Most true.

And this, surely must be the work of the calculating and rational principle in the soul?

To be sure.

And when this principle measures and certifies that some things are equal, or that some are greater or less than others, there occurs an apparent contradiction?

True.

But were we not saying that such a contradiction is impossible—the same faculty cannot have contrary opinions at the same time [603] about the same thing?

Very true

Then that part of the soul which has an opinion contrary to measure is not the same with that which has an opinion in accordance with measu e?

True.

And the better part of the soul is likely to be that wh ch trusts to measure and calculation?

Certainly

And that which is opposed to them is one of the inferior principles of the soul?

No doubt.

This was the conclus on at which I was seeking to arri e when I said that painting or drawing and imitation in general, when doing their own proper work, are far removed from truth, and the companions and friends and associates of a principle within us which is equally removed from reason, and that they have no true or healthy aim.

Exactly

The imitative art is an inferior who marries an inferior and has inferior offspring

Very true

And is this confined to the sight only or does it extend to the hearing also relating in fact to what we term poetry?

Probably the same would be true of poetry

Do not rely I said on a probability derived from the analogy of painting but let us examine further and see whether the faculty with which poetical imitation is concerned is good or bad

By all means

We may state the question thus —Imitation imitates the actions of men whether voluntary or involuntary, on which, as they imagine a good or bad result has ensued and they rejoice or sorrow accordingly Is there anything more?

No there is nothing else

But in all this variety of circumstances is the man at unity with himself—or rather as in the instance of sight there was confusion and opposition in his opinions about the same things so here also is there not strife and inconsistency in his life? Though I need hardly raise the question again for I remember that all this has been already admitted and the soul has been acknowledged by us to be full of these and ten thousand similar oppositions occurring at the same moment?

And we were right he said

Yes I said thus far we were right but there was an omission which must now be supplied

What was the omission?

Were we not saying that a good man who has the misfortune to lose his son or anything else which is most dear to him will bear the loss with more equanimity than another?

Yes

But will he have no sorrow or shall we say that although he cannot help sorrowing he will moderate his sorrow?

The latter he said is the truer statement

[604] Tell me will he be more likely to struggle and hold out against his sorrow when he is seen by his equals or when he is alone?

It will make a great difference whether he is seen or not

When he is by himself he will not mind saying or doing many things which he would be ashamed of any one hearing or seeing him do?

True

There is a principle of law and reason in him which bids him resist as well as a feeling of his misfortune which is forcing him to indulge his sorrow?

True

But when a man is drawn in two opposite directions, to and from the same object this, as we affirm necessarily implies two distinct principles in him?

Certainly

One of them is ready to follow the guidance of the law?

How do you mean?

The law would say that to be patient under suffering is best and that we should not give way to impatience as there is no known whether such things are good or evil and nothing is gained by impatience also because no human thing is of serious importance and grief stands in the way of that which at the moment is most required

What is most required? he asked

That we should take counsel about what has happened and when the dice have been thrown order our affairs in the way which reason deems best not like children who have had a fall, keeping hold of the part struck and wasting time in setting up a howl, but always accustoming the soul forthwith to apply a remedy raising up that which is sickly and fallen banishing the cry of sorrow by the healing art.

Yes he said that is the true way of meeting the attacks of fortune

Yes I said and the higher principle is ready to follow this suggestion of reason?

Clearly

And the other principle which inclines us to recollection of our troubles and to lamentation and can never have enough of them we may call irrational useless, and cowardly?

Indeed we may

And does not the latter—I mean the rebellious principle—furnish a great variety of materials for imitation? Whereas the wise and calm temperament being always nearly equable, is not easy to imitate or to appreciate when imitated especially at a public festival when a promiscuous crowd is assembled in a theatre For the feeling represented is one to which they are strangers

Certainly

[605] Then the imitative poet who aims at being popular is not by nature made nor is his art intended to please or to affect the rational principle in the soul but he will prefer the passionate and fitful temper which is easily imitated?

Clearly

And now we may fairly take him and place him by the side of the painter for he is like him in two ways first, inasmuch as his creations have an inferior degree of truth—in this, I say he is like him and he is also like him in being concerned with an inferior part of the soul and therefore we shall be right in refusing to admit him into a well-ordered State because he awakens and nourishes and strengthens the feelings and impairs the reason As in a city when the evil are permitted to have authority and the good are put out of the way so in the soul of man, as we maintain the imitative poet implants an evil constitution for he indulges the irrational nature which has no discernment of greater and less, but thinks the same thing at one time great and at another small—he is a manufacturer of images and is very far removed from the truth

But we have not yet brought forward the heaviest count in our accusation —the power which poetry has of harming even the good (and there are very few who are not harmed) is surely an awful thing?

Yes, certainly if the effect is what you say

Hear and judge The best of us, as I conceive when we listen to a passage of Homer or one of the tragedians, in which he represents some pitiful hero who is drawling out his sorrows in a long oration, or weeping and smiting his breast—the best of us, you know delight in giving way to sympathy and are in raptures at the excellence of the poet who stirs our feelings most.

Yes, of course I know

But when any sorrow of our own happens to us, then you may observe that we pride our selves on the opposite quality—we would fain be quiet and patient this is the manly part, and the other which delighted us in the recitation now deemed to be the part of a woman

Very true, he said

Now can we be right in praising and admiring another who is doing that which any one of us would abominate and be ashamed of in his own person?

No he said that is certainly not reasonable.

[606] Nay I said quite reasonable from one point of view

What point of view?

If you consider I said, that when in misfortune we feel a natural hunger and desire to relieve our sorrow by weeping and lamentation and that this feeling which is kept under control in our own calamities is satisfied and delighted by the poets—the better nature in each of us, not having been sufficiently trained by reason or habit allows the sympathetic element to break loose because the sorrow is another's and the spectator fancies that there can be no disgrace to himself in praising and pitying any one who comes telling him what a good man he is and making a fuss about his troubles he thinks that the pleasure is a gain and why should he be supercilious and lose this and the poem too? Few persons ever reflect, as I should imagine, that from the evil of other men something of evil is communicated to themselves. And so the feeling of sorrow which has gathered strength at the sight of the misfortunes of others is with difficulty repressed in our own.

How very true!

And does not the same hold also of the ridiculous? There are jests which you would be ashamed to make yourself and yet on the comic stage, or indeed in private, when you hear them, you are greatly amused by them and are not at all disgusted at their unseemliness—the case of pity is repeated—there is a principle in human nature which is disposed to raise a laugh, and this which you once restrained by reason because you were afraid of being thought a buffoon is now let out again and having stimulated the risible faculty at the theatre you are betrayed unconsciously to yourself into playing the comic poet at home.

Quite true, he said

And the same may be said of lust and anger and all the other affections, of desire and pain and pleasure which are held to be inseparable from every action—in all of them poetry feeds and waters the passions instead of drying them up she lets them rule, although they ought to be controlled if mankind are ever to increase in happiness and virtue

I cannot deny it

Therefore, Glaucon I said whenever you meet with any of the eulogists of Homer declaring that he has been the educator of Hellas, and that he is profitable for education and for the ordering of human things [607] and that you should take him up again and again and get to know him and regulate your whole life according to him we may love and honour those who say these things—they are excellent people, as far as their lights extend and we are ready to acknowledge that Homer is the greatest of poets and first of tragedy writers but we must remain firm in our conviction that hymns to the gods and praises of famous men are the only poetry which ought to be admitted into our State. For if you go beyond this and allow the honeyed muse to enter either in epic or lyric verse not law and the reason of mankind which by common consent have ever been deemed best, but pleasure and pain will be the rulers in our State

And now since we have reverted to the subject of poetry let this our defence serve to show the reasonableness of our former judgment in sending away out of our State an art having the tendencies which we have described for reason constrained us But that she may not impute to us any harshness or want of politeness let us tell her that there is an ancient quarrel between philosophy and poetry of which there are many proofs, such as the saying of the yelping hound howling at her lord or of one mighty in the vain talk of fools and the mob of sages circumventing Zeus and the subtle thinkers who are beggars after all and there are innumerable other signs of ancient enmity between them Notwithstanding this let us assure our sweet friend and the sister arts of imitation that if she will only prove her title to exist in a well-ordered State we shall be delighted to receive her—we are very conscious of her charms but we may not on that account betray the truth I dare say Glaucon that you are as much charmed by her as I am especially when she appears in Homer?

Yes indeed I am greatly charmed

Shall I propose then that she be allowed to return from exile but upon this condition only —that she make a defence of herself in lyrical or some other metre?

Certainly

And we may further grant to those of her defenders who are lovers of poetry and yet not poets the permission to speak in prose on her behalf let them show not only that she is pleasant but also useful to States and to human life, and we will listen in a kindly spirit for if this can be proved we shall surely be the gainers— I mean if there is a use in poetry as well as a delight?

Certainly he said we shall be the gainers

If her defence fails then my dear friend like other persons who are enamoured of some thing but put a restraint upon themselves when they think their desires are opposed to their interests so too must we after the manner of lovers give her up though not without a struggle We too are inspired by that love of poetry which the education of noble States has implanted in us [608] and therefore we would have her appear at her best and truest but so long as she is unable to make good her defence, this argument of ours shall be a charm to us which we will repeat to ourselves while we listen to her strains that we may not fall away into the childish love of her which captivates the many At all events we are well aware that poetry being such as we have described is not to be regarded seriously as attaining to the truth and he who listens to her fearing for the safety of the city which is within him should be on his guard against her seductions and make our words his law

Yes he said I quite agree with you.

Yes I said my dear Glaucon for great is the issue at stake greater than appears whether a man is to be good or bad And what will any one be profited if under the influence of honour or money or power aye or under the excitement of poetry he neglect justice and virtue?

Yes he said I have been convinced by the argument as I believe that any one else would have been

And yet no mention has been made of the greatest prizes and rewards which await virtue.

What are there any greater still? If there are, they must be of an inconceivable greatness

Why I said what was ever great in a short time? The whole period of three score years and ten is surely but a little thing in comparison with eternity?

Say rather nothing he replied

And should an immortal being seriously think of this little space rather than of the whole?

Of the whole certainly But why do you ask?

Are you not aware I said that the soul of man is immortal and imperishable?

He looked at me in astonishment, and said No by heaven And are you really prepared to maintain this?

Yes I said I ought to be and you too—there is no difficulty in proving it

I see a great difficulty but I should like to hear you state this argument of which you make so light

Listen then

I am attending

There is a thing which you call good and another which you call evil?

Yes he replied

Would you agree with me in thinking that the corrupting and destroying element is evil, and the saving and improving element the good?

[609] Yes

And you admit that every thing has a good and also an evil as ophthalmia is the evil of the eyes and disease of the whole body as mildew is of corn, and rot of timber or rust of copper and iron in everything or in almost everything there is an inherent evil and disease?

Yes, he said

And anything which is infected by any of these evils is made evil and at last wholly dissolves and dies?

True.

The vice and evil which is inherent in each is the destruction of each and if this does not destroy them there is nothing else that will for good certainly will not destroy them, nor again, that which is neither good nor evil.

Certainly not.

If then, we find any nature which having this inherent corruption cannot be dissolved or destroyed, we may be certain that of such a nature there is no destruction?

That may be assumed

Well I said, and is there no evil which corrupts the soul?

Yes, he said there are all the evils which we were just now passing in review unrighteousness, intemperance, cowardice, ignorance.

But does any of these dissolve or destroy her?—and here do not let us fall into the error of supposing that the unjust and foolish man, when he is detected, perishes through his own injustice, which is an evil of the soul Take the analogy of the body The evil of the body is a disease which wastes and reduces and annihilates the body and all the things of which we were just now speaking come to annihilation through their own corruption attaching to them and inhering in them and so destroying them Is not this true?

Yes

Consider the soul in like manner Does the injustice or other evil which exists in the soul waste and consume her? do they by attaching to the soul and inhering in her at last bring her to death and so separate her from the body?

Certainly not.

And yet, I said, it is unreasonable to suppose that anything can perish from without through affection of external evil which could not be destroyed from within by a corruption of its own?

It is, he replied

Consider I said, Glaucon that even the badness of food whether staleness, decomposition or any other bad quality when confined to the actual food, is not supposed to destroy the body although if the badness of food communicates corruption to the body then we should say that the body has been destroyed by a corruption of [610] itself, which is disease, brought on by this but that the body being one thing can be destroyed by the badness of food which is another and which does not engender any natural infection—this we shall absolutely deny?

Very true.

And on the same principle, unless some bodily evil can produce an evil of the soul, we must not suppose that the soul which is one thing can be dissolved by any merely external evil which belongs to another?

Yes he said there is reason in that.

Either then let us refute this conclusion or while it remains unrefuted, let us never say that fever or any other disease, or the knife put to the throat, or even the cutting up of the whole body into the minutest pieces, can destroy the soul until she herself is proved to become more unholy or unrighteous in consequence of these things being done to the body but that the soul or anything else if not destroyed by an internal evil, can be destroyed by an external one, is not to be affirmed by any man

And surely he replied, no one will ever prove that the souls of men become more unjust in consequence of death.

But if some one who would rather not admit the immortality of the soul boldly denies this, and says that the dying do really become more evil and unrighteous, then if the speaker is right, I suppose that injustice, like disease, must be assumed to be fatal to the unjust, and that those who take this disorder die by the natural inherent power of destruction which evil has and which kills them sooner or later but in quite another way from that in which, at present, the wicked receive death at the hands of others as the penalty of their deeds?

Nay he said, in that case injustice, if fatal to the unjust, will not be so very terrible to him, for he will be delivered from evil But I rather suspect the opposite to be the truth and that injustice which, if it have the power will murder others, keeps the murderer alive—aye and well awake too so far removed is her dwelling place from being a house of death

True, I said if the inherent natural vice or evil of the soul is unable to kill or destroy her hardly will that which is appointed to be the destruction of some other body destroy a soul or anything else except that of which it was appointed to be the destruction.

Yes, that can hardly be.

Cons der I sa d, Glaucon, that even the badness of food, whether staleness, decompos tion, or any other bad quality when confined to the actual food, is not supposed to destroy the body although, if the badness of food communicates corruption to the body then we should say that the body has been destroyed by a corruption of [610] itself which is disease, brought on by this but that the body being one thing, can be destroyed by the badness of food, which is an other and which does not engender any natural infection—this we shall absolutely deny?

True, I sa d if the inherent natural v ce or evil of the soul is unable to kill or destroy her hardly will that which is appointed to be the destruction of some other body destroy a soul or anything else except that of which it was appointed to be the destruction.

Yes, that can hardly be.

But the soul which cannot be destroyed by an evil whether inherent or external [611] must exist for ever, and if existing for ever, must be immortal?

Certainly

That is the conclusion I said, and, if a true conclusion then the souls must always be the same for if none be destroyed they will not diminish in number Neither will they increase for the increase of the immortal natures must come from something mortal and all things would thus end in immortality

Very true

But this we cannot believe—reason will not allow us—any more than we can believe the soul in her truest nature to be full of variety and difference and dissimilarity

What do you mean? he said

The soul I said being as is now proven immortal must be the fairest of compositions and cannot be compounded of many elements?

Certainly not

Her immortality is demonstrated by the previous argument and there are many other proofs but to see her as she really is not as we now behold her marred by communion with the body and other miseries you must contemplate her with the eye of reason in her original purity and then her beauty will be revealed and justice and injustice and all the things which we have described will be manifested more clearly Thus far we have spoken the truth concerning her as she appears at present but we must remember also that we have seen her only in a condition which may be compared to that of the sea god Glaucus whose original image can hardly be discerned because his natural members are broken off and crushed and damaged by the waves in all sorts of ways and incrustations have grown over them of sea weed and shells and stones so that he is more like some monster than he is to his own natural form And the soul which we behold is in a similar condition disfigured by ten thousand ills But not there Glaucon not there must we look

Where then?

At her love of wisdom Let us see whom she affects and what society and converse she seeks in virtue of her near kindred with the immortal and eternal and divine also how different she would become if wholly following this superior principle and borne by a divine impulse out of the ocean in which she now is and disengaged from the stones and shells and things of earth and rock which in wild variety spring up around her because she feeds upon earth [612] and is overgrown by the good things of this life as they are termed then you would see her as she is and know whether she have one shape only or many or what her nature is Of her affections and of the forms which she takes in this present life I think that we have now said enough

True he replied

And thus I said we have fulfilled the conditions of the argument we have not introduced the rewards and glories of justice which as you were saying are to be found in Homer and Hesiod but justice in her own nature has been shown to be best for the soul in her own nature. Let a man do what is just whether he have the ring of Gyges or not and even if in addition to the ring of Gyges he put on the helmet of Hades

Very true

And now Glaucon there will be no harm in further enumerating how many and how great are the rewards which justice and the other virtues procure to the soul from gods and men, both in life and after death

Certainly not, he said

Will you repay me then what you borrowed in the argument?

What did I borrow?

The assumption that the just man should appear unjust and the unjust just for you were of opinion that even if the true state of the case could not possibly escape the eyes of gods and men still this admission ought to be made for the sake of the argument in order that pure justice might be weighed against pure injustice. Do you remember?

I should be much to blame if I had forgotten

Then as the cause is decided I demand on behalf of justice that the estimation in which she is held by gods and men and which we acknowledge to be her due should now be restored to her by us since she has been shown to confer reality and not to deceive those who truly possess her let what has been taken from her be given back that so she may win that palm of appearance which is hers also and which she gives to her own

The demand he said is just

In the first place, I said—and this is the first thing which you will have to give back—the nature both of the just and unjust is truly known to the gods

Granted

And if they are both known to them one must be the friend and the other the enemy of the gods, as we admitted from the beginning?

True.

[613] And the friend of the gods may be supposed to receive from them all things at their best, excepting only such evil as is the necessary consequence of former sins?

Certainly

Then this must be our notion of the just man, that even when he is in poverty or sickness, or any other seeming misfortune all things will in the end work together for good to him in life and death for the gods have a care of any one whose desire is to become just and to be like God, as far as man can attain the divine likeness, by the pursuit of virtue?

Yes, he said if he is like God he will surely not be neglected by him.

And of the unjust may not the opposite be supposed?

Certainly

Such, then, are the palms of victory which the gods give the just?

That is my conviction

And what do they receive of men? Look at things as they really are, and you will see that the clever unjust are in the case of runners, who run well from the starting place to the goal but not back again from the goal they go off at a great pace, but in the end only look foolish, slinking away with their ears draggling on their shoulders, and without a crown but the true runner comes to the finish and receives the prize and is crowned And this is the way with the just, he who endures to the end of every action and occasion of his entire life has a good report and carries off the prize which men have to bestow

True.

And now you must allow me to repeat of the just the blessings which you were attributing to the fortunate unjust. I shall say of them what you were saying of the others, that as they grow older they become rulers in their own city if they care to be they marry whom they like and give in marriage to whom they will all that you said of the others I now say of these And, on the other hand, of the unjust I say that the greater number even though they escape in their youth, are found out at last and look foolish at the end of their course, and when they come to be old and miserable are flouted alike by stranger and citizen they are beaten and then come those things unfit for ears polite, as you truly term them they will be racked and have their eyes burned out, as you were saying. And you may suppose that I have repeated the remainder of your tale of horrors. But will you let me assume, without reciting them that these things are true?

Certainly he said, what you say is true.

[614] These then, are the prizes and rewards and gifts which are bestowed upon the just by gods and men in this present life in addition to the other good things which justice of herself provides.

Yes, he said and they are fair and lasting

And yet I said all these are as nothing either in number or greatness in comparison with those other recompenses which await both just and unjust after death And you ought to hear them and then both just and unjust will have received from us a full payment of the debt which the argument owes to them.

Speak, he said there are few things which I would more gladly hear

Well I said, I will tell you a tale not one of the tales which Odysseus tells to the hero Alcinous, yet this too is a tale of a hero, Er the son of Armenius, a Pamphylian by birth He was slain in battle, and ten days afterwards when the bodies of the dead were taken up already in a state of corruption his body was found unaffected by decay and carried away home to be buried And on the twelfth day as he was lying on the funeral pile he returned to life and told them what he had seen in the other world. He said that when his soul left the body he went on a journey with a great company and that they came to a mysterious place at which there were two openings in the earth they were near together and over against them were two other openings in the heaven above. In the intermediate space there were judges seated who commanded the just, after they had given judgment on them and had bound their sentences in front of them to ascend by the heavenly way on the right hand and in like manner the unjust were bidden by them to descend the lower way on the left hand these also bore the symbols of their deeds but fastened on their backs. He drew near and they told him that he was to be the messenger who would carry the report of the other world to men and they bade him hear and see all that was to be heard and seen in that place. Then he beheld and saw on one side the souls departing at either opening of heaven and earth when sentence had been given on them and at the two other openings other souls some ascending out of the earth dusty and worn with travel some descending out of heaven clean and bright. And arriving ever and anon they seemed to have come from a long journey and they went forth with gladness into the meadow, where they encamped as at a festival and those who knew one another embraced and conversed the souls which came from earth curiously enquiring about the things above and the souls which came from heaven about the things beneath And they told one another of what had happened by the way those from below weeping and sorrowing at the remembrance of the things which they had endured [615] and seen in their journey beneath the earth (now the journey lasted a thousand years) while those from above were describing heavenly delights and visions of inconceivable beauty The story Glaucon would take too long to tell but the sum was this —He said that for every wrong which they had done to any one they suffered tenfold or once in a hundred years—such being reckoned to be the length of man s life and the penalty being thus paid ten times in a thousand years If for example there were any who had been the cause of many deaths or had betrayed or enslaved cities or armies or been guilty of any other evil behaviour for each and all of their offences they received punishment ten times over and the rewards of beneficence and justice and holiness were in the same proportion I need hardly repeat what he said concerning young children dying almost as soon as they were born Of piety and impiety to gods and parents and of murderers there were retributions other and greater far which he described He mentioned that he was present when one of the spirits asked another Where is Ardiaeus the Great? (Now this Ardiaeus lived a thousand years before the time of Er he had been the tyrant of some city of Pamphylia and had murdered his aged father and his elder brother and was said to have committed many other abominable crimes) The answer of the other spirit was He comes not hither and will never come And this said he was one of the dreadful sights which we ourselves witnessed We were at the mouth of the cavern and having completed all our experiences were about to reascend when of a sudden Ardiaeus appeared and several others most of whom were tyrants and there were also besides the tyrants private individuals who had been great criminals they were just, as they fancied about to return into the upper world but the mouth instead of admitting them gave a roar whenever any of these incurable sinners or some one who had not been sufficiently punished tried to ascend and then wild men of fiery aspect who were standing by and heard the sound [616] seized and carried them off and Ardiaeus and others they bound head and foot and hand and threw them down and flayed them with scourges and dragged them along the road at the side carding them on thorns like wool and declaring to the passers by what were their crimes and that they were being taken away to be cast into hell ' And of all the many terrors which they had endured he said that there was none like the terror which each of them felt at that moment, lest they should hear the voice and when there was silence one by one they ascended with exceeding joy These, said Er were the penalties and retributions, and there were blessings as great

Now when the spirits which were in the meadow had tarried seven days on the eighth they were obliged to proceed on their journey and, on the fourth day after he said that they came to a place where they could see from above a line of light straight as a column extending right through the whole heaven and through the earth in colour resembling the rainbow only brighter and purer another day s journey brought them to the place and there, in the midst of the light, they saw the ends of the chains of heaven let down from above for this light is the belt of heaven and holds together the circle of the universe like the under girders of a trireme From these ends is extended the spindle of Necessity on which all the revolutions turn The shaft and hook of this spindle are made of steel and the whorl is made partly of steel and also partly of other materials Now the whorl is in form like the whorl used on earth and the description of it implied that there is one large hollow whorl which is quite scooped out and into this is fitted another lesser one and another and another and four others making eight in all like vessels which fit into one another the whorls show their edges on the upper side and on their lower side all together form one continuous whorl This is pierced by the spindle which is driven home through the centre of the eighth The first and outermost whorl has the rim broadest and the seven inner whorls are narrower in the following proportions—the sixth is next to the first in size the fourth next to the sixth then comes the eighth the seventh is fifth the fifth is sixth, the third is seventh last and eighth comes the second The largest [or fixed stars] is spangled, and the seventh [or sun] is brightest the eighth [or moon] coloured by the reflected light of the seventh [617] the second and fifth [Saturn and Mercury] are in colour like one another and yellower than the preceding, the third [Venus] has the whitest light the fourth [Mars] is reddish the sixth [Jupiter] is in whiteness second Now the whole spindle has the same motion but, as the whole revolves in one direction the seven inner circles move slowly in the other and of these the swiftest is the eighth next in swiftness are the seventh, sixth, and fifth which move together third in swiftness appeared to move according to the law of this reversed motion the fourth the third appeared fourth and the second fifth The spindle turns on the knees of Necessity and on the upper surface of each circle is a siren, who goes round with them, hymning a single tone or note. The eight together form one harmony and round about, at equal intervals there is another band, three in number each sitting upon her throne. these are the Fates, daughters of Necessity who are clothed in white robes and have chaplets upon their heads Lachesis and Clotho and Atropos who accompany with their voices the harmony of the sirens—Lachesis singing of the past, Clotho of the present, Atropos of the future Clotho from time to time assisting with a touch of her right hand the revolution of the outer circle of the whorl or spindle, and Atropos with her left hand touching and guiding the inner ones and Lachesis laying hold of either in turn first with one hand and then with the other

When Er and the spirits arrived their duty was to go at once to Lachesis but first of all there came a prophet who arranged them in order then he took from the knees of Lachesis lots and samples of lives and having mounted a high pulpit, spoke as follows Hear the word of Lachesis, the daughter of Necessity Mortal souls, behold a new cycle of life and mortality Your genius will not be allotted to you, but you will choose your genius and let him who draws the first lot have the first choice, and the life which he chooses shall be his destiny Virtue is free and as a man honours or dishonours her he will have more or less of her the responsibility is with the chooser—God is justified. When the Interpreter had thus spoken he scattered lots indifferently among them all and each of them took up the lot which fell near him [618] all but Er himself (he was not allowed) and each as he took his lot perceived the number which he had obtained Then the Interpreter placed on the ground before them the samples of lives and there were many more lives than the souls present, and they were of all sorts There were lives of every animal and of man in every condition And there were tyrannies among them some lasting out the tyrant's life, others which broke off in the middle and came to an end in poverty and exile and beggary and there were lives of famous men some who were famous for their form and beauty as well as for their strength and success in games, or again for their birth and the qualities of their ancestors and some who were the reverse of famous for the opposite qualities. And of women likewise there was not however any definite character in them, because the soul when choosing a new life must of necessity become different. But there was every other quality and they all mingled with one another and also with elements of wealth and poverty and disease and health and there were mean states also. And here, my dear Glaucon is the supreme peril of our human state and therefore the utmost care should be taken Let each one of us leave every other kind of knowledge and seek and follow one thing only if peradventure he may be able to learn and may find some one who will make him able to learn and discern between good and evil, and so to choose always and everywhere the better life as he has opportunity He should consider the bearing of all these things which have been mentioned severally and collectively upon virtue he should know what the effect of beauty is when combined with poverty or wealth in a particular soul and what are the good and evil consequences of noble and humble birth, of private and public station of strength and weakness, of cleverness and dullness and of all the natural and acquired gifts of the soul and the operation of them when conjoined he will then look at the nature of the soul and from the consideration of all these qualities he will be able to determine which is the better and which is the worse and so he will choose, giving the name of evil to the life which will make his soul more unjust, and good to the life which will make his soul more just all else he will disregard For we have seen and know that this is the best choice both in life and after death [619] A man must take with him into the world below an adamantine faith in truth and right, that there too he may be undazzled by the desire of wealth or the other allurements of evil lest coming upon tyrannies and similar villainies he do irremediable wrongs to others and suffer yet worse himself but let him know how to choose the mean and avoid the extremes on either side, as far as possible, not only in this life but in all that which is to come. For this is the way of happiness

And according to the report of the messenger from the other world this was what the prophet said at the time Even for the last comer if he chooses wisely and will live diligently, there is appointed a happy and not undesirable existence Let not him who chooses first be careless and let not the last despair And when he had spoken he who had the first choice came forward and in a moment chose the greatest tyranny his mind having been darkened by folly and sensuality he had not thought out the whole matter before he chose, and did not at first sight perceive that he was fated among other evils to devour his own children But when he had time to reflect and saw what was in the lot he began to beat his breast and lament over his choice forgetting the proclamation of the prophet for, instead of throwing the blame of his misfortune on himself he accused chance and the gods and everything rather than himself Now he was one of those who came from heaven and in a former life had dwelt in a well-ordered State but his virtue was a matter of habit only and he had no philosophy And it was true of others who were similarly overtaken that the greater number of them came from heaven and therefore they had never been schooled by trial whereas the pilgrims who came from earth having themselves suffered and seen others suffer were not in a hurry to choose And owing to this inexperience of theirs and also because the lot was a chance many of the souls exchanged a good destiny for an evil or an evil for a good For if a man had always on his arrival in this world dedicated himself from the first to sound philosophy and had been moderately fortunate in the number of the lot he might as the messenger reported be happy here and also his journey to another life and return to this instead of being rough and underground would be smooth and heavenly Most curious he said was the spectacle—sad and laughable and strange for the choice of the souls was in most cases based on their experience [620] of a previous life There he saw the soul which had once been Orpheus choosing the life of a swan out of enmity to the race of women hating to be born of a woman because they had been his murderers he beheld also the soul of Thamyras choosing the life of a nightingale birds on the other hand like the swan and other musicians wanting to be men The soul which obtained the twentieth lot chose the life of a lion and this was the soul of Ajax the son of Telamon who would not be a man remembering the injustice which was done him in the judgment about the arms The next was Agamemnon who took the life of an eagle, because, like Ajax, he hated human nature by reason of his sufferings About the middle came the lot of Atalanta she seeing the great fame of an athlete was unable to resist the temptation and after her there followed the soul of Epeus the son of Panopeus passing into the nature of a woman cunning in the arts and far away among the last who chose the soul of the jester Thersites was putting on the form of a monkey There came also the soul of Odysseus having yet to make a choice and his lot happened to be the last of them all Now the recollection of former toils had disenchanted him of ambition, and he went about for a considerable time in search of the life of a private man who had no cares he had some difficulty in finding this, which was lying about and had been neglected by everybody else and when he saw it, he said that he would have done the same had his lot been first instead of last and that he was delighted to have it And not only did men pass into animals but I must also mention that there were animals tame and wild who changed into one another and into corresponding human natures—the good into the gentle and the evil into the savage in all sorts of combinations

All the souls had now chosen their lives, and they went in the order of their choice to Lachesis who sent with them the genius whom they had severally chosen to be the guardian of their lives and the fulfiller of the choice this genius led the souls first to Clotho and drew them within the revolution of the spindle impelled by her hand thus ratifying the destiny of each and then when they were fastened to this carried them to Atropos who spun the threads and made them irreversible [621] whence without turning round they passed beneath the throne of Necessity and when they had all passed they marched on in a scorching heat to the plain of Forgetfulness which was a barren waste destitute of trees and verdure and then towards evening they encamped by the river of Unmindfulness whose water no vessel can hold of this they were all obliged to drink a certain quantity and those who were not saved by wisdom drank more than was necessary and each one as he drank forgot all things. Now after they had gone to rest about the middle of the night there was a thunderstorm and earthquake and then in an instant they were driven upwards in all manner of ways to their birth like stars shooting He himself was h[illegible]dered from drinking the water But i[illegible]

manner or by what means he returned to the body he could not say; only, in the morning, awakening suddenly, he found himself lying on the pyre.

And thus, Glaucon, the tale has been saved and has not perished, and will save us if we are obedient to the word spoken; and we shall pass safely over the river of Forgetfulness and our soul will not be defiled. Wherefore my counsel is that we hold fast ever to the heavenly way and follow after justice and virtue always, considering that the soul is immortal and able to endure every sort of good and every sort of evil. dren? Or rather was not the proposal too singular to be forgotten? for all wives and children were to be in common, to the intent that no one should ever know his own child, but they were to imagine that they were all one family; those who were within a suitable limit of age were to be brothers and sisters, those who were of an elder generation parents and grandparents, and those of a younger children and grandchildren.

Tim. Yes, and the proposal is easy to remember, as you say.

Soc. And do you also remember how, with a view of securing as far as we could the best breed, we said that the chief magistrates, male and female, should contrive secretly, by the use of certain lots, so to arrange the nuptial meeting, that the bad of either sex and the good of either sex might pair with their like; and there was to be no quarrelling on this account, for they would imagine that the union was a mere accident, and was to be attributed to the lot?

Tim. I remember.

Soc. And you remember how we said that the children of the good parents were to be educated, [19] and the children of the bad secretly dispersed among the inferior citizens; and while they were all growing up the rulers were to be on the look-out, and to bring up from below in their turn those who were worthy, and those among themselves who were unworthy were to take the places of those who came up?

Tim. True.

Soc. Then have I now given you all the heads of our yesterday's discussion? Or is there any thing more, my dear Timaeus, which has been omitted?

Tim. Nothing, Socrates; it was just as you have said.

Soc. I should like, before proceeding further, to tell you how I feel about the State which we have described. I might compare myself to a person who, on beholding beautiful animals either created by the painter's art, or, better still, alive but at rest, is seized with a desire of seeing them in motion or engaged in some struggle or conflict to which their forms appear suited; this is my feeling about the State which we have been describing. There are conflicts which all cities undergo, and I should like to hear some one tell of our own city carrying on a struggle against her neighbours, and how she went out to war in a becoming manner, and when at war showed by the greatness of her actions and the magnanimity of her words in dealing with other cities a result worthy of her training and education. Now I, Critias and Hermocrates, am conscious that I myself should never be able to celebrate the city and her citizens in a befitting manner, and I am not surprised at my own incapacity; to me the wonder is rather that the poets present as well as past are no better—not that I mean to depreciate them; but every one can see that they are a tribe of imitators, and will imitate best and most easily the life in which they have been brought up; while that which is beyond the range of a man's education he finds hard to carry out in action, and still harder adequately to represent in language. I am aware that the Sophists have plenty of brave words and fair conceits, but I am afraid that being only wanderers from one city to another, and having never had habitations of their own, they may fail in their conception of philosophers and statesmen, and may not know what they do and say in time of war, when they are fighting or holding parley with their enemies. And thus people of your class are the only ones remaining who are fitted by nature and education to take part at once both in politics and philosophy. Here is Timaeus, [20] of Locris in Italy, a city which has admirable laws, and who is himself in wealth and rank the equal of any of his fellow-citizens; he has held the most important and honourable offices in his own state, and, as I believe, has scaled the heights of all philosophy; and here is Critias, whom every Athenian knows to be no novice in the matters of which we are speaking; and as to Hermocrates, I am assured by many witnesses that his genius and education qualify him to take part in any speculation of the kind. And therefore yesterday when I saw that you wanted me to describe the formation of the State, I readily assented, being very well aware, that, if you only would, none were better qualified to carry the discussion further, and that when you had engaged our city in a suitable war, you of all men living could best exhibit her playing a fitting part. When I had completed my task, I in return imposed this other task upon you. You conferred together and agreed to entertain me to-day, as I had entertained you, with a feast of discourse. Here am I in festive array, and no man can be more ready for the promised banquet.

Her. And we too, Socrates, as Timaeus says, will not be wanting in enthusiasm; and there is no excuse for not complying with your request. As soon as we arrived yesterday at the guest-chamber of Critias, with whom we are staying, or rather on our way thither, we talked the matter over, and he told us an ancient tra-

TIMAEUS

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE SOCRATES CRITIAS TIMAEUS HERMOCRATES

[17] Socrates ONE two three but where my dear Timaeus is the fourth of those who were yesterday my guests and are to be my entertainers to-day?

Timaeus He has been taken ill Socrates for he would not willingly have been absent from this gathering

Soc Then if he is not coming you and the two others must supply his place

Tim Certainly and we will do all that we can having been handsomely entertained by you yesterday those of us who remain should be only too glad to return your hospitality

Soc Do you remember what were the points of which I required you to speak?

Tim We remember some of them and you will be here to remind us of anything which we have forgotten or rather if we are not troubling you will you briefly recapitulate the whole and then the particulars will be more firmly fixed in our memories?

Soc To be sure I will the chief theme of my yesterday s discourse was the State—how constituted and of what citizens composed it would seem likely to be most perfect

Tim Yes Socrates and what you said of it was very much to our mind

Soc Did we not begin by separating the husbandmen and the artisans from the class of defenders of the State?

Tim Yes

Soc And when we had given to each one that single employment and particular art which was suited to his nature we spoke of those who were intended to be our warriors and said that they were to be guardians of the city against attacks from within as well as from without, [18] and to have no other employment they were to be merciful in judging their subjects of whom they were by nature friends but fierce to their enemies when they came across them in battle

Tim Exactly

Soc We said if I am not mistaken that the guardians should be gifted with a temperament in a high degree both passionate and philosophical and that then they would be as they ought to be gentle to their friends and fierce with their enemies

Tim Certainly

Soc And what did we say of their education? Were they not to be trained in gymnastic and music and all other sorts of knowledge which were proper for them?

Tim Very true

Soc And being thus trained they were not to consider gold or silver or anything else to be their own private property they were to be like hired troops receiving pay for keeping guard from those who were protected by them—the pay was to be no more than would suffice for men of simple life and they were to spend in common and to live together in the continual practice of virtue, which was to be their sole pursuit

Tim That was also said

Soc Neither did we forget the women of whom we declared that their natures should be assimilated and brought into harmony with those of the men and that common pursuits should be assigned to them both in time of war and in their ordinary life

Tim That again was as you say

Soc And what about the procreation of chil dren? Or rather was not the proposal too singular to be forgotten? for all wives and children were to be in common, to the intent that no one should ever know his own child, but they were to imagine that they were all one family; those who were within a suitable limit of age were to be brothers and sisters, those who were of an elder generation parents and grandparents, and those of a younger children and grandchildren.

As soon as we arrived yesterday at the guest-chamber of Critias, with whom we are staying, or rather on our way thither, we talked the matter over, and he told us an ancient tra dition which I wish Critias that you would repeat to Socrates, so that he may help us to judge whether it will satisfy his requirements or not

Crit I will if Timaeus who is our other partner, approves

Tim I quite approve

Crit Then listen Socrates, to a tale which though strange is certainly true, having been attested by Solon who was the wisest of the seven sages He was a relative and a dear friend of my great grandfather, Dropides as he himself says in many passages of his poems and he told the story to Critias my grandfather who remembered and repeated it to us There were of old he said great and marvellous actions of the Athenian city [21] which have passed into oblivion through lapse of time and the destruction of mankind and one in particular greater than all the rest This we will now rehearse It will be a fitting monument of our gratitude to you and a hymn of praise true and worthy of the goddess on this her day of festival

Soc Very good And what is this ancient famous action of the Athenians which Critias declared on the authority of Solon to be not a mere legend but an actual fact?

Crit I will tell an old world story which I heard from an aged man for Critias at the time of telling it was as he said nearly ninety years of age and I was about ten Now the day was that day of the Apaturia which is called the Registration of Youth at which according to custom our parents gave prizes for recitations, and the poems of several poets were recited by us boys and many of us sang the poems of Solon which at that time had not gone out of fashion One of our tribe either because he thought so or to please Critias said that in his judgment Solon was not only the wisest of men but also the noblest of poets The old man as I very well remember brightened up at hearing this and said smiling Yes Amynander, if Solon had only like other poets made poetry the business of his life and had completed the tale which he brought with him from Egypt and had not been compelled by reason of the factions and troubles which he found stirring in his own country when he came home to attend to other matters in my opinion he would have been as famous as Homer or Hesiod or any poet

And what was the tale about, Critias? said Amynander

About the greatest action which the Athenians ever did and which ought to have been the most famous but, through the lapse of time and the destruction of the actors it has not come down to us

Tell us said the other the whole story and how and from whom Solon heard this veritable tradition

He replied —In the Egyptian Delta at the head of which the river Nile divides, there is a certain district which is called the district of Sais and the great city of the district is also called Sais and is the city from which King Amasis came The citizens have a deity for their foundress she is called in the Egyptian tongue Neith and is asserted by them to be the same whom the Hellenes call Athene they are great lovers of the Athenians and say that they are in some way related to them To this city came Solon and was received there with great honour [22] he asked the priests who were most skilful in such matters about antiquity and made the discovery that neither he nor any other Hellene knew anything worth mentioning about the times of old On one occasion wishing to draw them on to speak of antiquity he began to tell about the most ancient things in our part of the world—about Phoroneus, who is called the first man and about Niobe and after the Deluge of the survival of Deucalion and Pyrrha and he traced the genealogy of their descendants and reckoning up the dates, tried to compute how many years ago the events of which he was speaking happened Thereupon one of the priests who was of a very great age said O Solon Solon you Hellenes are never anything but children and there is not an old man among you Solon in return asked him what he meant I mean to say he replied that in mind you are all young there is no old opinion handed down among you by ancient tradition nor any science which is hoary with age. And I will tell you why There have been and will be again many destructions of mankind arising out of many causes the greatest have been brought about by the agencies of fire and water and other lesser ones by innumerable other causes There is a story which even you have preserved that once upon a time Phaethon the son of Helios having yoked the steeds in his father s chariot because he was not able to drive them in the path of his father burnt up all that was upon the earth and was himself destroyed by a thunderbolt Now this has the form of a myth but really signifies a declination of the bodies moving in the heavens around the earth and a great conflagration of things upon the earth which recurs after long intervals; at such times those who live upon the mountains and in dry and lofty places are more liable to destruction than those who dwell by rivers or on the seashore. And from this calamity the Nile, who is our never failing saviour, delivers and preserves us. When, on the other hand, the gods purge the earth with a deluge of water, the survivors in your country are herdsmen and shepherds who dwell on the mountains, but those who, like you, live in cities are carried by the rivers into the sea. Whereas in this land, neither then nor at any other time, does the water come down from above on the fields, having always a tendency to come up from below; for which reason the traditions preserved here are the most ancient.

The fact is, that wherever the extremity of winter frost or of summer sun does not prevent, mankind exist, sometimes in greater [23] sometimes in lesser numbers. And whatever happened either in your country or in ours, or in any other region of which we are informed—if there were any actions noble or great or in any other way remarkable, they have all been written down by us of old, and are preserved in our temples. Whereas just when you and other nations are beginning to be provided with letters and the other requisites of civilized life, after the usual interval, the stream from heaven, like a pestilence, comes pouring down, and leaves only those of you who are destitute of letters and education; and so you have to begin all over again like children, and know nothing of what happened in ancient times, either among us or among yourselves. As for those genealogies of yours which you just now recounted to us, Solon, they are no better than the tales of children. In the first place you remember a single deluge only, but there were many previous ones; in the next place, you do not know that there formerly dwelt in your land the fairest and noblest race of men which ever lived, and that you and your whole city are descended from a small seed or remnant of them which survived. And this was unknown to you, because, for many generations, the survivors of that destruction died, leaving no written word. For there was a time, Solon, before the great deluge of all, when the city which now is Athens was first in war and in every way the best governed of all cities, and is said to have performed the noblest deeds and to have had the fairest constitution of any of which tradition tells, under the face of heaven.

Solon marvelled at his words, and earnestly requested the priests to inform him exactly and in order about these former citizens. You are welcome to hear about them, Solon, said the priest, both for your own sake and for that of your city, and above all, for the sake of the goddess who is the common patron and parent and educator of both our cities. She founded your city a thousand years before ours, receiving from the Earth and Hephaestus the seed of your race, and afterwards she founded ours, of which the constitution is recorded in our sacred registers to be eight thousand years old. As touching your citizens of nine thousand years ago, [24] I will briefly inform you of their laws and of their most famous action; the exact particulars of the whole we will hereafter go through at our leisure in the sacred registers themselves. If you compare these very laws with ours you will find that many of ours are the counterpart of yours as they were in the olden time. In the first place, there is the caste of priests, which is separated from all the others; next, there are the artificers, who ply their several crafts by themselves and do not intermix; and also there is the class of shepherds and of hunters, as well as that of husbandmen; and you will observe, too, that the warriors in Egypt are distinct from all the other classes, and are commanded by the law to devote themselves solely to military pursuits; moreover the weapons which they carry are shields and spears, a style of equipment which the goddess taught of Asiatics first to us, as in your part of the world first to you. Then as to wisdom, do you observe how our law from the very first made a study of the whole order of things, extending even to prophecy and medicine which gives health, out of these divine elements deriving what was needful for human life, and adding every sort of knowledge which was akin to them. All this order and arrangement the goddess first imparted to you when establishing your city, and she chose the spot of earth in which you were born, because she saw that the happy temperament of the seasons in that land would produce the wisest of men. Wherefore the goddess, who was a lover both of war and of wisdom, selected and first of all settled that spot which was the most likely to produce men likest herself. And there you dwelt, having such laws as these and still better ones, and excelled all mankind in all virtue, as became the children and disciples of the gods.

Many great and wonderful deeds are recorded of your state in our histories. But one of them exceeds all the rest in greatness and valour. For these histories tell of a mighty power which un provoked made an expedition against the whole of Europe and Asia and to which your city put an end This power came forth out of the Atlantic Ocean for in those days the Atlantic was navigable and there was an island situated in front of the straits which are by you called the Pillars of Heracles the island was larger than Libya and Asia put together, [25] and was the way to other islands and from these you might pass to the whole of the opposite continent which surrounded the true ocean for this sea which is within the Straits of Heracles is only a harbour having a narrow entrance but that other is a real sea and the surrounding land may be most truly called a boundless continent Now in this island of Atlantis there was a great and wonderful empire which had rule over the whole island and several others and over parts of the continent and furthermore the men of Atlantis had subjected the parts of Libya within the columns of Heracles as far as Egypt, and of Europe as far as Tyrrhenia This vast power gathered into one endeavoured to subdue at a blow our country and yours and the whole of the region within the straits and then Solon your country shone forth in the excellence of her virtue and strength among all mankind She was pre-eminent in courage and military skill and was the leader of the Hellenes And when the rest fell off from her being compelled to stand alone after having undergone the very extremity of danger she defeated and triumphed over the invaders and preserved from slavery those who were not yet subjugated and generously liberated all the rest of us who dwell with in the pillars. But afterwards there occurred violent earthquakes and floods and in a single day and night of misfortune all your warlike men in a body sank into the earth and the island of Atlantis in like manner disappeared in the depths of the sea For which reason the sea in those parts is impassable and impenetrable because there is a shoal of mud in the way and this was caused by the subsidence of the island

I have told you briefly Socrates what the aged Critias heard from Solon and related to us And when you were speaking yesterday about your city and citizens the tale which I have just been repeating to you came into my mind and I remarked with astonishment how, by some mysterious coincidence, you agreed in almost every particular with the narrative of Solon but I did not like to speak at the moment [26] For a long time had elapsed and I had forgotten too much I thought that I must first of all run over the narrative in my own mind and then I would speak And so I readily assented to your request yesterday considering that in all such cases the chief difficulty is to find a tale suitable to our purpose, and that with such a tale we should be fairly well provided

And therefore, as Hermocrates has told you, on my way home yesterday I at once communicated the tale to my companions as I remembered it and after I left them during the night by thinking I recovered nearly the whole of it. Truly, as is often said the lessons of our childhood make a wonderful impression on our memories for I am not sure that I could remember all the discourse of yesterday but I should be much surprised if I forgot any of these things which I have heard very long ago I listened at the time with childlike interest to the old man s narrative he was very ready to teach me, and I asked him again and again to repeat his words, so that like an indelible picture they were branded into my mind As soon as the day broke, I rehearsed them as he spoke them to my companions that they as well as myself might have something to say And now Socrates, to make an end of my preface I am ready to tell you the whole tale I will give you not only the general heads but the particulars as they were told to me The city and citizens which you yesterday described to us in fiction we will now transfer to the world of reality It shall be the ancient city of Athens and we will suppose that the citizens whom you imagined were our veritable ancestors of whom the priest spoke they will perfectly harmonise and there will be no inconsistency in saying that the citizens of your republic are these ancient Athenians Let us divide the subject among us and all endeavour according to our ability gracefully to execute the task which you have imposed upon us Consider then Socrates if this narrative is suited to the purpose or whether we should seek for some other instead

Soc And what other Critias can we find that will be better than this which is natural and suitable to the festival of the goddess, and has the very great advantage of being a fact and not a fiction? How or where shall we find another if we abandon this? We cannot [27] and therefore you must tell the tale and good luck to you and I in return for my yesterday s discourse will now rest and be a listener

Crit Let me proceed to explain to you Socrates the order in which we have arranged our entertainment. Our intention is that Timaeus, who is the most of an astronomer amongst us and has made the nature of the universe his special study should speak first, beginning with the generation of the world and going down to the creation of man next, I am to receive the men whom he has created of whom some will have profited by the excellent education which you have given them and then in accordance with the tale of Solon and equally with his law we will bring them into court and make them citizens, as if they were those very Athenians whom the sacred Egyptian record has recovered from oblivion and thenceforward we will speak of them as Athenians and fellow-citizens.

Soc I see that I shall receive in my turn a perfect and splendid feast of reason And now Timaeus, you, I suppose, should speak next, after duly calling upon the Gods

Tim All men Socrates, who have any degree of right feeling at the beginning of every enterprise, whether small or great, always call upon God And we, too, who are going to discourse of the nature of the universe how created or how existing without creation, if we be not altogether out of our wits must invoke the aid of Gods and Goddesses and pray that our words may be acceptable to them and consistent with themselves Let this then be our invocation of the Gods, to which I add an exhortation of myself to speak in such manner as will be most intelligible to you and will most accord with my own intent.

First then in my judgment, we must make a distinction and ask What is that which always is and has no becoming and what is that which is always becoming and never is? That which is apprehended by intelligence and reason is always in the same state [28] but that which is conceived by opinion with the help of sensation and without reason is always in a process of becoming and perishing, and never really is Now everything that becomes or is created must of necessity be created by some cause, for without a cause nothing can be created The work of the creator whenever he looks to the unchangeable and fashions the form and nature of his work after an unchangeable pattern must necessarily be made fair and perfect but when he looks to the created only and uses a created pattern it is not fair or perfect Was the heaven then or the world whether called by this or by any other more appropriate name—assuming the name I am asking a question which has to be asked at the beginning of an enquiry about anything—was the world I say always in existence and without beginning? or created and had it a beginning? Created I reply being visible and tangible and having a body and therefore sensible and all sensible things are apprehended by opinion and sense and are in a process of creation and created Now that which is created must, as we affirm of necessity be created by a cause But the father and maker of all this universe is past finding out and even if we found him, to tell of him to all men would be impossible. And there is still a question to be asked about him Which of the patterns had the artificer in view when he made the world—the pattern of the unchangeable or of that which is created? [29] If the world be indeed fair and the artificer good it is manifest that he must have looked to that which is eternal but if what cannot be said without blasphemy is true then to the created pattern Every one will see that he must have looked to the eternal for the world is the fairest of creations and he is the best of causes. And having been created in this way the world has been framed in the likeness of that which is apprehended by reason and mind and is unchangeable and must therefore of necessity if this is admitted be a copy of something Now it is all important that the beginning of everything should be according to nature And in speaking of the copy and the original we may assume that words are akin to the matter which they describe when they relate to the lasting and permanent and intelligible they ought to be lasting and unalterable, and as far as their nature allows, irrefutable and immovable—nothing less. But when they express only the copy or likeness and not the eternal things themselves, they need only be likely and analogous to the real words As being is to becoming so is truth to belief If then Socrates, amid the many opinions about the gods and the generation of the universe we are not able to give notions which are altogether and in every respect exact and consistent with one another do not be surprised Enough if we adduce probabilities as likely as any others for we must remember that I who am the speaker and you who are the judges are only mortal men and we ought to accept the tale which is probable and enquire no further

Soc Excellent, Timaeus and we will do precisely as you bid us The prelude is charming, and is already accepted by us—may we beg of you to proceed to the strain?

Tim Let me tell you then why the creator made this world of generation He was good and the good can never have any jealousy of anything And being free from jealousy he desired that all things should be as like himself as they could be This is in the truest sense the origin of creation and of the world [30] as we shall do well in believing on the testimony of wise men God desired that all things should be good and nothing bad so far as this was attainable Wherefore also finding the whole visible sphere not at rest but moving in an irregular and disorderly fashion out of disorder he brought order considering that this was in every way better than the other Now the deeds of the best could never be or have been other than the fairest and the creator reflecting on the things which are by nature visible found that no unintelligent creature taken as a whole was fairer than the intelligent taken as a whole and that intelligence could not be present in any thing which was devoid of soul For which reason when he was framing the universe he put intelligence in soul and soul in body that he might be the creator of a work which was by nature fairest and best Wherefore, using the language of probability we may say that the world became a living creature truly endowed with soul and intelligence by the providence of God

This being supposed let us proceed to the next stage In the likeness of what animal did the Creator make the world? It would be an unworthy thing to liken it to any nature which exists as a part only for nothing can be beautiful which is like any imperfect thing but let us suppose the world to be the very image of that whole of which all other animals both individually and in their tribes are portions For the original of the universe contains in itself all intelligible beings just as this world comprehends us and all other visible creatures For the Deity intending to make this world like the fairest and most perfect of intelligible beings framed one visible animal comprehending within itself all other animals of a kindred nature [31] Are we right in saying that there is one world or that they are many and infinite? There must be one only if the created copy is to accord with the original For that which includes all other intelligible creatures cannot have a second or companion in that case there would be need of another living being which would include both and of which they would be parts and the likeness would be more truly said to resemble not them but that other which included them In order then that the world might be solitary like the perfect animal the creator made not two worlds or an infinite number of them but there is and ever will be one only begotten and created heaven

Now that which is created is of necessity corporeal and also visible and tangible And nothing is visible where there is no fire or tangible which has no solidity and nothing is solid without earth Wherefore also God in the beginning of creation made the body of the universe to consist of fire and earth But two things can not be rightly put together without a third there must be some bond of union between them And the fairest bond is that which makes the most complete fusion of itself and the things which it combines and proportion is best adapted to effect such a union For whenever in any three numbers whether cube or square there is a mean which is to the last term what the first term is to it [32] and again when the mean is to the first term as the last term is to the mean—then the mean becoming first and last and the first and last both becoming means, they will all of them of necessity come to be the same and having become the same with one another will be all one If the universal frame had been created a surface only and having no depth a single mean would have sufficed to bind together itself and the other terms but now as the world must be solid and solid bodies are always compacted not by one mean but by two God placed water and air in the mean between fire and earth and made them to have the same proportion so far as was possible (as fire is to air so is air to water and as air is to water so is water to earth) and thus he bound and put together a visible and tangible heaven And for these reasons and out of such elements which are in number four the body of the world was created and it was harmonised by proportion and therefore has the spirit of friendship and having been reconciled to itself it was indissoluble by the hand of any other than the framer

Now the creation took up the whole of each of the four elements for the Creator compounded the world out of all the fire and all the water and all the air and all the earth leaving no part of any of them nor any power of them outside. His intention was in the first place that the animal should be as far as possible a perfect whole and of perfect parts [33] secondly that it should be one leaving no remnants out of which another such world might be created and also that it should be free from old age and unaffected by disease Considering that if heat and cold and other powerful forces which unite bodies surround and attack them from without when they are unprepared they decompose them and by bringing diseases and old age upon them make them waste away—for this cause and on these grounds he made the world one whole, having every part entire, and being therefore perfect and not liable to old age and disease. And he gave to the world the figure which was suitable and also natural. Now to the animal which was to comprehend all animals, that figure was suitable which comprehends within itself all other figures. Wherefore he made the world in the form of a globe, round as from a lathe, having its extremes in every direction equidistant from the centre, the most perfect and the most like itself of all figures; for he considered that the like is infinitely fairer than the unlike. This he finished off, making the surface smooth all around for many reasons; in the first place, because the living being had no need of eyes when there was nothing remaining outside him to be seen; nor of ears when there was nothing to be heard; and there was no surrounding atmosphere to be breathed; nor would there have been any use of organs by the help of which he might receive his food or get rid of what he had already digested, since there was nothing which went from him or came into him: for there was nothing beside him. Of design he was created thus, his own waste providing his own food, and all that he did or suffered taking place in and by himself. For the Creator conceived that a being which was self-sufficient would be far more excellent than one which lacked anything; and, as he had no need to take anything or defend himself against any one, the Creator did not think it necessary to bestow upon him hands: nor had he any need of feet, [34] nor of the whole apparatus of walking; but the movement suited to his spherical form was assigned to him, being of all the seven that which is most appropriate to mind and intelligence; and he was made to move in the same manner and on the same spot, within his own limits revolving in a circle. All the other six motions were taken away from him, and he was made not to partake of their deviations. And as this circular movement required no feet, the universe was created without legs and without feet.

Such was the whole plan of the eternal God about the god that was to be, to whom for this reason he gave a body, smooth and even, having a surface in every direction equidistant from the centre, a body entire and perfect, and formed out of perfect bodies. And in the centre he put the soul, which he diffused throughout the body, making it also to be the exterior environment of it; and he made the universe a circle moving in a circle, one and solitary, yet by reason of its excellence able to converse with itself, and needing no other friendship or acquaintance. Having these purposes in view he created the world a blessed god.

Now God did not make the soul after the body, although we are speaking of them in this order; for having brought them together he would never have allowed that the elder should be ruled by the younger; but this is a random manner of speaking which we have, because somehow we ourselves too are very much under the dominion of chance. Whereas he made the soul in origin and excellence prior to and older than the body, to be the ruler and mistress, of whom the body was to be the subject. And he made her out of the following elements and on this wise: [35] Out of the indivisible and unchangeable, and also out of that which is divisible and has to do with material bodies, he compounded a third and intermediate kind of essence, partaking of the nature of the same and of the other, and this compound he placed accordingly in a mean between the indivisible, and the divisible and material. He took the three elements of the same, the other, and the essence, and mingled them into one form, compressing by force the reluctant and unsociable nature of the other into the same. When he had mingled them with the essence and out of three made one, he again divided this whole into as many portions as was fitting, each portion being a compound of the same, the other, and the essence. And he proceeded to divide after this manner:—First of all, he took away one part of the whole [1], and then he separated a second part which was double the first [2], and then he took away a third part which was half as much again as the second and three times as much as the first [3], and then he took a fourth part which was twice as much as the second [4], and a fifth part which was three times the third [9], and a sixth part which was eight times the first [8], and a seventh part which was twenty-seven times the first [27]. After this he filled up the double intervals [i.e. between 1, 2, 4, 8] and [36] the triple [i.e. between 1, 3, 9, 27], cutting off yet other portions from the mixture and placing them in the intervals, so that in each interval there were two kinds of means, the one exceeding and exceeded by equal parts of its extremes [as for example 1, $\frac{4}{3}$, 2, in which the mean $\frac{4}{3}$ is one-third of 1 more than 1, and one-third of 2 less than 2], the other being that kind of mean which exceeds and is exceeded by an equal number. Where there were intervals of $\frac{3}{2}$ and of $\frac{4}{3}$ and of $\frac{9}{8}$, made by the connecting terms in the former intervals, he filled up all the intervals of $4/3$ with the interval of $9/8$ leaving a fraction over and the interval which this fraction expressed was in the ratio of 256 to 243 And thus the whole mixture out of which he cut these portions was all exhausted by him This entire compound he divided lengthways into two parts which he joined to one another at the centre like the letter X and bent them into a circular form connecting them with themselves and each other at the point opposite to their original meeting point and comprehending them in a uniform revolution upon the same axis he made the one the outer and the other the inner circle Now the motion of the outer circle he called the motion of the same and the motion of the inner circle the motion of the other or diverse The motion of the same he carried round by the side to the right and the motion of the diverse diagonally to the left And he gave dominion to the motion of the same and like for that he left single and undivided but the inner motion he divided in six places and made seven unequal circles having their intervals in ratios of two and three three of each and bade the orbits proceed in a direction opposite to one another and three [Sun Mercury Venus] he made to move with equal swiftness and the remaining four [Moon Saturn Mars Jupiter] to move with unequal swiftness to the three and to one another but in due proportion

Now when the Creator had framed the soul according to his will he formed within her the corporeal universe and brought the two together and united them centre to centre The soul interfused everywhere from the centre to the circumference of heaven of which also she is the external envelopment herself turning in herself began a divine beginning of never ceasing and rational life enduring throughout all time [37] The body of heaven is visible but the soul is invisible and partakes of reason and harmony and being made by the best of intellectual and everlasting natures is the best of things created And because she is composed of the same and of the other and of the essence these three and is divided and united in due proportion and in her revolutions returns upon herself the soul when touching anything which has essence whether dispersed in parts or undivided is stirred through all her powers to declare the sameness or difference of that thing and some other and to what individuals are related and by what affected and in what way and how and when both in the world of generation and in the world of immutable being And when reason which works with equal truth whether she be in the circle of the diverse or of the same—in voiceless silence holding her onward course in the sphere of the self moved—when reason I say is hovering around the sensible world and when the circle of the diverse also moving truly imparts the intimations of sense to the whole soul, then arise opinions and beliefs sure and certain But when reason is concerned with the rational and the circle of the same moving smoothly declares it, then intelligence and knowledge are necessarily perfected And if any one affirms that in which these two are found to be other than the soul he will say the very opposite of the truth

When the father and creator saw the creature which he had made moving and living the created image of the eternal gods he rejoiced and in his joy determined to make the copy still more like the original and as this was eternal, he sought to make the universe eternal so far as might be Now the nature of the ideal being was everlasting but to bestow this attribute in its fulness upon a creature was impossible. Wherefore he resolved to have a moving image of eternity and when he set in order the heaven he made this image eternal but moving according to number while eternity itself rests in unity and this image we call time For there were no days and nights and months and years before the heaven was created but when he constructed the heaven he created them also They are all parts of time and the past and future are created species of time which we unconsciously but wrongly transfer to the eternal essence for we say that he was he is he will be but the truth is that is alone is properly attributed to him [38] and that was and will be are only to be spoken of becoming in time for they are motions but that which is immovably the same cannot become older or younger by time nor ever did or has become or hereafter will be older or younger nor is subject at all to any of those states which affect moving and sensible things and of which generation is the cause These are the forms of time which imitates eternity and revolves according to a law of number Moreover when we say that what has become is become and what becomes is becoming and that what will become is about to become and that the non existent is non-existent—all these are inaccurate modes of expression But perhaps this whole subject will be more suitably discussed on some other occasion

Time then, and the heaven came into being at the same instant in order that, having been created together if ever there was to be a dissolution of them they might be dissolved together It was framed after the pattern of the eternal nature that it might resemble this as far as was possible for the pattern exists from eternity and the created heaven has been and is, and will be, in all time Such was the mind and thought of God in the creation of time The sun and moon and five other stars which are called the planets, were created by him in order to distinguish and preserve the numbers of time and when he had made their several bodies he placed them in the orbits in which the circle of the other was revolving —in seven orbits seven stars First there was the moon in the orbit nearest the earth, and next the sun in the second orbit above the earth then came the morning star and the star sacred to Hermes, moving in orbits which have an equal swiftness with the sun but in an opposite direction and this is the reason why the sun and Hermes and Lucifer overtake and are overtaken by each other To enumerate the places which he assigned to the other stars and to give all the reasons why he assigned them although a secondary matter would give more trouble than the primary These things at some future time, when we are at leisure may have the consideration which they deserve but not at present

Now when all the stars which were necessary to the creation of time had attained a motion suitable to them, and had become living creatures having bodies fastened by vital chains, and learnt their appointed task [39] moving in the motion of the diverse which is diagonal and passes through and is governed by the motion of the same they revolved some in a larger and some in a lesser orbit—those which had the lesser orbit revolving faster and those which had the larger more slowly Now by reason of the motion of the same those which revolved fastest appeared to be overtaken by those which moved slower although they really overtook them for the motion of the same made them all turn in a spiral and because some went one way and some another that which receded most slowly from the sphere of the same which was the swiftest appeared to follow it most nearly That there might be some visible measure of their relative swiftness and slowness as they proceeded in their eight courses God lighted a fire, which we now call the sun in the second from the earth of these orbits, that it might give light to the whole of heaven and that the animals, as many as nature intended might participate in number learning arithmetic from the revolution of the same and the like Thus, then and for this reason the night and the day were created being the period of the one most intelligent revolution And the month is accomplished when the moon has completed her orbit and overtaken the sun and the year when the sun has completed his own orbit Mankind with hardly an exception have not remarked the periods of the other stars, and they have no name for them and do not measure them against one another by the help of number and hence they can scarcely be said to know that their wanderings, being infinite in number and admirable for their variety make up time And yet there is no difficulty in seeing that the perfect number of time fulfils the perfect year when all the eight revolutions, having their relative degrees of swiftness are accomplished together and attain their completion at the same time, measured by the rotation of the same and equally moving After this manner and for these reasons, came into being such of the stars as in their heavenly progress received reversals of motion to the end that the created heaven might imitate the eternal nature and be as like as possible to the perfect and intelligible animal

Thus far and until the birth of time the created universe was made in the likeness of the original but inasmuch as all animals were not yet comprehended therein it was still unlike What remained the creator then proceeded to fashion after the nature of the pattern Now as in the ideal animal the mind perceives ideas or species of a certain nature and number he thought that this created animal ought to have species of a like nature and number There are four such [40] one of them is the heavenly race of the gods another the race of birds whose way is in the air the third the watery species and the fourth the pedestrian and land creatures Of the heavenly and divine, he created the greater part out of fire that they might be the brightest of all things and fairest to behold and he fashioned them after the likeness of the universe in the figure of a circle and made them follow the intelligent motion of the supreme, distributing them over the whole circumference of heaven, which was to be a true cosmos or glorious world spangled with them all over

And he gave to each of them two movements the first a movement on the same spot after the same manner whereby they ever continue to think consistently the same thoughts about the same things, the second a forward move ment in which they are controlled by the revolution of the same and the like but by the other five motions they were unaffected [cf 43] in order that each of them might attain the high est perfection And for this reason the fixed star were created to be divine and eternal an imals ever abiding and revolving after the same manner and on the same spot and the other stars which reverse their motion and are subject to deviations of this kind were created in the manner already described The earth which is our nurse clinging around the pole which is extended through the universe he framed to be the guardian and artificer of night and day first and eldest of gods that are in the interior of heaven Vain would be the attempt to tell all the figures of them circling as in dance and their juxtapositions and the return of them in their revolutions upon themselves and their approximations, and to say which of these de ities in their conjunctions meet, and which of them are in opposition, and in what order they get behind and before one another and when they are severally eclipsed to our sight and again reappear sending terrors and intimations of the future to those who cannot calculate their move ments—to attempt to tell of all this without a visible representation of the heavenly system would be labour in vain Enough on this head and now let what we have said about the na ture of the created and visible gods have an end

To know or tell the origin of the other divinities is beyond us and we must accept the traditions of the men of old time who affirm themselves to be the offspring of the gods—that is what they say—and they must surely have known their own ancestors How can we doubt *the word of the children of the gods? race would hereafter be called man Now when they should be implanted in bodies by necessity and be always gaining or losing some part of their bodily substance then in the first place it would be necessary that they should all have in them one and the same faculty of sensation a sing out of irresistible impressions in the second place, they must have love in which pleasure and pain mingle also fear and anger and the feelings which are akin or opposite to them if they conquered these they would live righteously and if they were conquered by them, unrighteously He who lived well during his appointed time was to return and dwell in his native star and there he would have a blessed and congenial existence But if he failed in attaining this, at the second birth he would pass into a woman, and if, when in that state of being he did not desist from evil he would continually be changed into some brute who resembled him in the evil nature which he had acquired, and would not cease from his toils and transformations until he followed the revolution of the same and the like within him and overcame by the help of reason the turbulent and irrational mob of later accretions, made up of fire and air and water and earth and returned to the form of his first and better state Having given all these laws to his creatures, that he might be guiltless of future evil in any of them, the creator sowed some of them in the earth, and some in the moon and some in the other instruments of time and when he had sown them he committed to the younger gods the fashionin of their mortal bodies, and desired them to furnish what was still lacking to the human soul and having made all the suitable additions, to rule over them and to pilot the mortal animal in the best and wisest manner which they could, and a ert from him all but self inflicted evils

When the creator had made all these ordinances he remained in his o n accustom ed nature, and his children heard and were obedient to their father s word and receiving from him the immortal principle of a mortal creature, in imitation of their own creator they borrowed portions of fire, and earth, and water and air from the world [43] which were hereafter to be estored—these they took and welded them t geth er not with the ind ssoluble chains by which they were themselves bound but with little pegs too small to be v sible making up out of all the four elements each separate body and fasten ng the cou ses of the immortal soul in a body which was in a state of perpetual influx and efflux Now these courses, detained as in a vast river neither overcame nor were overcome but were hurrying and hurried to and fro so that the whole animal was moved and progressed irregularly however and irrationally and anyhow in all the six directions of motion, wandering backwards and forwards, and right and left and up and down and in all the six directions. For great as was the advancing and retiring flood which provided nourishment the affections produced by external contact caused still greater tumult—when the body of any one met and came into collision with some external fire or with the solid earth or the gliding waters or was caught in the tempest borne on the air and the motions produced by any of these impulses were carried through the body to the soul All such motions have consequently received the general name of "sensations" which they still retain And they did in fact at that time create a very great and mighty movement uniting with the everflowing stream in stirring up and violently shaking the courses of the soul they completely stopped the revolution of the same by their opposing current, and hindered it from predominating and ad ancing and they so disturbed the nature of the other or diverse, that the three double intervals [i.e. between 1 2, 4 8] and the three triple intervals [i.e. between 1 3 9, 27] together with the mean terms and connecting links which are expressed by the ratios of 3 2, and 4 3 and of 9 8—these, although they cannot be wholly undone except by him who united them were twisted by them in all sorts of ways and the circles were broken and disordered in every possible manner so that when they moved they were tumbling to pieces and moved irrationally at one time in a reverse direction, and then again obliquely and then upside down as you might imagine a person who is upside down and has his head leaning upon the ground and his feet up against something in the air and when he is in such a position both he and the spectator fancy that the right of either is his left and left right If when powerfully experiencing these and similar effects the revolutions of the soul come in contact with some external thing [44] either of the class of the same or of the other they speak of the same or of the other n a manner the very opposite of the truth and they become false and foolish and there is no course or revolution in them which has a guiding or directing power and if again any sensations enter n v olently from without and drag after them the wh le vessel of the soul

And he gave to each of them two movements the first a movement on the same spot after the same manner, whereby they ever continue to think consistently the same thoughts about the same things the second a forward movement in which they are controlled by the revolution of the same and the like but by the other five motions they were unaffected [cf 43] in order that each of them might attain the highest perfection And for this reason the fixed stars were created to be divine and eternal animals ever abiding and revolving after the same manner and on the same spot and the other stars which reverse their motion and are subject to deviations of this kind were created in the manner already described The earth which is our nurse clinging around the pole which is extended through the universe he framed to be the guardian and artificer of night and day first and eldest of gods that are in the interior of heaven Vain would be the attempt to tell all the figures of them circling as in dance and their juxtapositions and the return of them in their revolutions upon themselves and their approximations and to say which of these deities in their conjunctions meet, and which of them are in opposition and in what order they get behind and before one another and when they are severally eclipsed to our sight and again reappear sending terrors and intimations of the future to those who cannot calculate their movements—to attempt to tell of all this without a visible representation of the heavenly system would be labour in vain Enough on this head and now let what we have said about the nature of the created and visible gods have an end

To know or tell the origin of the other divinities is beyond us and we must accept the traditions of the men of old time who affirm themselves to be the offspring of the gods—that is what they say—and they must surely have known their own ancestors How can we doubt the word of the children of the gods? Although they give no probable or certain proofs still as they declare that they are speaking of what took place in their own family we must conform to custom and believe them In this manner then according to them the genealogy of these gods is to be received and set forth

Oceanus and Tethys were the children of Earth and Heaven and from these sprang Phorcys and Cronos and Rhea and all that generation [41] and from Cronos and Rhea sprang Zeus and Here and all those who are said to be their brethren and others who were the children of these

Now when all of them both those who visibly appear in their revolutions as well as those other gods who are of a more retiring nature had come into being the creator of the universe addressed them in these words Gods children of gods who are my works and of whom I am the artificer and father my creations are indissoluble, if so I will All that is bound may be undone but only an evil being would wish to undo that which is harmonious and happy Wherefore since ye are but creatures ye are not altogether immortal and indissoluble but ye shall certainly not be dissolved nor be liable to the fate of death having in my will a greater and mightier bond than those with which ye were bound at the time of your birth And now listen to my instructions —Three tribes of mortal beings remain to be created—without them the universe will be incomplete, for it will not contain every kind of animal which it ought to contain if it is to be perfect On the other hand if they were created by me and received life at my hands they would be on an equality with the gods In order then that they may be mortal and that this universe may be truly universal do ye according to your natures betake yourselves to the formation of animals imitating the power which was shown by me in creating you The part of them worthy of the name immortal which is called divine and is the guiding principle of those who are willing to follow justice and you—of that divine part I will myself sow the seed and having made a beginning I will hand the work over to you And do ye then interweave the mortal with the immortal and make and beget living creatures and give them food and make them to grow and receive them again in death

Thus he spake and once more into the cup in which he had previously mingled the soul of the universe he poured the remains of the elements and mingled them in much the same manner they were not however pure as before but diluted to the second and third degree. And having made it he divided the whole mixture into souls equal in number to the stars and assigned each soul to a star and having there placed them as in a chariot he showed them the nature of the universe and declared to them the laws of destiny according to which their first birth would be one and the same for all —no one should suffer a disadvantage at his hands they were to be sown in the instruments of time severally adapted to them [42] and to come forth the most religious of animals and as human nature was of two kinds the superior of one of the two concurring lights is reversed and this happens when the mirror is concave and its smooth surface repels the right stream of vision to the left side, and the left to the right. Or if the mirror be turned vertically then the concavity makes the countenance appear to be all upside down, and the lower rays are driven upwards and the upper downwards

All these are to be reckoned among the second and co-operative causes which God, carrying into execution the idea of the best as far as possible, uses as his ministers They are thought by most men not to be the second but the prime causes of all things, because they freeze and heat, and contract and dilate, and the like But they are not so for they are incapable of reason or in effect the only being which can properly have mind is the invisible soul whereas fire and water and earth and air are all of them visible bodies The lover of intellect and knowledge ought to explore causes of intelligent nature first of all, and secondly of those things which being moved by others are compelled to move others And this is what we too must do Both kinds of causes should be acknowledged by us but a distinction should be made between those which are endowed with mind and are the workers of things fair and good and those which are deprived of intelligence and always produce chance effects without order or design. Of the second or co-operative causes of sight, which help to give to the eyes the power which they now possess, enough has been said I will therefore now proceed to speak of the higher use and purpose for which God has given them to us [47] The sight in my opinion is the source of the greatest benefit to us, for had we never seen the stars and the sun and the heaven, none of the words which we have spoken about the universe would ever have been uttered But now the sight of day and night, and the months and the revolutions of the years have created number and have given us a conception of time, and the power of enquiring about the nature of the universe and from this source we have derived philosophy than which no greater good ever was or will be given by the gods to mortal man This is the greatest boon of sight and of the lesser benefits why should I speak? even the ordinary man if he were deprived of them would bewail his loss but in vain Thus much let me say however God invented and gave us sight to the end that we might behold the courses of intelligence in the heaven and apply them to the courses of our own intelligence which are akin to them, the unperturbed to the perturbed and that we, learning them and partaking of the natural truth of reason might imitate the absolutely unerring courses of God and regulate our own vagaries The same may be affirmed of speech and hearing, they have been given by the gods to the same end and for a like reason For this is the principal end of speech whereto it most contributes Moreover so much of music as is adapted to the sound of the voice and to the sense of hearing is granted to us for the sake of harmony and harmony which has motions akin to the revolutions of our souls, is not regarded by the intelligent votary of the Muses as given by them with a view to irrational pleasure, which is deemed to be the purpose of it in our day but as meant to correct any discord which may have arisen in the courses of the soul, and to be our ally in bringing her into harmony and agreement with herself and rhythm too was given by them for the same reason on account of the irregular and graceless ways which prevail among mankind generally and to help us against them

Thus far in what we have been saying with small exception, the works of intelligence have been set forth and now we must place by the side of them in our discourse the things which come into being through necessity—for the creation is mixed [48] being made up of necessity and mind Mind, the ruling power persuaded necessity to bring the greater part of created things to perfection and thus and after this manner in the beginning when the influence of reason got the better of necessity the universe was created But if a person will truly tell of the way in which the work was accomplished he must include the other influence of the variable cause as well Wherefore we must return again and find another suitable beginning as about the former matters so also about these To which end we must consider the nature of fire, and water and air and earth such as they were prior to the creation of the heaven and what was happening to them in this previous state for no one has as yet explained the manner of their generation but we speak of fire and the rest of them whatever they mean as though men knew their natures and we maintain them to be the first principles and letters or elements of the whole, when they cannot reasonably be compared by a man of any sense even to syllables or first compounds And let me say thus much I will not now speak of the first principle or principles of all things, or by whatever

then the courses of the soul though they seem to conquer are really conquered

And by reason of all these affections the soul when encased in a mortal body now as in the beginning is at first without intelligence but when the flood of growth and nutriment abates and the courses of the soul, calming down, go their own way and become steadier as time goes on then the several circles return to their natural form and their revolutions are corrected and they call the same and the other by their right names and make the possessor of them to become a rational being And if these combine in him with any true nurture or education he attains the fulness and health of the perfect man and escapes the worst disease of all but if he neglects education he walks lame to the end of his life and returns imperfect and good for nothing to the world below This however is a later stage at present we must treat more exactly the subject before us which involves a preliminary enquiry into the generation of the body and its members and as to how the soul was created—for what reason and by what providence of the gods and holding fast to probability we must pursue our way

First then the gods imitating the spherical shape of the universe enclosed the two divine courses in a spherical body that namely which we now term the head being the most divine part of us and the lord of all that is in us to this the gods when they put together the body gave all the other members to be servants considering that it partook of every sort of motion In order then that it might not tumble about among the high and deep places of the earth but might be able to get over the one and out of the other they provided the body to be its vehicle and means of locomotion which consequently had length and was furnished with four limbs extended and flexible these God contrived to be instruments of locomotion with which it might take hold and find support [45] and so be able to pass through all places carrying on high the dwelling place of the most sacred and divine part of us Such was the origin of legs and hands which for this reason were attached to every man and the gods deeming the front part of man to be more honourable and more fit to command than the hinder part made us to move mostly in a forward direction Wherefore man must needs have his front part unlike and distinguished from the rest of his body

And so in the vessel of the head they first of all put a face in which they inserted organs to minister in all things to the providence of the soul and they appointed this part, which has authority to be by nature the part which is in front And of the organs they first contrived the eyes to give light and the principle according to which they were inserted was as follows So much of fire as would not burn but gave a gentle light they formed into a substance akin to the light of every-day life and the pure fire which is within us and related thereto they made to flow through the eyes in a stream smooth and dense compressing the whole eye, and especially the centre part so that it kept out everything of a coarser nature and allowed to pass only this pure element When the light of day surrounds the stream of vision then like falls upon like and they coalesce and one body is formed by natural affinity in the line of vision, wherever the light that falls from within meets with an external object And the whole stream of vision being similarly affected in virtue of similarity diffuses the motions of what it touches or what touches it over the whole body until they reach the soul causing that perception which we call sight But when night comes on and the external and kindred fire departs then the stream of vision is cut off for going forth to an unlike element it is changed and extinguished being no longer of one nature with the surrounding atmosphere which is now deprived of fire and so the eye no longer sees and we feel disposed to sleep For when the eyelids which the gods invented for the preservation of sight, are closed they keep in the internal fire and the power of the fire diffuses and equalises the inward motions when they are equalised there is rest and when the rest is profound [46] sleep comes over us scarce disturbed by dreams but where the greater motions still remain of whatever nature and in whatever locality they engender corresponding visions in dreams, which are remembered by us when we are awake and in the external world And now there is no longer any difficulty in understanding the creation of images in mirrors and all smooth and bright surfaces For from the communion of the internal and external fires and again from the union of them and their numerous transformations when they meet in the mirror all these appearances of necessity arise, when the fire from the face coalesces with the fire from the eye on the bright and smooth surface And right appears left and left right because the visual rays come into contact with the rays emitted by the object in a manner contrary to the usual mode of meeting but the right appears right and the left left when the position wonderful and inexplicable manner which we will hereafter investigate For the present we have only to conceive of three natures first that which is in process of generation secondly that in which the generation takes place and thirdly that of which the thing generated is a resemblance. And we may liken the receiving principle to a mother and the source or spring to a father and the intermediate nature to a third and may remark further that if the model is to take every variety of form, then the matter in which the model is fashioned will not be duly prepared unless it is formless, and free from the impress of any of those shapes which it is hereafter to receive from without For if the matter were like any of the supervening forms, then whenever any opposite or entirely different nature was stamped upon its surface, it would take the impression badly because it would intrude its own shape. Wherefore, that which is to receive all forms should have no form as in making perfumes they first contrive that the liquid substance which is to receive the scent shall be as inodorous as possible or as those who wish to impress figures on soft substances do not allow any previous impression to remain, [51] but begin by making the surface as even and smooth as possible In the same way that which is to receive perpetually and through its whole extent the resemblances of all eternal beings ought to be devoid of any particular form. Wherefore the mother and receptacle of all created and visible and in any way sensible things, is not to be termed earth, or air or fire or water or any of their compounds or any of the elements from which these are derived, but is an invisible and formless being which receives all things and in some mysterious way partakes of the intelligible, and is most incomprehensible. In saying this we shall not be far wrong as far however as we can attain to a knowledge of her from the previous considerations, we may truly say that fire is that part of her nature which from time to time is inflamed and water that which is moistened, and that the mother substance becomes earth and air in so far as she receives the impressions of them

Let us consider this question more precisely Is there any self-existent fire? and do all those things which we call self-existent exist? or are only those things which we see, or in some way perceive through the bodily organs, truly existent, and nothing whatever besides them? And is all that which we call an intelligible essence nothing at all, and only a name? Here is a question which we must not leave unexamined or undetermined nor must we affirm too confidently that there can be no decision neither must we interpolate in our present long discourse a digression equally long but if it is possible to set forth a great principle in a few words, that is just what we want.

Thus I state my view —If mind and true opinion are two distinct classes, then I say that there certainly are these self-existent ideas unperceived by sense and apprehended only by the mind if however as some say true opinion differs in no respect from mind then everything that we perceive through the body is to be regarded as most real and certain But we must affirm them to be distinct, for they have a distinct origin and are of a different nature the one is implanted in us by instruction, the other by persuasion the one is always accompanied by true reason, the other is without reason the one cannot be overcome by persuasion but the other can and lastly every man may be said to share in true opinion but mind is the attribute of the gods and of very few men Wherefore also we must acknowledge that there is one kind of being which is always the same, [52] uncreated and indestructible, never receiving anything into itself from without, nor itself going out to any other but invisible and imperceptible by any sense and of which the contemplation is granted to intelligence only And there is another nature of the same name with it and like to it, perceived by sense, created, always in motion, becoming in place and again vanishing out of place, which is apprehended by opinion and sense And there is a third nature which is space and is eternal and admits not of destruction and provides a home for all created things, and is apprehended without the help of sense, by a kind of spurious reason and is hardly real which we beholding as in a dream say of all existence that it must of necessity be in some place and occupy a space, but that what is neither in heaven nor in earth has no existence. Of these and other things of the same kind, relating to the true and waking reality of nature, we have only this dreamlike sense, and we are unable to cast off sleep and determine the truth about them For an image, since the reality after which it is modelled does not belong to it, and it exists ever as the fleeting shadow of some other must be inferred to be in another [i.e. in space] grasping existence in some way or other or it could not be at all But true and exact reason, vindicating the nature of true being maintains that while two things [i.e. the name they are to be called for this reason—because it is difficult to set forth my opinion according to the method of discussion which we are at present employing Do not imagine any more than I can bring myself to imagine that I should be right in undertaking so great and difficult a task Remembering what I said at first about probability I will do my best to give as probable an explanation as any other—or rather more probable and I will first go back to the beginning and try to speak of each thing and of all Once more then at the commencement of my discourse I call upon God and beg him to be our saviour out of a strange and unwonted enquiry and to bring us to the haven of probability So now let us begin again

This new beginning of our discussion of the universe requires a fuller division than the former for then we made two classes now a third must be revealed The two sufficed for the former discussion one which we assumed was a pattern intelligible and always the same [49] and the second was only the imitation of the pattern generated and visible There is also a third kind which we did not distinguish at the time conceiving that the two would be enough But now the argument seems to require that we should set forth in words another kind which is difficult of explanation and dimly seen What nature are we to attribute to this new kind of being? We reply that it is the receptacle and in a manner the nurse of all generation I have spoken the truth but I must express myself in clearer language and this will be an arduous task for many reasons and in particular because I must first raise questions concerning fire and the other elements and determine what each of them is for to say with any probability or certitude which of them should be called water rather than fire and which should be called any of them rather than all or some one of them is a difficult matter How then shall we settle this point and what questions about the elements may be fairly raised?

In the first place we see that what we just now called water by condensation I suppose becomes stone and earth and this same element, when melted and dispersed passes into vapour and air Air again when inflamed becomes fire and again fire when condensed and extinguished passes once more into the form of air and once more air when collected and condensed produces cloud and mist and from these when still more compressed comes flowing water and from water comes earth and stones once more and thus generation appears to be transmitted from one to the other in a circle Thus then as the several elements never present themselves in the same form how can any one have the assurance to assert positively that any of them whatever it may be, is one thing rather than another? No one can But much the safest plan is to speak of them as follows —Anything which we see to be continually changing as for example fire we must not call this or that but rather say that it is of such a nature nor let us speak of water as this but always as such nor must we imply that there is any stability in any of those things which we indicate by the use of the words this and that supposing ourselves to signify something thereby for they are too volatile to be detained in any such expressions as this, or that or relative to this or any other mode of speaking which represents them as permanent We ought not to apply this to any of them but rather the word such which expresses the similar principle circulating in each and all of them for example that should *be called fire which is of such a nature al*ways and so of everything that has generation That in which the elements severally grow up, and appear and decay is alone to be called by the name this or that [50] but that which is of a certain nature hot or white, or anything which admits of opposite qualities and all things that are compounded of them ought not to be so denominated Let me make another attempt to explain my meaning more clearly Suppose a person to make all kinds of figures of gold and to be always transmuting one form into all the rest—somebody points to one of them and asks what it is By far the safest and truest answer is That is gold and not to call the triangle or any other figures which are formed in the gold these, as though they had existence, since they are in process of change while he is making the assertion but if the questioner be willing to take the safe and indefinite expression such we should be satisfied And the same argument applies to the universal nature which receives all bodies—that must be always called the same for while receiving all things, she never departs at all from her own nature, and never in any way or at any time, assumes a form like that of any of the things which enter into her she is the natural recipient of all impressions and is stirred and informed by them and appears different from time to time by reason of them But the forms which enter into and go out of her are the likenesses of real existences modelled after their patterns in a broken up, many small bodies will spring up out of them and take their own proper figures or again, when many small bodies are dissolved into their triangles, if they become one, they will form one large mass of another kind So much for their passage into one another I have now to speak of their several kinds, and show out of what combinations of numbers each of them was formed The first will be the simplest and smallest construction, and its element is that triangle which has its hypothenuse twice the lesser side. When two such triangles are joined at the diagonal, and this is repeated three times, and the triangles rest their diagonals and shorter sides on the same point as a centre, a single equilateral triangle is formed out of six triangles and four equilateral triangles, if put together make out of every three plane angles one solid angle, being that which is nearest to the most obtuse of plane angles [55] and out of the combination of these four angles arises the first solid form which distributes into equal and similar parts the whole circle in which it is inscribed. The second species of solid is formed out of the same triangles, which unite as eight equilateral triangles and form one solid angle out of four plane angles, and out of six such angles the second body is completed And the third body is made up of 120 triangular elements, forming twelve solid angles, each of them included in five plane equilateral triangles, having altogether twenty bases, each of which is an equilateral triangle. The one element [that is, the triangle which has its hypothenuse twice the lesser side] having generated these figures, generated no more but the isosceles triangle produced the fourth elementary figure, which is compounded of four such triangles, joining their right angles in a centre, and forming one equilateral quadrangle Six of these united form eight solid angles, each of which is made by the combination of three plane right angles the figure of the body thus composed is a cube, having six plane quadrangular equilateral bases There was yet a fifth combination which God used in the delineation of the universe

Now he who duly reflecting on all this, enquires whether the worlds are to be regarded as indefinite or definite in number will be of opinion that the notion of their indefiniteness is characteristic of a sadly indefinite and ignorant mind He, however who raises the question whether they are to be truly regarded as one or five, takes up a more reasonable position Arguing from probabilities, I am of opinion that they are one another regarding the question from another point of view will be of another mind. But, leaving this enquiry let us proceed to distribute the elementary forms, which have now been created in idea, among the four elements.

To earth, then, let us assign the cubical form for earth is the most immoveable of the four and the most plastic of all bodies, and that which has the most stable bases must of necessity be of such a nature Now of the triangles which we assumed at first, that which has two equal sides is by nature more firmly based than that which has unequal sides and of the compound figures which are formed out of either the plane equilateral quadrangle has necessarily a more stable basis than the equilateral triangle, both in the whole and in the parts. [56] Wherefore in assigning this figure to earth we adhere to probability and to water we assign that one of the remaining forms which is the least moveable and the most moveable of them to fire and to air that which is intermediate Also we assign the smallest body to fire, and the greatest to water and the intermediate in size to air and again the acutest body to fire, and the next in acuteness to air and the third to water Of all these elements, that which has the fewest bases must necessarily be the most moveable, for it must be the acutest and most penetrating in every way and also the lightest as being composed of the smallest number of similar particles and the second body has similar properties in a second degree, and the third body in the third degree Let it be agreed then, both according to strict reason and according to probability that the pyramid is the solid which is the original element and seed of fire and let us assign the element which was next in the order of generation to air and the third to water We must imagine all these to be so small that no single particle of any of the four kinds is seen by us on account of their smallness but when many of them are collected together their aggregates are seen And the ratios of their numbers, motions, and other properties, everywhere God as far as necessity allowed or gave consent, has exactly perfected and harmonised in due proportion

From all that we have just been saying about the elements or kinds the most probable conclusion is as follows —earth, when meeting with fire and dissolved by its sharpness whether the dissolution take place in the fire itself or perhaps in some mass of air or water is borne hither and thither until its parts, meeting together and mutually harmonising again be

image and space] are different they cannot exist one of them in the other and so be one and also two at the same time

Thus have I concisely given the result of my thoughts and my verdict is that being and space and generation these three existed in their three ways before the heaven and that the nurse of generation moistened by water and inflamed by fire, and receiving the forms of earth and air and experiencing all the affections which accompany these presented a strange variety of appearances and being full of powers which were neither similar nor equally balanced was never in any part in a state of equipoise but swaying unevenly hither and thither was shaken by them and by its motion again shook them and the elements when moved were separated and carried continually some one way some another as when grain is shaken and winnowed by fans and other instruments used in the threshing of corn [53] the close and heavy particles are borne away and settle in one direction and the loose and light particles in another In this manner the four kinds or elements were then shaken by the receiving vessel which moving like a winnowing machine scattered far away from one another the elements most unlike and forced the most similar elements into close contact Wherefore also the various elements had different places before they were arranged so as to form the universe At first they were all without reason and measure But when the world began to get into order fire and water and earth and air had only certain faint traces of themselves and were altogether such as everything might be expected to be in the absence of God this I say was their nature at that time and God fashioned them by form and number Let it be consistently maintained by us in all that we say that God made them as far as possible the fairest and best out of things which were not fair and good And now I will endeavour to show you the disposition and generation of them by an unaccustomed argument which I am compelled to use but I believe that you will be able to follow me for your education has made you familiar with the methods of science

In the first place then as is evident to all fire and earth and water and air are bodies And every sort of body possesses solidity and every solid must necessarily be contained in planes and every plane rectilinear figure is composed of triangles and all triangles are originally of two kinds both of which are made up of one right and two acute angles one of them has at either end of the base the half of a divided right angle having equal sides while in the other the right angle is divided into unequal parts having unequal sides These then proceeding by a combination of probability with demonstration we assume to be the original elements of fire and the other bodies but the principles which are prior to these God only knows, and he of men who is the friend of God And next we have to determine what are the four most beautiful bodies which are unlike one another and of which some are capable of resolution into one another for having discovered thus much we shall know the true origin of earth and fire and of the proportionate and intermediate elements And then we shall not be willing to allow that there are any distinct kinds of visible bodies fairer than these Wherefore we must endeavour to construct the four forms of bodies which excel in beauty and then we shall be able to say that we have sufficiently apprehended their nature [54] Now of the two triangles the isosceles has one form only the scalene or unequal sided has an infinite number Of the infinite forms we must select the most beautiful if we are to proceed in due order and any one who can point out a more beautiful form than ours for the construction of these bodies shall carry off the palm not as an enemy but as a friend Now the one which we maintain to be the most beautiful of all the many triangles (and we need not speak of the others) is that of which the double forms a third triangle which is equilateral the reason of this would be long to tell he who disproves what we are saying and shows that we are mistaken may claim a friendly victory Then let us choose two triangles out of which fire and the other elements have been constructed one isosceles the other having the square of the longer side equal to three times the square of the lesser side

Now is the time to explain what was before obscurely said there was an error in imagining that all the four elements might be generated by and into one another this I say was an erroneous supposition for there are generated from the triangles which we have selected four kinds—three from the one which has the sides unequal the fourth alone is framed out of the isosceles triangle Hence they cannot all be resolved into one another a great number of small bodies being combined into a few large ones or the converse But three of them can be thus resolved and compounded for they all spring from one, and when the greater bodies are broken up many small bodies will spring up out of them and take their own proper figures or again, when many small bodies are dissolved into their triangles, if they become one, they will form one large mass of another kind So much for their passage into one another I have now to speak of their several kinds, and show out of what combinations of numbers each of them was formed. The first will be the simplest and smallest construction, and its element is that triangle which has its hypothenuse twice the lesser side. When two such triangles are joined at the diagonal and this is repeated three times, and the triangles rest their diagonals and shorter sides on the same point as a centre a single equilateral triangle is formed out of six triangles and four equilateral triangles, if put together make out of every three plane angles one solid angle, being that which is nearest to the most obtuse of plane angles [55] and out of the combination of these four angles arises the first solid form which distributes into equal and similar parts the whole circle in which it is inscribed. The second species of solid is formed out of the same triangles, which unite as eight equilateral triangles and form one solid angle out of four plane angles and out of six such angles the second body is completed And the third body is made up of 120 triangular elements, forming twelve solid angles, each of them included in five plane equilateral triangles, having altogether twenty bases each of which is an equilateral triangle The one element (that is, the triangle which has its hypothenuse twice the lesser side) having generated these figures generated no more but the isosceles triangle produced the fourth elementary figure, which is compounded of four such triangles, joining their right angles in a centre and forming one equilateral quadrangle Six of these united form eight solid angles, each of which is made by the combination of three plane right angles the figure of the body thus composed is a cube, having six plane quadrangular equilateral bases There was yet a fifth combination which God used in the delineation of the universe

Now he who, duly reflecting on all this enquires whether the worlds are to be regarded as indefinite or definite in number will be of opinion that the notion of their indefiniteness is characteristic of a sadly indefinite and ignorant mind He however who raises the question whether they are to be truly regarded as one or five, takes up a more reasonable position Arguing from probabilities, I am of opinion that they are one another regarding the question from another point of view will be of another mind But, leaving this enquiry let us proceed to distribute the elementary forms, which have now been created in idea, among the four elements.

To earth then, let us assign the cubical form for earth is the most immoveable of the four and the most plastic of all bodies, and that which has the most stable bases must of necessity be of such a nature Now of the triangles which we assumed at first, that which has two equal sides is by nature more firmly based than that which has unequal sides and of the compound figures which are formed out of either the plane equilateral quadrangle has necessarily a more stable basis than the equilateral triangle both in the whole and in the parts [56] Wherefore, in assigning this figure to earth we adhere to probability and to water we assign that one of the remaining forms which is the least moveable and the most moveable of them to fire and to air that which is intermediate Also we assign the smallest body to fire, and the greatest to water and the intermediate in size to air and again the acutest body to fire and the next in acuteness to air and the third to water Of all these elements, that which has the fewest bases must necessarily be the most moveable, for it must be the acutest and most penetrating in every way and also the lightest as being composed of the smallest number of similar particles and the second body has similar properties in a second degree and the third body in the third degree Let it be agreed then, both according to strict reason and according to probability that the pyramid is the solid which is the original element and seed of fire and let us assign the element which was next in the order of generation to air and the third to water We must imagine all these to be so small that no single particle of any of the four kinds is seen by us on account of their smallness but when many of them are collected together their aggregates are seen And the ratios of their numbers motions, and other properties, everywhere God as far as necessity allowed or gave consent, has exactly perfected and harmonised in due proportion

From all that we have just been saying about the elements or kinds the most probable conclusion is as follows —earth, when meeting with fire and dissolved by its sharpness, whether the dissolution take place in the fire itself or perhaps in some mass of air or water is borne hither and thither until its parts, meeting together and mutually harmonising again be come earth, for they can never take any other form But water when divided by fire or by air on re forming may become one part fire and two parts air and a single volume of air divided becomes two of fire. Again when a small body of fire is contained in a larger body of air or water or earth and both are moving and the fire struggling is overcome and broken up then two volumes of fire form one volume of air and when air is overcome and cut up into small pieces two and a half parts of air are condensed into one part of water Let us consider the matter in another way When one of the other elements is fastened upon by fire [57] and is cut by the sharpness of its angles and sides it coalesces with the fire and then ceases to be cut by them any longer For no element which is one and the same with itself can be changed by or change another of the same kind and in the same state But so long as in the process of transition the weaker is fighting against the stronger the dissolution continues Again when a few small particles enclosed in many larger ones are in process of decomposition and extinction they only cease from their tendency to extinction when they consent to pass into the conquering nature and fire becomes air and air water But if bodies of another kind go and attack them [i e the small particles] the latter continue to be dissolved until being completely forced back and dispersed they make their escape to their own kindred or else being overcome and assimilated to the conquering power they remain where they are and dwell with their victors and from being many become one And owing to these affections, all things are changing their place for by the motion of the receiving vessel the bulk of each class is distributed into its proper place, but those things which become unlike themselves and like other things are hurried by the shaking into the place of the things to which they grow like

Now all unmixed and primary bodies are produced by such causes as these As to the subordinate species which are included in the greater kinds they are to be attributed to the varieties in the structure of the two original triangles For either structure did not originally produce the triangle of one size only but some larger and some smaller and there are as many sizes as there are species of the four elements Hence when they are mingled with themselves and with one another there is an endless variety of them, which those who would arrive at the probable truth of nature ought duly to consider

Unless a person comes to an understanding about the nature and conditions of rest and motion he will meet with many difficulties in the discussion which follows Something has been said of this matter already and something more remains to be said which is that motion never exists in what is uniform For to conceive that anything can be moved without a mover is hard or indeed impossible and equally impossible to conceive that there can be a mover unless there be something which can be moved—motion cannot exist where either of these are wanting and for these to be uniform is impossible wherefore we must assign rest to uniformity and motion to the want of uniformity [58] Now inequality is the cause of the nature which is wanting in uniformity and of this we have already described the origin But there still remains the further point—why things when divided after their kinds do not cease to pass through one another and to change their place —which we will now proceed to explain In the revolution of the universe are comprehended all the four elements and this being circular and having a tendency to come together compresses everything and will not allow any place to be left void Wherefore also fire above all things penetrates everywhere, and air next, as being next in rarity of the elements and the two other elements in like manner penetrate according to their degrees of rarity For those things which are composed of the largest particles have the largest void left in their compositions and those which are composed of the smallest particles have the least And the contraction caused by the compression thrusts the smaller particles into the interstices of the larger And thus, when the small parts are placed side by side with the larger and the lesser divide the greater and the greater unite the lesser all the elements are borne up and down and hither and thither towards their own places, for the change in the size of each changes its position in space And these causes generate an inequality which is always maintained and is continually creating a perpetual motion of the elements in all time

In the next place we have to consider that there are divers kinds of fire There are for example first flame and secondly those emanations of flame which do not burn but only give light to the eyes thirdly the remains of fire, which are seen in red hot embers after the flame has been extinguished There are similar differences in the air of which the brightest part is called the aether and the most turbid sort mist and darkness and there are various other nameless kinds which arise from the inequality of the triangles. Water again, admits in the first place of a division into two kinds the one liquid and the other fusile. The liquid kind is composed of the small and unequal particles of water and moves itself and is moved by other bodies owing to the want of uniformity and the shape of its particles whereas the fusile kind, being formed of large and uniform particles, is more stable than the other and is heavy and compact by reason of its uniformity But when fire gets in and dissolves the particles and destroys the uniformity it has greater mobility and becoming fluid is thrust forth by the neighbouring air and spreads upon the earth and this dissolution of the solid masses is called melting, [59] and their spreading out upon the earth flowing Again, when the fire goes out of the fusile substance, it does not pass into a vacuum, but into the neighbouring air and the air which is displaced forces together the liquid and still moveable mass into the place which was occupied by the fire, and unites it with itself. Thus compressed the mass resumes its equability and is again at unity with itself, because the fire which was the author of the inequality has retreated and this departure of the fire is called cooling, and the coming together which follows upon it is termed congealment. Of all the kinds termed fusile, that which is the densest and is formed out of the finest and most uniform parts is that most precious possession called gold, which is hardened by filtration through rock this is unique in kind, and has both a glittering and a yellow colour A shoot of gold, which is so dense as to be very hard, and takes a black colour is termed adamant. There is also another kind which has parts nearly like gold, and of which there are several species, it is denser than gold, and it contains a small and fine portion of earth, and is therefore harder yet also lighter because of the great interstices which it has within itself and this substance, which is one of the bright and denser kinds of water when solidified is called copper There is an alloy of earth mingled with it, which, when the two parts grow old and are disunited, shows itself separately and is called rust. The remaining phenomena of the same kind there will be no difficulty in reasoning out by the method of probabilities. A man may sometimes set aside meditations about eternal things, and for recreation turn to consider the truths of generation which are probable only he will thus gain a pleasure not to be repented of, and secure for himself while he lives a wise and moderate pastime Let us grant ourselves this indulgence, and go through the probabilities relating to the same subjects which follow next in order

Water which is mingled with fire, so much as is fine and liquid (being so called by reason of its motion and the way in which it rolls along the ground) and soft, because its bases give way and are less stable than those of earth, when separated from fire and air and isolated, becomes more uniform, and by their retirement is compressed into itself and if the condensation be very great, the water above the earth becomes hail, but on the earth, ice and that which is congealed in a less degree and is only half solid when above the earth is called snow and when upon the earth, and condensed from dew hoar frost. Then, again, there are the numerous kinds of water which have been mingled with one another and are distilled through plants which grow in the earth and this whole class is called by the name of juices or saps. [60] The unequal admixture of these fluids creates a variety of species most of them are nameless, but four which are of a fiery nature are clearly distinguished and have names. First, there is wine, which warms the soul as well as the body secondly there is the oily nature which is smooth and divides the visual ray and for this reason is bright and shining and of a glistening appearance, including pitch, the juice of the castor berry oil itself, and other things of a like kind thirdly there is the class of substances which expand the contracted parts of the mouth, until they return to their natural state, and by reason of this property create sweetness, —these are included under the general name of honey and, lastly there is a frothy nature, which differs from all juices, having a burning quality which dissolves the flesh it is called opos (a vegetable acid)

As to the kinds of earth, that which is filtered through water passes into stone in the following manner —The water which mixes with the earth and is broken up in the process changes into air and taking this form mounts into its own place. But as there is no surrounding vacuum it thrusts away the neighbouring air and this being rendered heavy and, when it is displaced, having been poured around the mass of earth, forcibly compresses it and drives it into the vacant space whence the new air had come up and the earth when compressed by the air into an indissoluble union with water becomes rock. The fairer sort is that which is made up of equal and similar parts and is transparent that which has the opposite qualities is inferior But when all the watery part is suddenly drawn out by fire, a more brittle substance is formed to which we give the name of pottery Sometimes also moisture may remain and the earth which has been fused by fire becomes when cool a certain stone of a black colour A like separation of the water which had been copiously mingled with them may occur in two substances composed of finer particles of earth and of a briny nature out of either of them a half solid body is then formed soluble in water—the one soda which is used for purging away oil and earth and other salt, which harmonizes so well in combinations pleasing to the palate and is as the law testifies a substance dear to the gods The compounds of earth and water are not soluble by water but by fire only, and for this reason —Neither fire nor air melt masses of earth for their particles being smaller than the interstices in its structure have plenty of room to move without forcing their way and so they leave the earth unmelted and undissolved but particles of water [61] which are larger force a passage and dissolve and melt the earth Wherefore earth when not consolidated by force is dissolved by water only when consolidated by nothing but fire for this is the only body which can find an entrance The cohesion of water again, when very strong is dissolved by fire only—when weaker then either by air or fire—the former entering the interstices and the latter penetrating even the triangles But nothing can dissolve air, when strongly condensed which does not reach the elements or triangles or if not strongly condensed then only fire can dissolve it. As to bodies composed of earth and water while the water occupies the vacant interstices of the earth in them which are compressed by force the particles of water which approach them from without finding no entrance flow around the entire mass and leave it undissolved but the particles of fire entering into the interstices of the water do to the water what water does to earth and fire to air and are the sole causes of the compound body of earth and water liquefying and becoming fluid Now these bodies are of two kinds some of them, such as glass and the fusible sort of stones have less water than they have earth on the other hand substances of the nature of wax and incense have more of water entering into their composition

I have thus shown the various classes of bodies as they are diversified by their forms and combinations and changes into one another and now I must endeavour to set forth their affections and the causes of them In the first place the bodies which I have been describing are necessarily objects of sense But we have not yet considered the origin of flesh or what belongs to flesh or of that part of the soul which is mortal And these things cannot be adequately explained without also explaining the affections which are concerned with sensation nor the latter without the former and yet to explain them together is hardly possible, for which reason we must assume first one or the other and afterwards examine the nature of our hypothesis In order then that the affections may follow regularly after the elements let us presuppose the existence of body and soul

First let us enquire what we mean by saying that fire is hot and about this we may reason from the dividing or cutting power which it exercises on our bodies We all of us feel that fire is sharp and we may further consider the fineness of the sides and the sharpness of the angles and the smallness of the particles and the swiftness of the motion—all this makes the action of fire violent and sharp [62] so that it cuts whatever it meets And we must not forget that the original figure of fire (i e the pyramid], more than any other form has a dividing power which cuts our bodies into small pieces (κερματίζει) and thus naturally produces that affection which we call heat and hence the origin of the name (θερμός κέρμα) Now the opposite of this is sufficiently manifest nevertheless we will not fail to describe it For the larger particles of moisture which surround the body entering in and driving out the lesser but not being able to take their places compress the moist principle in us and this from being unequal and disturbed is forced by them into a state of rest which is due to equability and compression But things which are contracted contrary to nature are by nature at war and force themselves apart and to this war and convulsion the name of shivering and trembling is given and the whole affection and the cause of the affection are both termed cold That is called hard to which our flesh yields and soft which yields to our flesh and things are also termed hard and soft relatively to one another That which yields has a small base but that which rests on quadrangular bases is firmly posed and belongs to the class which offers the greatest resistance so too does that which is the most compact and therefore most repellent The nature of the light and the heavy will be best under stood when examined in connexion with our notions of abo e and belo v for it is quite a mistake to suppose that the universe is parted into two regions, separate from and opposite to each other the one a lower to which all things tend which have any bulk and an upper to which things only ascend against their will For as the uni erse is in the form of a sphere all the extremities being equidistant from the centre are equally extremities and the centre which is equidistant from them is equally to be regarded as the opposite of them all Such being the nature of the world when a person says that any of these points is abo e or below may he not be justly charged with using an improper express on? For the centre of the world cannot be rightly called either above or below but is the centre and nothing else and the circumfer ence is not the centre, and has in no one part of itself a different relation to the centre from what it has in any of the opposite parts Indeed when it is in e ery direction similar how can one rightly give to it names which imply oppos tion? For if there were any solid body in equipoise at the centre of the [63] universe there would be nothing to dra v it to this ex treme rather than to that, for they are all per fectly similar and if a person were to go round the world in a circle, he would often when standing at the antipodes of his former position speak of the same point as above and below for as I was saying just now to speak of the whole which s in the form of a gl be as having one part abo e and an ther belov is not like a sens ble man

The reason why these names are used and the circumstances under wh ch they are ordi narily ppl ed by us to the d vision of the hea ens, may be elucidated by the following supposition —if a person were to stand in that part f the un verse which is the appointed place of fire, and wh e there s the great mass of fire to which fiery bod es gath r—if I say he were to ascend thither and ha ng the power to do this, were to abstr ct particles of fire and put them in scales and v gh them and then raising the balance were to d aw the fire by force towards the uncong nial element of the air it would be ery e dent th t he ould compel the small r mass more readily than the larger for when two things are s multaneously raised by one and th same pow r the smaller body must necessarily yield to the supe or power w th less reluctance than the larger and the larger body s call d heavy and said to tend downwards, and the maller body s called l ght and said to tend upwards And we may detect ourselves who are upon the earth doing precisely the same thing For we often separate earthy natures, and sometimes earth itself and draw them into the uncongenial element of air by force and con trary to nature both clinging to their kindred elements But that which is smaller yields to the impulse given by us towards the dissimilar ele ment more easily than the larger and so we call the former light and the place towards which it is impelled we call above and the contrary state and place we call heavy and below respec tively Now the relations of these must necessarily vary because the principal masses of the different elements hold opposite positions for that which is light heavy below or above in one place will be found to be and become contrary and transverse and every way diverse in relation to that which is light, heavy below or above in an opposite place And about all of them this has to be considered —that the ten dency of each towards its kindred element makes the body which is moved heavy and the place towards which the motion tends below but things which have an opposite tendency we call by an opposite name Su h are the causes wh ch we assign to these phenomena. As to the smooth and the rough any one who sees them can explain the reason of them to another For roughness is hardness mingled with irregular ity [64] and smoothness is produced by the joint effect of un formity and density

The most important of the affections which concern the whole body remains to be consid ered—that is the cause of pleasure and pain in the perceptions of which I have been speaking, and in all other things which are perceived by sense through the parts f the body and have both pains and pleasures attendant on them Let us imagine the causes of every affection, whether of sense or not to be of the following nature, remembering that we have already distinguished between the nature which is easy and which is hard to move for this is the direc tion in which we must hunt the prey which e mean to take A body which is of a nature to be easily mo ed on receiving an impression how ever sl ght spreads abroad the motion in a cir cle the parts commun cating with each other until at last reaching the principle of mind they ann unce the quality of the agent But a body of the oppos te kind be ng immobile, and not extending to the surrounding reg n, mere ly rece v s the impr ss on and does not stir any of the ne ghbouring parts and since the parts do not distribute the r ginal impression to oth er parts it has no effect of motion on the whole animal and therefore produces no effect on the patient This is true of the bones and hair and other more earthy parts of the human body whereas what was said above relates mainly to sight and hearing because they have in them the greatest amount of fire and air Now we must conceive of pleasure and pain in this way An impression produced in us contrary to nature and violent if sudden is painful and again the sudden return to nature is pleasant but a gentle and gradual return is imperceptible and vice versa On the other hand the impression of sense which is most easily produced is most readily felt but is not accompanied by pleasure or pain such for example are the affections of the sight which as we said above is a body naturally uniting with our body in the day time (45) for cuttings and burnings and other affections which happen to the sight do not give pain nor is there pleasure when the sight returns to its natural state but the sensations are clearest and strongest according to the manner in which the eye is affected by the object and itself strikes and touches it there is no violence either in the contraction or dilation of the eye But bodies formed of larger particles yield to the agent only with a struggle and then they impart their motions to the whole and cause pleasure and pain—pain when alienated from their natural conditions [65] and pleasure when restored to them Things which experience gradual withdrawings and emptyings of their nature and great and sudden replenishments fail to perceive the emptying but are sensible of the replenishment and so they occasion no pain but the greatest pleasure to the mortal part of the soul as is manifest in the case of perfumes But things which are changed all of a sudden and only gradually and with difficulty return to their own nature have effects in every way opposite to the former as is evident in the case of burnings and cuttings of the body

Thus have we discussed the general affections of the whole body and the names of the agents which produce them And now I will endeavour to speak of the affections of particular parts and the causes and agents of them as far as I am able In the first place let us set forth what was omitted when we were speaking of juices concerning the affections peculiar to the tongue These too like most of the other affections appear to be caused by certain contractions and dilations but they have besides more of roughness and smoothness than is found in other affections for whenever earthy particles enter into the small veins which are the testing instruments of the tongue, reaching to the heart, and fall upon the moist delicate portions of flesh—when as they are dissolved they contract and dry up the little veins they are astringent if they are rougher but if not so rough then only harsh Those of them which are of an abstergent nature and purge the whole surface of the tongue if they do it in excess and so encroach as to consume some part of the flesh itself like potash and soda are all termed bitter But the particles which are deficient in the alkaline quality and which cleanse only moderately are called salt and having no bitterness or roughness are regarded as rather agreeable than otherwise Bodies which share in and are made smooth by the heat of the mouth and which are inflamed and again in turn inflame that which heats them and which are so light that they are carried upwards to the sensations of the head [66] and cut all that comes in their way by reason of these qualities in them are all termed pungent But when these same particles refined by putrefaction enter into the narrow veins and are duly proportioned to the particles of earth and air which are there they set them whirling about one another and while they are in a whirl cause them to dash against and enter into one another and so form hollows surrounding the particles that enter—which watery vessels of air (for a film of moisture sometimes earthy sometimes pure is spread around the air) are hollow spheres of water and those of them which are pure are transparent and are called bubbles while those composed of the earthy liquid which is in a state of general agitation and effervescence are said to boil or ferment—of all these affections the cause is termed acid And there is the opposite affection arising from an opposite cause when the mass of entering particles immersed in the moisture of the mouth is congenial to the tongue and smooths and oils over the roughness and relaxes the parts which are unnaturally contracted and contracts the parts which are relaxed and disposes them all according to their nature—that sort of remedy of violent affections is pleasant and agreeable to every man and has the name sweet But enough of this

The faculty of smell does not admit of differences of kind for all smells are of a half formed nature and no element is so proportioned as to have any smell The veins about the nose are too narrow to admit earth and water and too wide to detain fire and air and for this reason no one ever perceives the smell of any of them but smells always proceed from bodies that are damp or putrefying or liquefying, or evaporating, and are perceptible only in the intermediate state, when water is changing into air and air into water and all of them are either vapor or mist. That which is passing out of air into water is mist, and that which is passing from water into air is vapour and hence all smells are thinner than water and thicker than air. The proof of this is that when there is any obstruction to the respiration, and a man draws in his breath by force, then no smell filters through, but the air without the smell alone penetrates. [67] Wherefore the varieties of smell have no name and they have not many or definite and simple kinds but they are distinguished only as painful and pleasant, the one sort irritating and disturbing the whole cavity which is situated between the head and the navel, the other having a soothing influence, and restoring this same region to an agreeable and natural condition.

In considering the third kind of sense, hearing, we must speak of the causes in which it originates. We may in general assume sound to be a blow which passes through the ears, and is transmitted by means of the air the brain, and the blood to the soul and that hearing is the vibration of this blow which begins in the head and ends in the region of the liver. The sound which moves swiftly is acute, and the sound which moves slowly is grave, and that which is regular is equable and smooth and the reverse is harsh. A great body of sound is loud, and a small body of sound the reverse. Respecting the harmonies of sound I must hereafter speak.

There is a fourth class of sensible things, having many intricate varieties which must now be distinguished. They are called by the general name of colours, and are a flame which emanates from every sort of body and has particles corresponding to the sense of sight. I have spoken already in what has preceded of the causes which generate sight, and in this place it will be natural and suitable to give a rational theory of colours.

Of the particles coming from other bodies which fall upon the sight, some are smaller and some are larger and some are equal to the parts of the sight itself. Those which are equal are imperceptible, and we call them transparent. The larger produce contraction, the smaller dilation, in the sight exercising a power akin to that of hot and cold bodies on the flesh, or of astringent bodies on the tongue or of those heating bodies which we termed pungent. White and black are similar effects of contraction and dilation in another sphere, and for this reason have a different appearance. Wherefore, we ought to term white that which dilates the visual ray and the opposite of this is black. There is also a swifter motion of a different sort of fire which strikes and dilates the ray of sight until it reaches the eyes [68] forcing a way through their passages and melting them and eliciting from them a union of fire and water which we call tears, being itself an opposite fire which comes to them from an opposite direction—the inner fire flashes forth like lightning and the outer finds a way in and is extinguished in the moisture, and all sorts of colours are generated by the mixture. This affection is termed dazzling and the object which produces it is called bright and flashing. There is another sort of fire which is intermediate, and which reaches and mingles with the moisture of the eye without flashing and in this, the fire mingling with the ray of the moisture, produces a colour like blood, to which we give the name of red. A bright hue mingled with red and white gives the colour called auburn. The law of proportion however according to which the several colours are formed even if a man knew he would be foolish in telling for he could not give any necessary reason, nor indeed any tolerable or probable explanation of them. Again, red when mingled with black and white becomes purple, but it becomes umber when the colours are burnt as well as mingled and the black is more thoroughly mixed with them. Flame colour is produced by a union of auburn and dun, and dun by an admixture of black and white pale yellow by an admixture of white and auburn. White and bright meeting, and falling upon a full black, become dark blue and when dark blue mingles with white, a light blue colour is formed as flame-colour with black makes leek green. There will be no difficulty in seeing how and by what mixtures the colours derived from these are made according to the rules of probability. He, however who should attempt to verify all this by experiment would forget the difference of the human and divine nature. For God only has the knowledge and also the power which are able to combine many things into one and again resolve the one into many. But no man either is or ever will be able to accomplish either the one or the other operation.

These are the elements thus of necessity then subsisting, which the creator of the fairest and best of created things associated with himself when he made the self sufficing and most perfect God using the necessary causes as his ministers in the accomplishment of his work but himself contriving the good in all his creations Wherefore we may distinguish two sorts of causes the one divine and the other necessary and may seek for the divine in all things as far as our nature admits [69] with a view to the blessed life but the necessary kind only for the sake of the divine considering that without them and when isolated from them these higher things for which we look cannot be apprehended or received or in any way shared by us

Seeing then that we have now prepared for our use the various classes of causes which are the material out of which the remainder of our discourse must be woven just as wood is the material of the carpenter, let us revert in a few words to the point at which we began and then endeavour to add on a suitable ending to the beginning of our tale

As I said at first when all things were in disorder God created in each thing in relation to itself and in all things in relation to each other all the measures and harmonies which they could possibly receive For in those days nothing had any proportion except by accident nor did any of the things which now have names deserve to be named at all—as for example fire water and the rest of the elements All these the creator first set in order and out of them he constructed the universe which was a single animal comprehending in itself all other animals mortal and immortal Now of the divine he himself was the creator but the creation of the mortal he committed to his offspring And they imitating him received from him the immortal principle of the soul and around this they proceeded to fashion a mortal body and made it to be the vehicle of the soul and constructed within the body a soul of another nature which was mortal subject to terrible and irresistible affections—first of all pleasure the greatest incitement to evil then pain which deters from good also rashness and fear two foolish counsellors anger hard to be appeased and hope easily led astray—these they mingled with irrational sense and with all daring love according to necessary laws and so framed man Wherefore fearing to pollute the divine any more than was absolutely unavoidable they gave to the mortal nature a separate habitation in another part of the body placing the neck between them to be the isthmus and boundary which they constructed between the head and breast to keep them apart And in the breast, and in what is termed the thorax they encased the mortal soul and as the one part of this was superior and the other inferior they divided the cavity of the [70] thorax into two parts as the women s and men s apartments are divided in houses and placed the midriff to be a wall of partition between them That part of the inferior soul which is endowed with courage and passion and loves contention they settled nearer the head midway between the midriff and the neck in order that it might be under the rule of reason and might join with it in controlling and restraining the desires when they are no longer willing of their own accord to obey the word of command issuing from the citadel

The heart the knot of the veins and the fountain of the blood which races through all the limbs was set in the place of guard that when the might of passion was roused by reason making proclamation of any wrong assailing them from without or being perpetrated by the desires within quickly the whole power of feeling in the body perceiving these commands and threats might obey and follow through every turn and alley and thus allow the principle of the best to have the command in all of them But the gods foreknowing that the palpitation of the heart in the expectation of danger and the swelling and excitement of passion was caused by fire formed and implanted as a supporter to the heart the lung which was in the first place, soft and bloodless and also had within hollows like the pores of a sponge, in order that by receiving the breath and the drink it might give coolness and the power of respiration and alleviate the heat Wherefore they cut the air channels leading to the lung and placed the lung about the heart as a soft spring that when passion was rife within the heart beating against a yielding body might be cooled and suffer less and might thus become more ready to join with passion in the service of reason

The part of the soul which desires meats and drinks and the other things of which it has need by reason of the bodily nature they placed between the midriff and the boundary of the navel contriving in all this region a sort of manger for the food of the body and there they bound it down like a wild animal which was chained up with man and must be nourished if man was to exist They appointed this lower creation his place here in order that he might be always feeding at the manger and have his dwelling as far as might be from the council chamber making as little noise and disturbance as possible, [71] and permitting the best part to advise quietly for the good of the whole. And knowing that this lower principle in man would not comprehend reason and even if attaining to some degree of perception would never naturally care for rational notions, but that it would be led away by phantoms and visions night and day—to be a remedy for this, God combined with it the liver and placed it in the house of the lower nature, contriving that it should be solid and smooth and bright and sweet, and should also have a bitter quality in order that the power of thought, which proceeds from the mind might be reflected as in a mirror which receives likenesses of objects and gives back images of them to the sight and so might strike terror into the desires, when, making use of the bitter part of the liver to which it is akin, it comes threatening and invading and diffusing this bitter element swiftly through the whole liver produces colours like bile, and contracting every part makes it wrinkled and rough and twisting out of its right place and contorting the lobe and closing and shutting up the vessels and gates, causes pain and loathing And the converse happens when some gentle inspiration of the understanding pictures images of an opposite character and allays the bile and bitterness by refusing to stir or touch the nature opposed to itself but by making use of the natural sweetness of the liver corrects all things and makes them to be right and smooth and free, and renders the portion of the soul which resides about the liver happy and joyful enabling it to pass the night in peace, and to practise divination in sleep, inasmuch as it has no share in mind and reason For the authors of our being remembering the command of their father when he bade them create the human race as good as they could, that they might correct our inferior parts and make them to attain a measure of truth placed in the liver the seat of divination And herein is a proof that God has given the art of divination not to the wisdom, but to the foolishness of man No man, when in his wits attains prophetic truth and inspiration but when he receives the inspired word either his intelligence is enthralled in sleep or he is demented by some distemper or possession And he who would understand what he remembers to have been said [72] whether in a dream or when he was awake, by the prophetic and inspired nature, or would determine by reason the meaning of the apparitions which he has seen, and what indications they afford to this man or that of past present or future good and evil must first recover his wits But while he continues demented he cannot judge of the visions which he sees or the words which he utters the ancient saying is very true that "only a man who has his wits can act or judge about himself and his own affairs. And for this reason it is customary to appoint interpreters to be judges of the true inspiration. Some persons call them prophets they are quite unaware that they are only the expositors of dark sayings and visions, and are not to be called prophets at all but only interpreters of prophecy

Such is the nature of the liver which is placed as we have described in order that it may give prophetic intimations. During the life of each individual these intimations are plainer but after his death the liver becomes blind, and delivers oracles too obscure to be intelligible The neighbouring organ [the spleen] is situated on the left hand side, and is constructed with a view of keeping the liver bright and pure—like a napkin always ready prepared and at hand to clean the mirror And hence, when any impurities arise in the region of the liver by reason of disorders of the body the loose nature of the spleen, which is composed of a hollow and bloodless tissue, receives them all and clears them away and when filled with the unclean matter swells and festers, but, again when the body is purged settles down into the same place as before and is humbled

Concerning the soul as to which part is mortal and which divine and how and why they are separated, and where located, if God acknowledges that we have spoken the truth, then and then only can we be confident still we may venture to assert that what has been said by us is probable, and will be rendered more probable by investigation Let us assume thus much

The creation of the rest of the body follows next in order and this we may investigate in a similar manner And it appears to be very meet that the body should be framed on the following principles —

The authors of our race were aware that we should be intemperate in eating and drinking and take a good deal more than was necessary or proper by reason of gluttony In order then that disease might not quickly destroy us [73] and lest our mortal race should perish without fulfilling its end—intending to provide against this, the gods made what is called the lower belly to be a receptacle for the superfluous meat and drink and formed the convolution of the bowels so that the food might be prevented from passing quickly through and compelling the body to require more food thus producing insatiable gluttony, and making the whole race an enemy to philosophy and music, and rebellious against the divinest element within us

The bones and flesh and other similar parts of us were made as follows The first principle of all of them was the generation of the marrow For the bonds of life which unite the soul with the body are made fast there and they are the root and foundation of the human race The marrow itself is created out of other materials God took such of the primary triangles as were straight and smooth and were adapted by their perfection to produce fire and water and air and earth—these I say he separated from their kinds, and mingling them in due proportions with one another made the marrow out of them to be a universal seed of the whole race of mankind and in this seed he then planted and enclosed the souls and in the original distribution gave to the marrow as many and various forms as the different kinds of souls were hereafter to receive That which like a field was to receive the divine seed he made round every way and called that portion of the marrow brain intending that when an animal was perfected the vessel containing this substance should be the head but that which was intended to contain the remaining and mortal part of the soul he distributed into figures at once round and elongated and he called them all by the name marrow and to these as to anchors fastening the bonds of the whole soul he proceeded to fashion around them the entire framework of our body constructing for the marrow first of all a complete covering of bone

Bone was composed by him in the following manner Having sifted pure and smooth earth he kneaded it and wetted it with marrow and after that he put it into fire and then into water and once more into fire and again into water—in this way by frequent transfers from one to the other he made it insoluble by either Out of this he fashioned [74] as in a lathe a globe made of bone which he placed around the brain and in this he left a narrow opening and around the marrow of the neck and back he formed vertebrae which he placed under one another like pivots beginning at the head and extending through the whole of the trunk Thus wishing to preserve the entire seed he enclosed it in a stone like casing inserting joints and using in the formation of them the power of the other or diverse as an intermediate nature that they might have motion and flexure Then again considering that the bone would be too brittle and inflexible and when heated and again cooled would soon mortify and destroy the seed within—having this in view he contrived the sinews and the flesh that so binding all the members together by the sinews which admitted of being stretched and relaxed about the vertebrae he might thus make the body capable of flexion and extension while the flesh would serve as a protection against the summer heat and against the winter cold and also against falls softly and easily yielding to external bodies like articles made of felt and containing in itself a warm moisture which in summer exudes and makes the surface damp would impart a natural coolness to the whole body and again in winter by the help of this internal warmth would form a very tolerable defence against the frost which surrounds it and attacks it from without He who modelled us considering these things mixed earth with fire and water and blended them and making a ferment of acid and salt he mingled it with them and formed soft and succulent flesh As for the sinews he made them of a mixture of bone and unfermented flesh attempered so as to be in a mean and gave them a yellow colour wherefore the sinews have a firmer and more glutinous nature than flesh but a softer and moister nature than the bones With these God covered the bones and marrow binding them together by sinews and then enshrouded them all in an upper covering of flesh The more living and sensitive of the bones he enclosed in the thinnest film of flesh and those which had the least life within them in the thickest and most solid flesh So again on the joints of the bones where reason indicated that no more was required he placed only a thin covering of flesh that it might not interfere with the flexion of our bodies and make them unwieldy because difficult to move and also that it might not by being crowded and pressed and matted together destroy sensation by reason of its hardness [75] and impair the memory and dull the edge of intelligence Wherefore also the thighs and the shanks and the hips and the bones of the arms and the forearms and other parts which have no joints and the inner bones which on account of the rarity of the soul in the marrow are destitute of reason—all these are abundantly provided with flesh but such as have mind in them are in general less fleshy except where the creator has made some part solely of flesh in order to give sensation—as, for example, the tongue But commonly this is not the case. For the nature which comes into being and grows up in us by a law of necessity does not admit of the combination of solid bone and much flesh with acute perceptions. More than any other part the framework of the head would have had them if they could have co-existed and the human race, having a strong and fleshy and sinewy head would have had a life twice or many times as long as it now has, and also more healthy and free from pain.

But our creators, considering whether they should make a longer-lived race which was worse, or a shorter-lived race which was better came to the conclusion that every one ought to prefer a shorter span of life, which was better to a longer one, which was worse and therefore they covered the head with thin bone, but not with flesh and sinews, since it had no joints and thus the head was added, having more wisdom and sensation than the rest of the body but also being in every man far weaker For these reasons and after this manner God placed the sinews at the extremity of the head in a circle round the neck, and glued them together by the principle of likeness and fastened the extremities of the jawbones to them below the face, and the other sinews he dispersed throughout the body fastening limb to limb. The framers of us framed the mouth as now arranged, having teeth and tongue and lips, with a view to the necessary and the good contriving the way in for necessary purposes, the way out for the best purposes for that is necessary which enters in and gives food to the body but the river of speech which flows out of a man and ministers to the intelligence, is the fairest and noblest of all streams Still the head could neither be left a bare frame of bones, on account of the extremes of heat and cold in the different seasons, nor yet be allowed to be wholly covered and so become dull and senseless by reason of an overgrowth of flesh The fleshy nature was not therefore wholly dried up [76] but a large sort of peel was parted off and remained over which is now called the skin. This met and grew by the help of the cerebral moisture, and became the circular envelopment of the head And the moisture rising up under the sutures, watered and closed in the skin upon the crown forming a sort of knot. The diversity of the sutures was caused by the power of the courses of the soul and of the food, and the more these struggled against one another the more numerous they became and fewer if the struggle were less violent This skin the divine power pierced all round with fire and out of the punctures which were thus made the moisture issued forth, and the liquid and heat which was pure came away and a mixed part which was composed of the same material as the skin and had a fineness equal to the punctures, was borne up by its own impulse and extended far outside the head but being too slow to escape, was thrust back by the external air and rolled up underneath the skin where it took root. Thus the hair sprang up in the skin being akin to it because it is like threads of leather but rendered harder and closer through the pressure of the cold, by which each hair while in process of separation from the skin, is compressed and cooled. Wherefore the creator formed the head hairy making use of the causes which I have mentioned and reflecting also that instead of flesh the brain needed the hair to be a light covering or guard, which would give shade in summer and shelter in winter and at the same time would not impede our quickness of perception From the combination of sinew skin, and bone in the structure of the finger there arises a triple compound which, when dried up, takes the form of one hard skin partaking of all three natures, and was fabricated by these second causes, but designed by mind which is the principal cause with an eye to the future. For our creators well knew that women and other animals would some day be framed out of men and they further knew that many animals would require the use of nails for many purposes wherefore they fashioned in men at their first creation the rudiments of nails. For this purpose and for these reasons they caused skin, hair and nails to grow at the extremities of the limbs And now that all the parts and members of the mortal animal had [77] come together since its life of necessity consisted of fire and breath and it therefore wasted away by dissolution and depletion, the gods contrived the following remedy They mingled a nature akin to that of man with other forms and perceptions and thus created another kind of animal These are the trees and plants and seeds which have been improved by cultivation and are now domesticated among us anciently there were only the wild kinds, which are older than the cultivated For everything that partakes of life may be truly called a living being and the animal of which we are now speaking partakes of the third kind of soul which is said to be seated between the midriff and the navel having no part in opinion or reason or mind but only in feelings of pleasure and pain and the desires which accompany them For this nature is always in a passive state revolving in and about itself, repelling the motion from without and using its own and accordingly is not endowed by nature with the power of observing or reflecting on its own concerns Wherefore it lives and does not differ from a living being but is fixed and rooted in the same spot having no power of self motion

Now after the superior powers had created all these natures to be food for us who are of the inferior nature they cut various channels through the body as through a garden that it might be watered as from a running stream In the first place they cut two hidden channels or veins down the back where the skin and the flesh join which answered severally to the right and left side of the body These they let down along the backbone so as to have the marrow of generation between them where it was most likely to flourish and in order that the stream coming down from above might flow freely to the other parts and equalise the irrigation In the next place they divided the veins about the head and interlacing them they sent them in opposite directions those coming from the right side they sent to the left of the body and those from the left they diverted towards the right so that they and the skin might together form a bond which should fasten the head to the body since the crown of the head was not encircled by sinews and also in order that the sensations from both sides might be distributed over the whole body And next they ordered the water courses of the body in a manner which I will describe [78] and which will be more easily understood if we begin by admitting that all things which have lesser parts retain the greater but the greater cannot retain the lesser Now of all natures fire has the smallest parts and therefore penetrates through earth and water and air and their compounds nor can anything hold it And a similar principle applies to the human belly for when meats and drinks enter it it holds them but it cannot hold air and fire because the particles of which they consist are smaller than its own structure

These elements therefore God employed for the sake of distributing moisture from the belly into the veins weaving together a network of fire and air like a weel having at the entrance two lesser weels further he constructed one of these with two openings and from the lesser weels he extended cords reaching all round to the extremities of the network All the interior of the net he made of fire but the lesser weels and their cavity of air The network he took and spread over the newly formed animal in the following manner —He let the lesser weels pass into the mouth there were two of them and one he let down by the air pipes into the lungs the other by the side of the air pipes into the belly The former he divided into two branches both of which he made to meet at the channels of the nose so that when the way through the mouth did not act the streams of the mouth as well were replenished through the nose With the other cavity (i e of the greater weel) he enveloped the hollow parts of the body and at one time he made all this to flow into the lesser weels quite gently for they are composed of air and at another time he caused the lesser weels to flow back again and the net he made to find a way in and out through the pores of the body and the rays of fire which are bound fast within followed the passage of the air either way never at any time ceasing so long as the mortal being holds together This process as we affirm the name giver named inspiration and expiration And all this movement active as well as passive takes place in order that the body being watered and cooled may receive nourishment and life for when the respiration is going in and out and the fire, which is fast bound within follows it and ever and anon moving to and fro enters through the belly and reaches the meat and drink [79] it dissolves them and dividing them into small portions and guiding them through the passages where it goes pumps them as from a fountain into the channels of the veins and makes the stream of the veins flow through the body as through a conduit

Let us once more consider the phenomena of respiration and enquire into the causes which have made it what it is They are as follows — Seeing that there is no such thing as a vacuum into which any of those things which are moved can enter and the breath is carried from us into the external air the next point is, as will be clear to every one that it does not go into a vacant space but pushes its neighbour out of its place and that which is thrust out in turn drives out its neighbour and in this way everything of necessity at last comes round to that place from whence the breath came forth and enters in there and following the breath fills up the vacant space and this goes on like the rotation of a wheel because there can be no such thing as a vacuum Wherefore also the breast and the lungs, when they emit the breath are replenished by the air which surrounds the body and which enters in through the pores of the flesh and is driven round in a circle and again, the air which is sent away and passes out through the body forces the breath inwards through the passage of the mouth and the nostrils Now the origin of this movement may be supposed to be as follows. In the interior of every animal the hottest part is that which is around the blood and veins it is in a manner an internal fountain of fire, which we compare to the network of a creel being woven all of fire and extended through the centre of the body while the outer parts are composed of air Now we must admit that heat naturally proceeds outward to its own place and to its kindred element and as there are two exits for the heat, the one out through the body and the other through the mouth and nostrils, when it moves towards the one, it drives round the air at the other and that which is driven round falls into the fire and becomes warm, and that which goes forth is cooled But when the heat changes its place, and the particles at the other exit grow warmer the hotter air inclining in that direction and carried towards its native element, fire, pushes round the air at the other and this being affected in the same way and communicating the same impulse, a circular motion swaying to and fro is produced by the double process, which we call inspiration and expiration

The phenomena of medical cupping glasses and of the swallowing of drink and of the projection of bodies, [80] whether discharged in the air or bowled along the ground, are to be investigated on a similar principle and swift and slow sounds which appear to be high and low and are sometimes discordant on account of their inequality and then again harmonical on account of the equality of the motion which they excite in us For when the motions of the antecedent swifter sounds begin to pause and the two are equalised the slower sounds overtake the swifter and then propel them When they overtake them they do not intrude a new and discordant motion but introduce the beginnings of a slower which answers to the swifter as it dies away thus producing a single mixed expression out of high and low whence arises a pleasure which even the unwise feel, and which to the wise becomes a higher sort of delight, being an imitation of divine harmony in mortal motions Moreover as to the flowing of water the fall of the thunderbolt, and the marvels that are observed about the attraction of amber and the Heraclean stones —in none of these cases is there any attraction but he who investigates rightly will find that such wonderful phenomena are attributable to the combination of certain conditions—the non-existence of a vacuum the fact that objects push one another round and that they change places, passing severally into their proper positions as they are divided or combined

Such as we have seen is the nature and such are the causes of respiration—the subject in which this discussion originated For the fire cuts the food and following the breath surges up within fire and breath rising together and filling the veins by drawing up out of the belly and pouring into them the cut portions of the food and so the streams of food are kept flowing through the whole body in all animals And fresh cuttings from kindred substances, whether the fruits of the earth or herb of the field which God planted to be our daily food acquire all sorts of colours by their inter mixture but red is the most pervading of them being created by the cutting action of fire and by the impression which it makes on a moist substance and hence the liquid which circulates in the body has a colour such as we have described The liquid itself we call blood which nourishes the flesh and the whole body [81] whence all parts are watered and empty places filled

Now the process of repletion and evacuation is effected after the manner of the universal motion by which all kindred substances are drawn towards one another For the external elements which surround us are always causing us to consume away and distributing and sending off like to like the particles of blood too which are divided and contained within the frame of the animal as in a sort of heaven are compelled to imitate the motion of the universe Each therefore, of the divided parts within us, being carried to its kindred nature replenishes the void When more is taken away than flows in then we decay and when less we grow and increase

The frame of the entire creature when young has the triangles of each kind new and may be compared to the keel of a vessel which is just off the stocks they are locked firmly together and yet the whole mass is soft and delicate, being freshly formed of marrow and nurtured on milk Now when the triangles out of which meats and drinks are composed come in from without and are comprehended in the body being older and weaker than the triangles al ready there the frame of the body gets the better of them and its newer triangles cut them up and so the animal grows great, being nourished by a multitude of similar particles But when the roots of the triangles are loosened by having undergone many conflicts with many things in the course of time they are no longer able to cut or assimilate the food which enters but are themselves easily divided by the bodies which come in from without In this way every animal is overcome and decays and this affection is called old age And at last when the bonds by which the triangles of the marrow are united no longer hold and are parted by the strain of existence, they in turn loosen the bonds of the soul and she, obtaining a natural release flies away with joy For that which takes place according to nature is pleasant but that which is contrary to nature is painful And thus death if caused by disease or produced by wounds is painful and violent but that sort of death which comes with old age and fulfils the debt of nature is the easiest of deaths and is accompanied with pleasure rather than with pain

Now every one can see whence diseases arise There are four natures out of which the body is compacted [82] earth and fire and water and air and the unnatural excess or defect of these or the change of any of them from its own natural place into another or—since there are more kinds than one of fire and of the other elements—the assumption by any of these of a wrong kind or any similar irregularity, produces disorders and diseases for when any of them is produced or changed in a manner contrary to nature, the parts which were previously cool grow warm, and those which were dry become moist and the light become heavy and the heavy light all sorts of changes occur For as we affirm a thing can only remain the same with itself whole and sound when the same is added to it or subtracted from it in the same respect and in the same manner and in due proportion and whatever comes or goes away in violation of these laws causes all manner of changes and infinite diseases and corruptions Now there is a second class of structures which are also natural, and this affords a second opportunity of observing diseases to him who would understand them For whereas marrow and bone and flesh and sinews are composed of the four elements and the blood though after another manner is likewise formed out of them most diseases originate in the way which I have described but the worst of all owe their severity to the fact that the generation of these substances proceeds in a wrong order they are then destroyed For the natural order is that the flesh and sinews should be made of blood the sinews out of the fibres to which they are akin and the flesh out of the clots which are formed when the fibres are separated And the glutinous and rich matter which comes away from the sinews and the flesh not only glues the flesh to the bones but nourishes and imparts growth to the bone which surrounds the marrow and by reason of the solidity of the bones, that which filters through consists of the purest and smoothest and oiliest sort of triangles dropping like dew from the bones and watering the marrow

Now when each process takes place in this order health commonly results when in the opposite order disease. For when the flesh becomes decomposed and sends back the wasting substance into the veins then an over supply of blood of diverse kinds mingling with air in the veins having variegated colours and bitter properties as well as acid and saline qualities contains all sorts of bile and serum and phlegm For all things go the wrong way [83] and having become corrupted first they taint the blood itself and then ceasing to give nourishment to the body they are carried along the veins in all directions no longer preserving the order of their natural courses but at war with themselves because they receive no good from one another and are hostile to the abiding constitution of the body which they corrupt and dissolve The oldest part of the flesh which is corrupted being hard to decompose, from long burning grows black and from being everywhere corroded becomes bitter and is injurious to every part of the body which is still uncorrupted Sometimes when the bitter element is refined away the black part assumes an acidity which takes the place of the bitterness at other times the bitterness being tinged with blood has a redder colour and this when mixed with black takes the hue of grass and again an auburn colour mingles with the bitter matter when new flesh is decomposed by the fire which surrounds the internal flame—to all which symptoms some physician perhaps or rather some philosopher who had the power of seeing in many dissimilar things one nature deserving of a name has assigned the common name of bile But the other kinds of bile are variously distinguished by their colours As for serum that sort which is the watery part of blood is innocent but that which is a secretion of black and acid bile is malignant when mingled by the power of heat with any salt substance, and is then called acid phlegm.

Again, the substance which is formed by the liquefaction of new and tender flesh when air is present, if inflated and encased in liquid so as to form bubbles, which separately are invisible owing to their small size but when collected are of a bulk which is visible, and have a white colour arising out of the generation of foam—all this decomposition of tender flesh when intermingled with air is termed by us white phlegm. And the whey or sediment of newly-formed phlegm is sweat and tears, and includes the various daily discharges by which the body is purified Now all these become causes of disease when the blood is not replenished in a natural manner by food and drink but gains bulk from opposite sources in violation of the laws of nature. [84] When the several parts of the flesh are separated by disease, if the foundation remains, the power of the disorder is only half as great, and there is still a prospect of an easy recovery but when that which binds the flesh to the bones is diseased, and no longer being separated from the muscles and sinews, ceases to give nourishment to the bone and to unite flesh and bone and from being oily and smooth and glutinous becomes rough and salt and dry owing to bad regimen, then all the substance thus corrupted crumbles away under the flesh and the sinews and separates from the bone, and the fleshy parts fall away from their foundation and leave the sinews bare and full of brine, and the flesh again gets into the circulation of the blood and makes the previously-mentioned disorders still greater And if these bodily affections be severe, still worse are the prior disorders as when the bone itself, by reason of the density of the flesh, does not obtain sufficient air but becomes mouldy and hot and gangrened and receives no nutriment, and the natural process is inverted, and the bone crumbling passes into the food and the food into the flesh, and the flesh again falling into the blood makes all maladies that may occur more virulent than those already mentioned But the worst case of all is when the marrow is diseased, either from excess or defect and this is the cause of the very greatest and most fatal disorders, in which the whole course of the body is reversed.

There is a third class of diseases which may be conceived of as arising in three ways for they are produced sometimes by wind and sometimes by phlegm, and sometimes by bile When the lung which is the dispenser of the air to the body is obstructed by rheums and its passages are not free some of them not acting while through others too much air enters then the parts which are unrefreshed by air corrode while in other parts the excess of air forcing its way through the veins distorts them and decomposing the body is enclosed in the midst of it and occupies the midriff thus numberless painful diseases are produced, accompanied by copious sweats. And oftentimes when the flesh is dissolved in the body wind generated within and unable to escape, is the source of quite as much pain as the air coming in from without but the greatest pain is felt when the wind gets about the sinews and the veins of the shoulders, and swells them up, and so twists back the great tendons and the sinews which are connected with them These disorders are called tetanus and opisthotonus, by reason of the tension which accompanies them The cure of them is difficult relief is in most cases given by fever supervening [85] The white phlegm though dangerous when detained within by reason of the air bubbles, yet if it can communicate with the outside air is less severe, and only discolours the body generating leprous eruptions and similar diseases. When it is mingled with black bile and dispersed about the courses of the head which are the divinest part of us, the attack if coming on in sleep, is not so severe but when assailing those who are awake it is hard to be got rid of and being an affection of a sacred part, is most justly called sacred An acid and salt phlegm again, is the source of all those diseases which take the form of catarrh but they have many names because the places into which they flow are manifold Inflammations of the body come from burnings and inflamings, and all of them originate in bile. When bile finds a means of discharge, it boils up and sends forth all sort of tumours but when imprisoned within it generates many inflammatory diseases, above all when mingled with pure blood since it then displaces the fibres which are scattered about in the blood and are designed to maintain the balance of rare and dense, in order that the blood may not be so liquefied by heat as to exude from the pores of the body nor again become too dense and thus find a difficulty in circulating through the veins. The fibres are so constituted as to maintain this balance and if any one brings them all together when the blood is dead and in process of cooling then the blood which remains becomes fluid, but if they are left alone they soon con-

geal by reason of the surrounding cold The fibres having this power over the blood, bile, which is only stale blood and which from being flesh is dissolved again into blood at the first influx coming in little by little hot and liquid is congealed by the power of the fibres and so congealing and made to cool it produces internal cold and shuddering When it enters with more of a flood and overcomes the fibres by its heat and boiling up throws them into disorder if it have power enough to maintain its supremacy it penetrates the marrow and burns up what may be termed the cables of the soul and sets her free but when there is not so much of it and the body though wasted still holds out the bile is itself mastered and is either utterly banished or is thrust through the veins into the lower or upper belly and is driven out of the body like an exile from a state in which there has been civil war [86] whence arise diarrhoeas and dysenteries and all such disorders When the constitution is disordered by excess of fire continuous heat and fever are the result when excess of air is the cause then the fever is quotidian when of water which is a more sluggish element than either fire or air then the fever is a tertian when of earth which is the most sluggish of the four and is only purged away in a four fold period the result is a quartan fever which can with difficulty be shaken off

Such is the manner in which diseases of the body arise the disorders of the soul which depend upon the body originate as follows We must acknowledge disease of the mind to be a want of intelligence and of this there are two kinds to wit madness and ignorance In what ever state a man experiences either of them that state may be called disease and excessive pains and pleasures are justly to be regarded as the greatest diseases to which the soul is liable For a man who is in great joy or in great pain in his unseasonable eagerness to attain the one and to avoid the other is not able to see or to hear anything rightly but he is mad and is at the time utterly incapable of any participation in reason He who has the seed about the spinal marrow too plentiful and overflowing like a tree overladen with fruit has many throes and also obtains many pleasures in his desires and their offspring and is for the most part of his life deranged because his pleasures and pains are so very great his soul is rendered foolish and disordered by his body yet he is regarded not as one diseased but as one who is voluntarily bad which is a mistake The truth is that the intemperance of love is a disease of the soul due chiefly to the moisture and fluidity which is produced in one of the elements by the loose consistency of the bones And in general all that which is termed the incontinence of pleasure and is deemed a reproach under the idea that the wicked voluntarily do wrong is not justly a matter for reproach For no man is voluntarily bad but the bad become bad by reason of an ill disposition of the body and bad education things which are hateful to every man and happen to him against his will And in the case of pain too in like manner the soul suffers much evil from the body For where the acid and briny phlegm and other bitter and bilious humours wander about in the body and find no exit or escape but are pent up within and mingle their own vapours with the motions of the soul and are blended [87] with them they produce all sorts of diseases more or fewer and in every degree of intensity and being carried to the three places of the soul whichever they may severally assail they create infinite varieties of ill temper and melancholy of rashness and cowardice and also of forgetfulness and stupidity Further when to this evil constitution of body evil forms of government are added and evil discourses are uttered in private as well as in public and no sort of instruction is given in youth to cure these evils then all of us who are bad become bad from two causes which are entirely beyond our control In such cases the planters are to blame rather than the plants the educators rather than the educated But however that may be we should endeavour as far as we can by education and studies and learning to avoid vice and attain virtue this however is part of another subject

There is a corresponding enquiry concerning the mode of treatment by which the mind and the body are to be preserved about which it is meet and right that I should say a word in turn for it is more our duty to speak of the good than of the evil Everything that is good is fair and the fair is not without proportion and the animal which is to be fair must have due proportion Now we perceive lesser symmetries or proportions and reason about them but of the highest and greatest we take no heed for there is no proportion or disproportion more productive of health and disease and virtue and vice than that between soul and body This however we do not perceive nor do we reflect that when a weak or small frame is the vehicle of a great and mighty soul or conversely when a little soul is encased in a large body then the whole

animal is not fair for it lacks the most important of all symmetries but the due proportion of mind and body is the fairest and loveliest of all sights to him who has the seeing eye. Just as a body which has a leg too long or which is unsymmetrical in some other respect, is an unpleasant sight, and also when doing its share of work, is much distressed and makes convulsive efforts, and often stumbles through awkwardness, and is the cause of infinite evil to its own self—in like manner we should conceive of the double nature which we call the living being and when in this compound there is an impassioned soul more powerful than the body [88] that soul, I say convulses and fills with disorders the whole inner nature of man and when eager in the pursuit of some sort of learning or study causes wasting· or again, when teaching or disputing in private or in public, and strifes and controversies arise inflames and dissolves the composite frame of man and introduces rheums, and the nature of this phenomenon is not understood by most professors of medicine, who ascribe it to the opposite of the real cause. And once more, when a body large and too strong for the soul is united to a small and weak intelligence, then inasmuch as there are two desires natural to man,—one of food for the sake of the body and one of wisdom for the sake of the diviner part of us—then, I say the motions of the stronger getting the better and increasing their own power but making the soul dull and stupid and forgetful engender ignorance, which is the greatest of diseases. There is one protection against both kinds of disproportion.—that we should not move the body without the soul or the soul without the body and thus they will be on their guard against each other and be healthy and well balanced. And therefore the mathematician or any one else whose thoughts are much absorbed in some intellectual pursuit, must allow his body also to have due exercise, and practise gymnastic and he who is careful to fashion the body should in turn impart to the soul its proper motions, and should cultivate music and all philosophy if he would deserve to be called truly fair and truly good And the separate parts should be treated in the same manner in imitation of the pattern of the universe for as the body is heated and also cooled within by the elements which enter into it, and is again dried up and moistened by external things, and experiences these and the like affections from both kinds of motions, the result is that the body if given up to motion when in a state of quiescence is overmastered and perishes but if any one, in imitation of that which we call the foster mother and nurse of the universe, will not allow the body ever to be inactive, but is always producing motions and agitations through its whole extent which form the natural defence against other motions both internal and external and by moderate exercise reduces to order according to their affinities the particles and affections which are wandering about the body as we have already said when speaking of the universe he will not allow enemy placed by the side of enemy to stir up wars and disorders in the body but he will place friend by the side of friend so as to create health

Now of all motions that is the best which is produced in a thing by itself [89] for it is most akin to the motion of thought and of the universe but that motion which is caused by others is not so good, and worst of all is that which moves the body when at rest, in parts only and by some external agency Wherefore of all modes of purifying and reuniting the body the best is gymnastic the next best is a surging motion, as in sailing or any other mode of conveyance which is not fatiguing· the third sort of motion may be of use in a case of extreme necessity but in any other will be adopted by no man of sense I mean the purgative treatment of physicians for diseases unless they are very dangerous should not be irritated by medicines, since every form of disease is in a manner akin to the living being whose complex frame has an appointed term of life. For not the whole race only but each individual—barring inevitable accidents—comes into the world having a fixed span, and the triangles in us are originally framed with power to last for a certain time, beyond which no man can prolong his life And this holds also of the constitution of diseases if any one regardless of the appointed time tries to subdue them by medicine, he only aggravates and multiplies them Wherefore we ought always to manage them by regimen as far as a man can spare the time, and not provoke a disagreeable enemy by medicines

Enough of the composite animal and of the body which is a part of him and of the manner in which a man may train and be trained by himself so as to live most according to reason and we must above and before all provide that the element which is to train him shall be the fairest and best adapted to that purpose A minute discussion of this subject would be a serious task but if, as before, I am to give only an outline, the subject may not unfitly be summed up as follows.

I have often remarked that there are three kinds of soul located within us having each of them motions and I must now repeat in the fewest words possible that one part if remaining inactive and ceasing from its natural motion must necessarily become very weak but that which is trained and exercised very strong Wherefore we should take care that the movements of the different parts [90] of the soul should be in due proportion

And we should consider that God gave the sovereign part of the human soul to be the divinity of each one being that part which as we say dwells at the top of the body and inasmuch as we are a plant not of an earthly but of a heavenly growth, raises us from earth to our kindred who are in heaven And in this we say truly for the divine power suspended the head and root of us from that place where the generation of the soul first began and thus made the whole body upright When a man is always occupied with the cravings of desire and ambition and is eagerly striving to satisfy them all his thoughts must be mortal and, as far as it is possible altogether to become such he must be mortal every whit, because he has cherished his mortal part But he who has been earnest in the love of knowledge and of true wisdom and has exercised his intellect more than any other part of him must have thoughts immortal and divine, if he attain truth and in so far as human nature is capable of sharing in immortality he must altogether be immortal and since he is ever cherishing the divine power and has the divinity within him in perfect order he will be perfectly happy Now there is only one way of taking care of things and this is to give to each the food and motion which are natural to it And the motions which are naturally akin to the divine principle within us are the thoughts and revolutions of the universe These each man should follow and correct the courses of the head which were corrupted at our birth and by learning the harmonies and revolutions of the universe should assimilate the thinking being to the thought renewing his original nature and having assimilated them should attain to that perfect life which the gods have set before mankind both for the present and the future

Thus our original design of discoursing about the universe down to the creation of man is nearly completed A brief mention may be made of the generation of other animals so far as the subject admits of brevity in this manner our argument will best attain a due proportion On the subject of animals then the following remarks may be offered Of the men who came into the world those who were cowards or led unrighteous lives may with reason be supposed to have changed into the nature of women in the second generation [91] And this was the reason why at that time the gods created in us the desire of sexual intercourse, contriving in man one animated substance, and in woman another which they formed respectively in the following manner The outlet for drink by which liquids pass through the lung under the kidneys and into the bladder which receives and then by the pressure of the air emits them was so fashioned by them as to penetrate also into the body of the marrow which passes from the head along the neck and through the back and which in the preceding discourse we have named the seed And the seed having life and becoming endowed with respiration, produces in that part in which it respires a lively desire of emission and thus creates in us the love of procreation Wherefore also in men the organ of generation becoming rebellious and masterful like an animal disobedient to reason and maddened with the sting of lust seeks to gain absolute sway and the same is the case with the so-called womb or matrix of women the animal within them is desirous of procreating children and when remaining unfruitful long beyond its proper time gets discontented and angry and wandering in every direction through the body closes up the passages of the breath and by obstructing respiration drives them to extremity causing all varieties of disease until at length the desire and love of the man and the woman bringing them together and as it were plucking the fruit from the tree, sow in the womb as in a field animals unseen by reason of their smallness and without form these again are separated and matured within they are then finally brought out into the light, and thus the generation of animals is completed

Thus were created women and the female sex in general But the race of birds was created out of innocent light minded men who although their minds were directed toward heaven imagined in their simplicity that the clearest demonstration of the things above was to be obtained by sight these were remodelled and transformed into birds and they grew feathers instead of hair The race of wild pedestrian animals, again came from those who had no philosophy in any of their thoughts and never considered at all about the nature of the heavens, because they had ceased to use the courses of the head but followed the guidance of those parts of the soul which are in the breast. In consequence of these habits of theirs they had their front legs and their heads resting upon the earth to which they were drawn by natural affinity and the crowns of their heads were elongated and of all sorts of shapes into which the courses of the soul were crushed by reason of disuse. And this was the reason why they were created quadrupeds and polypods [92] God gave the more senseless of them the more support that they might be more attracted to the earth And the most foolish of them who trail their bodies entirely upon the ground and have no longer any need of feet, he made without feet to crawl upon the earth The fourth class were the inhabitants of the water these were made out of the most entirely senseless and ignorant of all, whom the transformers did not think any longer worthy of pure respiration because they possessed a soul which was made impure by all sorts of transgression and instead of the subtle and pure medium of air they gave them the deep and muddy sea to be their element of respiration and hence arose the race of fishes and oysters, and other aquatic animals, which have received the most remote habitations as a punishment of their outlandish ignorance These are the laws by which animals pass into one another now as ever changing as they lose or gain wisdom and folly

We may now say that our discourse about the nature of the universe has an end The world has received animals mortal and immortal and is fulfilled with them, and has become a visible animal containing the visible—the sensible God who is the image of the intellectual the greatest, best fairest, most perfect—the one only begotten heaven.

CRITIAS

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE Critias Hermocrates Timaeus, Socrates

[106] Timaeus How thankful I am Socrates that I have arrived at last and like a weary traveller after a long journey may be at rest! And I pray the being who always was of old and has now been by me revealed to grant that my words may endure in so far as they have been spoken truly and acceptably to him but if unintentionally I have said anything wrong I pray that he will impose upon me a just retribution and the just retribution of him who errs is that he should be set right Wishing then to speak truly in future concerning the generation of the gods I pray him to give me knowledge which of all medicines is the most perfect and best And now having offered my prayer I deliver up the argument to Critias who is to speak next according to our agreement

Critias And I Timaeus accept the trust and as you at first said that you were going to speak of high matters, and begged that some forbearance might be shown to you I too ask the same or greater forbearance for what I am about to say And although I very well know that my request may appear to be somewhat ambitious and discourteous I must make it nevertheless [107] For will any man of sense deny that you have spoken well? I can only attempt to show that I ought to have more indulgence than you because my theme is more difficult and I shall argue that to seem to speak well of the gods to men is far easier than to speak well of men to men for the inexperience and utter ignorance of his hearers about any subject is a great assistance to him who has to speak of it, and we know how ignorant we are concerning the gods But I should like to make my meaning clearer if you will follow me All that is said by any of us can only be imitation and representation For if we consider the likenesses which painters make of bodies divine and heavenly and the different degrees of gratification with which the eye of the spectator receives them we shall see that we are satisfied with the artist who is able in any degree to imitate the earth and its mountains and the rivers and the woods and the universe and the things that are and move therein and further that knowing nothing precise about such matters we do not examine or analyze the painting all that is required is a sort of indistinct and deceptive mode of shadowing them forth But when a person endeavours to paint the human form we are quick at finding out defects and our familiar knowledge makes us severe judges of any one who does not render every point of similarity And we may observe the same thing to happen in discourse we are satisfied with a picture of divine and heavenly things which has very little likeness to them but we are more precise in our criticism of mortal and human things Wherefore if at the moment of speaking I cannot suitably express my meaning you must excuse me considering that to form approved likenesses of human things is the reverse of easy This is what I want to suggest to you [108] and at the same time to beg Socrates that I may have not less but more indulgence conceded to me in what I am about to say Which favour if I am right in asking I hope that you will be ready to grant

Socrates Certainly Critias we will grant your request and we will grant the same by anticipation to Hermocrates as well as to you and Timaeus; for I have no doubt that when his turn comes a little while hence, he will make the same request which you have made. In order, then, that he may provide himself with a fresh beginning, and not be compelled to say the same things over again, let him understand that the indulgence is already extended by anticipation to him. And now, friend Critias, I will announce to you the judgment of the theatre. They are of opinion that the last performer was wonderfully successful, and that you will need a great deal of indulgence before you will be able to take his place.

Hermocrates. The warning, Socrates, which you have addressed to him, I must also take to myself. But remember, Critias, that faint heart never yet raised a trophy; and therefore you must go and attack the argument like a man. First invoke Apollo and the Muses, and then let us hear you sound the praises and show forth the virtues of your ancient citizens.

Crit. Friend Hermocrates, you, who are stationed last and have another in front of you, have not lost heart as yet; the gravity of the situation will soon be revealed to you; meanwhile I accept your exhortations and encouragements. But besides the gods and goddesses whom you have mentioned, I would specially invoke Mnemosyne; for all the important part of my discourse is dependent on her favour, and if I can recollect and recite enough of what was said by the priests and brought hither by Solon, I doubt not that I shall satisfy the requirements of this theatre. And now, making no more excuses, I will proceed.

Let me begin by observing first of all, that nine thousand was the sum of years which had elapsed since the war which was said to have taken place between those who dwelt outside the Pillars of Heracles and all who dwelt within them; this war I am going to describe. Of the combatants on the one side, the city of Athens was reported to have been the leader and to have fought out the war; the combatants on the other side were commanded by the kings of Atlantis, which, as I was saying, was an island greater in extent than Libya and Asia, and when afterwards sunk by an earthquake, became an impassable barrier of mud to voyagers sailing from hence to any part of the ocean. [109] The progress of the history will unfold the various nations of barbarians and families of Hellenes which then existed, as they successively appear on the scene; but I must describe first of all Athenians of that day, and their enemies who fought with them, and then the respective powers and governments of the two kingdoms. Let us give the precedence to Athens.

In the days of old the gods had the whole earth distributed among them by allotment. There was no quarrelling; for you cannot rightly suppose that the gods did not know what was proper for each of them to have, or, knowing this, that they would seek to procure for themselves by contention that which more properly belonged to others. They all of them by just apportionment obtained what they wanted, and peopled their own districts; and when they had peopled them they tended us, their nurselings and possessions, as shepherds tend their flocks, excepting only that they did not use blows or bodily force, as shepherds do, but governed us like pilots from the stern of the vessel, which is an easy way of guiding animals, holding our souls by the rudder of persuasion according to their own pleasure;—thus did they guide all mortal creatures. Now different gods had their allotments in different places which they set in order. Hephaestus and Athene, who were brother and sister, and sprang from the same father, having a common nature, and being united also in the love of philosophy and art, both obtained as their common portion this land, which was naturally adapted for wisdom and virtue; and there they implanted brave children of the soil, and put into their minds the order of government; their names are preserved, but their actions have disappeared by reason of the destruction of those who received the tradition, and the lapse of ages. For when there were any survivors, as I have already said, they were men who dwelt in the mountains; and they were ignorant of the art of writing, and had heard only the names of the chiefs of the land, but very little about their actions. The names they were willing enough to give to their children; but the virtues and the laws of their predecessors, they knew only by obscure traditions; and as they themselves and their children lacked for many generations the necessaries of life, they directed their attention to the supply of their wants, and of them they conversed, [110] to the neglect of events that had happened in times long past; for mythology and the enquiry into antiquity are first introduced into cities when they begin to have leisure, and when they see that the necessaries of life have already been provided, but not before. And this is the reason why the names of the ancients have been preserved to us and not their actions. This

I infer because Solon said that the priests in their narrative of that war mentioned most of the names which are recorded prior to the time of Theseus such as Cecrops and Erechtheus, and Erichthonius and Erysichthon and the names of the women in like manner Moreover since military pursuits were then common to men and women the men of those days in accordance with the custom of the time set up a figure and image of the goddess in full armour to be a testimony that all animals which associate together male as well as female may if they please practise in common the virtue which belongs to them without distinction of sex

Now the country was inhabited in those days by various classes of citizens —there were artisans and there were husbandmen and there was also a warrior class originally set apart by divine men The latter dwelt by themselves and had all things suitable for nurture and education neither had any of them anything of their own but they regarded all that they had as common property nor did they claim to receive of the other citizens anything more than their necessary food And they practised all the pursuits which we yesterday described as those of our imaginary guardians Concerning the country the Egyptian priests said what is not only probable but manifestly true that the boundaries were in those days fixed by the Isthmus and that in the direction of the continent they extended as far as the heights of Cithaeron and Parnes the boundary line came down in the direction of the sea having the district of Oropus on the right and with the river Asopus as the limit on the left The land was the best in the world and was therefore able in those days to support a vast army raised from the surrounding people Even the remnant of Attica which now exists may compare with any region in the world for the variety and excellence of its fruits and the suitableness of its pastures to [111] every sort of animal which proves what I am saying but in those days the country was fair as now and yielded far more abundant produce How shall I establish my words? and what part of it can be truly called a remnant of the land that then was? The whole country is only a long promontory extending far into the sea away from the rest of the continent while the surrounding basin of the sea is everywhere deep in the neighbourhood of the shore Many great deluges have taken place during the nine thousand years, for that is the number of years which have elapsed since the time of which I am speaking and during all this time and through so many changes there has never been any considerable accumulation of the soil coming down from the mountains, as in other places but the earth has fallen away all round and sunk out of sight The consequence is that in comparison of what then was, there are remaining only the bones of the wasted body as they may be called as in the case of small islands all the richer and softer parts of the soil having fallen away and the mere skeleton of the land being left But in the primitive state of the country, its mountains were high hills covered with soil and the plains, as they are termed by us of Phelleus were full of rich earth and there was abundance of wood in the mountains Of this last the traces still remain for although some of the mountains now only afford sustenance to bees not so very long ago there were still to be seen roofs of timber cut from trees growing there, which were of a size sufficient to cover the largest houses and there were many other high trees cultivated by man and bearing abundance of food for cattle. Moreover the land reaped the benefit of the annual rainfall not as now losing the water which flows off the bare earth into the sea but having an abundant supply in all places and receiving it into herself and treasuring it up in the close clay soil it let off into the hollows the streams which it absorb d from the heights, providing everywhere abundant fountains and rivers of which there may still be observed sacred memorials in places where fountains once existed and this proves the truth of what I am saying

Such was the natural state of the country which was cultivated as we may well believe by true husbandmen who made husbandry their business and were lovers of honour and of a noble nature and had a soil the best in the world and abundance of water and in the heaven above an excellently attempered climate Now the city in those days was arranged on this wise In the first place the Acropolis was not as now [112] For the fact is that a single night of excessive rain washed away the earth and laid bare the rock at the same time there were earthquakes and then occurred the extraordinary inundation which was the third before the great destruction of Deucalion But in primitive times the hill of the Acropolis extended to the Eridanus and Ilissus and included the Pnyx on one side, and the Lycabettus as a boundary on the opposite side to the Pnyx, and was all well covered with soil and level at the top except in one or two places.

Outside the Acropolis and under the sides of the hill there dwelt artisans, and such of the husbandmen as were tilling the ground near; the warrior class dwelt by themselves around the temples of Athene and Hephaestus at the summit, which moreover they had enclosed with a single fence like the garden of a single house. On the north side they had dwellings in common and had erected halls for dining in winter, and had all the buildings which they needed for their common life, besides temples, but there was no adorning of them with gold and silver, for they made no use of these for any purpose; they took a middle course between meanness and ostentation, and built modest houses in which they and their children's children grew old, and they handed them down to others who were like themselves, always the same. But in summer-time they left their gardens and gymnasia and dining halls, and then the southern side of the hill was made use of by them for the same purpose. Where the Acropolis now is there was a fountain, which was choked by the earthquake, and has left only the few small streams which still exist in the vicinity, but in those days the fountain gave an abundant supply of water for all and of suitable temperature in summer and in winter. This is how they dwelt, being the guardians of their own citizens and the leaders of the Hellenes, who were their willing followers. And they took care to preserve the same number of men and women through all time, being so many as were required for warlike purposes, then as now—that is to say, about twenty thousand. Such were the ancient Athenians, and after this manner they righteously administered their own land and the rest of Hellas; they were renowned all over Europe and Asia for the beauty of their persons and for the many virtues of their souls, and of all men who lived in those days they were the most illustrious. And next, if I have not forgotten what I heard when I was a child, I will impart to you the character and origin of their adversaries. For friends should not keep their stories to themselves, but have them in common.

[113] Yet, before proceeding further in the narrative, I ought to warn you, that you must not be surprised if you should perhaps hear Hellenic names given to foreigners. I will tell you the reason of this: Solon, who was intending to use the tale for his poem, enquired into the meaning of the names, and found that the early Egyptians in writing them down had translated them into their own language, and he recovered the meaning of the several names and when copying them out again translated them into our language. My great-grandfather, Dropides, had the original writing, which is still in my possession, and was carefully studied by me when I was a child. Therefore if you hear names such as are used in this country, you must not be surprised, for I have told how they came to be introduced. The tale, which was of great length, began as follows—

I have before remarked in speaking of the allotments of the gods, that they distributed the whole earth into portions differing in extent, and made for themselves temples and instituted sacrifices. And Poseidon, receiving for his lot the island of Atlantis, begat children by a mortal woman, and settled them in a part of the island, which I will describe. Looking towards the sea, but in the centre of the whole island, there was a plain which is said to have been the fairest of all plains and very fertile. Near the plain again, and also in the centre of the island at a distance of about fifty stadia, there was a mountain not very high on any side.

In this mountain there dwelt one of the earth-born primeval men of that country, whose name was Evenor, and he had a wife named Leucippe, and they had an only daughter who was called Cleito. The maiden had already reached womanhood, when her father and mother died; Poseidon fell in love with her and had intercourse with her, and breaking the ground, inclosed the hill in which she dwelt all round, making alternate zones of sea and land larger and smaller, encircling one another; there were two of land and three of water, which he turned as with a lathe, each having its circumference equidistant every way from the centre, so that no man could get to the island, for ships and voyages were not as yet. He himself, being a god, found no difficulty in making special arrangements for the centre island, bringing up two springs of water from beneath the earth, one of warm water and the other of cold, and making every variety of food to spring up abundantly from the soil. He also begat and brought up five pairs of twin male children; and dividing the island of Atlantis into ten portions, [114] he gave to the first-born of the eldest pair his mother's dwelling and the surrounding allotment, which was the largest and best, and made him king over the rest; the others he made princes, and gave them rule over many men, and a large territory. And he named them all; the eldest, who was the first king, he named Atlas, and after him the whole island and the ocean were called Atlantic To his twin brother who was born after him and obtained as his lot the extremity of the island towards the Pillars of Heracles facing the country which is now called the region of Gades in that part of the world he gave the name which in the Hellenic language is Eumelus in the language of the country which is named after him Gadeirus Of the second pair of twins he called one Ampheres and the other Evaemon To the elder of the third pair of twins he gave the name Mneseus and Autochthon to the one who followed him Of the fourth pair of twins he called the elder Elasippus and the younger Mestor And of the fifth pair he gave to the elder the name of Azaes and to the younger that of Diaprepes All these and their descendants for many generations were the inhabitants and rulers of divers islands in the open sea and also as has been already said they held sway in our direction over the country within the Pillars as far as Egypt and Tyrrhenia

Now Atlas had a numerous and honourable family and they retained the kingdom the eldest son handing it on to his eldest for many generations and they had such an amount of wealth as was never before possessed by kings and potentates and is not likely ever to be again and they were furnished with everything which they needed both in the city and country For because of the greatness of their empire many things were brought to them from foreign countries and the island itself provided most of what was required by them for the uses of life In the first place they dug out of the earth whatever was to be found there solid as well as fusile and that which is now only a name and was then something more than a name orichalcum was dug out of the earth in many parts of the island being more precious in those days than anything except gold There was an abundance of wood for carpenter s work and sufficient maintenance for tame and wild animals Moreover there were a great number of elephants in the island [115] for as there was provision for all other sorts of animals both for those which live in lakes and marshes and rivers and also for those which live in mountains and on plains so there was for the animal which is the largest and most voracious of all Also whatever fragrant things there now are in the earth whether roots or herbage or woods or essences which distil from fruit and flower grew and thrived in that land also the fruit which admits of cultivation both the dry sort which is given us for nourishment and any other which we use for food—we call them all by the common name of pulse *and the fruits having a hard rind af*fording drinks and meats and ointments and good store of chestnuts and the like, which furnish pleasure and amusement and are fruits which spoil with keeping and the pleasant kind of dessert, with which we console ourselves after dinner when we are tired of eating —all these that sacred island which then beheld the light of the sun brought forth fair and wondrous and in infinite abundance With such blessings the earth freely furnished them meanwhile they went on constructing their temples and palaces and harbours and docks And they arranged the whole country in the following manner

First of all they bridged over the zones of sea which surrounded the ancient metropolis making a road to and from the royal palace And at the very beginning they built the palace in the habitation of the god and of their ancestors, which they continued to ornament in successive generations every king surpassing the one who went before him to the utmost of his power until they made the building a marvel to behold for size and for beauty And beginning from the sea they bored a canal of three hundred feet in width and one hundred feet in depth and fifty stadia in length which they carried through to the outermost zone making a passage from the sea up to this which became a harbour and leaving an opening sufficient to enable the largest vessels to find ingress Moreover they divided at the bridges the zones of land which parted the zones of sea leaving room for a single trireme to pass out of one zone into another and they covered over the channels so as to leave a way underneath for the ships for the banks were raised considerably above the water Now the largest of the zones into which a passage was cut from the sea was three stadia in breadth and the zone of land which came next of equal breadth but the next two zones the one of water the other of land were two stadia and the one which surrounded the central island was a stadium only in width [116] The island in which the palace was situated had a diameter of five stadia All this including the zones and the bridge, which was the sixth part of a stadium in width they surrounded by a stone wall on every side placing towers and gates on the bridges where the sea passed in The stone which was used in the work they quarried from underneath the centre island and from underneath the zones on the outer as well as the inner side One kind was white, another black and a third red and as they quarried, they at the same time hollowed out double docks having roofs formed out of the native rock. Some of their buildings were simple, but in others they put together different stones, varying the colour to please the eye, and to be a natural source of delight The entire circuit of the wall which went round the outermost zone, they covered with a coating of brass, and the circuit of the next wall they coated with tin, and the third which encompassed the citadel, flashed with the red light of orichalcum

The palaces in the interior of the citadel were constructed on this wise —in the centre was a holy temple dedicated to Cleito and Poseidon, which remained inaccessible and was surrounded by an enclosure of gold this was the spot where the family of the ten princes first saw the light, and thither the people annually brought the fruits of the earth in their season from all the ten portions to be an offering to each of the ten. Here was Poseidon s own temple which was a stadium in length, and half a stadium in width and of a proportionate height, having a strange barbaric appearance. All the outside of the temple, with the exception of the pinnacles, they covered with silver and the pinnacles with gold In the interior of the temple the roof was of ivory curiously wrought everywhere with gold and silver and orichalcum and all the other parts, the walls and pillars and floor they coated with orichalcum In the temple they placed statues of gold there was the god himself standing in a chariot—the charioteer of six winged horses—and of such a size that he touched the roof of the building with his head around him there were a hundred Nereids riding on dolphins for such was thought to be the number of them by the men of those days There were also in the interior of the temple other images which had been dedicated by private persons. And around the temple on the outside were placed statues of gold of all the descendants of the ten kings and of their wives and there were many other great offerings of kings and of private persons coming both from the city itself and from the foreign cities over which they held sway There was an altar too which in size and workmanship corresponded to this magnificence, [117] and the palaces in like manner answered to the greatness of the kingdom and the glory of the temple

In the next place they had fountains one of cold and another of hot water in gracious plen*ty flowing* and they were wonderfully adapted for use by reason of the pleasantness and excellence of their waters They constructed buildings about them and planted suitable trees also they made cisterns, some open to the heavens, others roofed over to be used in winter as warm baths there were the kings baths, and the baths of private persons which were kept apart and there were separate baths for women, and for horses and cattle, and to each of them they gave as much adornment as was suitable. Of the water which ran off they carried some to the grove of Poseidon, where were growing all manner of trees of wonderful height and beauty owing to the excellence of the soil while the remainder was conveyed by aqueducts along the bridges to the outer circles and there were many temples built and dedicated to many gods also gardens and places of exercise, some for men, and others for horses in both of the two islands formed by the zones and in the centre of the larger of the two there was set apart a race-course of a stadium in width, and in length allowed to extend all round the island, for horses to race in. Also there were guardhouses at intervals for the guards, the more trusted of whom were appointed to keep watch in the lesser zone, which was nearer the Acropolis while the most trusted of all had houses given them within the citadel near the persons of the kings The docks were full of triremes and naval stores, and all things were quite ready for use Enough of the plan of the royal palace

Leaving the palace and passing out across the three harbours you came to a wall which began at the sea and went all round this was everywhere distant fifty stadia from the largest zone or harbour and enclosed the whole the ends meeting at the mouth of the channel which led to the sea The entire area was densely crowded with habitations and the canal and the largest of the harbours were full of vessels and merchants coming from all parts who from their numbers kept up a multitudinous sound of human voices, and din and clatter of all sorts night and day

I have described the city and the environs of the ancient palace nearly in the words of Solon, and now I must endeavour to represent to you the nature and arrangement of the rest of the land [118] The whole country was said by him to be very lofty and precipitous on the side of the sea but the country immediately about and surrounding the city was a level plain itself surrounded by mountains which descended towards the sea it was smooth and even and of an oblong shape extending in one direction three thousand stadia but across the centre inland it was two thousand stadia This part of the island looked towards the south and was sheltered from the north The surrounding mountains were celebrated for their number and size and beauty far beyond any which still exist having in them also many wealthy villages of country folk and rivers and lakes and meadows supplying food enough for every animal wild or tame and much wood of various sorts abundant for each and every kind of work

I will now describe the plain as it was fashioned by nature and by the labours of many generations of kings through long ages It was for the most part rectangular and oblong and where falling out of the straight line followed the circular ditch The depth and width and length of this ditch were incredible and gave the impression that a work of such extent in addition to so many others could never have been artificial Nevertheless I must say what I was told It was excavated to the depth of a hundred feet and its breadth was a stadium everywhere it was carried round the whole of the plain, and was ten thousand stadia in length It received the streams which came down from the mountains and winding round the plain and meeting at the city was there let off into the sea Further inland likewise straight canals of a hundred feet in width were cut from it through the plain and again let off into the ditch leading to the sea these canals were at intervals of a hundred stadia and by them they brought down the wood from the mountains to the city and conveyed the fruits of the earth in ships cutting transverse passages from one canal into another, and to the city Twice in the year they gathered the fruits of the earth—in winter having the benefit of the rains of heaven and in summer the water which the land supplied by introducing streams from the canals

As to the population each of the lots in the plain had to find a leader for the men who were fit for military service [119] and the size of a lot was a square of ten stadia each way and the total number of all the lots was sixty thousand And of the inhabitants of the mountains and of the rest of the country there was also a vast multitude which was distributed among the lots and had leaders assigned to them according to their districts and villages The leader was required to furnish for the war the sixth portion of a war-chariot, so as to make up a total of ten thousand chariots also two horses and riders for them and a pair of chariot horses without a seat, accompanied by a horseman who could fight on foot carrying a small shield, and having a charioteer who stood behind the man at arms to guide the two horses also, he was bound to furnish two heavy armed soldiers, two archers two slingers three stone shooters and three javelin men who were light armed, and four sailors to make up the complement of twelve hundred ships Such was the military order of the royal city—the order of the other nine governments varied and it would be wearisome to recount their several differences.

As to offices and honours the following was the arrangement from the first. Each of the ten kings in his own division and in his own city had the absolute control of the citizens, and in most cases of the laws punishing and slaying whomsoever he would Now the order of precedence among them and their mutual relations were regulated by the commands of Poseidon which the law had handed down These were inscribed by the first kings on a pillar of orichalcum which was situated in the middle of the island at the temple of Poseidon whither the kings were gathered together every fifth and every sixth year alternately thus giving equal honour to the odd and to the even number And when they were gathered together they consulted about their common interests, and enquired if any one had transgressed in anything and passed judgment and before they passed judgment they gave their pledges to one another on this wise —There were bulls who had the range of the temple of Poseidon and the ten kings being left alone in the temple, after they had offered prayers to the god that they might capture the victim which was acceptable to him hunted the bulls without weapons but with staves and nooses and the bull which they caught they led up to the pillar and cut its throat over the top of it so that the blood fell upon the sacred inscription Now on the pillar besides the laws there was inscribed an oath invoking mighty curses on the disobedient. When therefore after slaying the bull in the accustomed manner they had burnt its limbs, they filled a bowl of wine and cast in a clot of blood for each of them [120] the rest of the victim they put in the fire after having purified the column all round Then they drew from the bowl in golden cups and pouring a libation on the fire they swore that they would judge according to the laws on the pillar and would punish him who in any point had already transgressed them, and that for the future they would not, if they could help offend against the writing on the pillar and would neither command others, nor obey any ruler who commanded them, to act otherwise than according to the laws of their father Poseidon This was the prayer which each of them offered up for himself and for his descendants, at the same time drinking and dedicating the cup out of which he drank in the temple of the god and after they had supped and satisfied their needs, when darkness came on, and the fire about the sacrifice was cool, all of them put on most beautiful azure robes, and sitting on the ground at night, over the embers of the sacrifices by which they had sworn and extinguishing all the fire about the temple, they received and gave judgment, if any of them had an accusation to bring against any one and when they had given judgment, at daybreak they wrote down their sentences on a golden tablet, and dedicated it together with their robes to be a memorial

There were many special laws affecting the several kings inscribed about the temples, but the most important was the following They were not to take up arms against one another and they were all to come to the rescue if any one in any of their cities attempted to overthrow the royal house like their ancestors, they were to deliberate in common about war and other matters giving the supremacy to the descendants of Atlas And the king was not to have the power of life and death over any of his kinsmen unless he had the assent of the majority of the ten

Such was the vast power which the god settled in the lost island of Atlantis and this he afterwards directed against our land for the following reasons as tradition tells For many generations as long as the divine nature lasted in them, they were obedient to the laws, and well affectioned towards the god whose seed they were for they possessed true and in every way great spirits, uniting gentleness with wisdom in the various chances of life and in their intercourse with one another They despised everything but virtue caring little for their present state of life and thinking lightly of the possession of gold and other property which seemed only a burden to them neither were they intoxicated by luxury nor did wealth deprive them of their self-control [121] but they were sober and saw clearly that all these goods are increased by virtue and friendship with one another whereas by too great regard and respect for them they are lost and friendship with them By such reflections and by the continuance in them of a divine nature the qualities which we have described grew and increased among them but when the divine portion began to fade away and became diluted too often and too much with the mortal admixture, and the human nature got the upper hand they then being unable to bear their fortune behaved unseemly and to him who had an eye to see, grew visibly debased for they were losing the fairest of their precious gifts but to those who had no eye to see the true happiness, they appeared glorious and blessed at the very time when they were full of avarice and unrighteous power Zeus, the god of gods who rules according to law and is able to see into such things, perceiving that an honourable race was in a woeful plight, and wanting to inflict punishment on them, that they might be chastened and improve, collected all the gods into their most holy habitation which being placed in the centre of the world beholds all created things And when he had called them together he spake as follows—

The fragment Critias thus breaks off in the middle of a sentence.

PARMENIDES

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE CEPHALUS ADEIMANTUS GLAUCON ANTIPHON PYTHODORUS SOCRATES, ZENO PARMENIDES ARISTOTELES Cephalus rehearses a dialogue which is supposed to have been narrated in his presence by Antiphon the half brother of Adeimantus and Glaucon to certain Clazomenians

[126] WE had come from our home at Clazomenae to Athens and met Adeimantus and Glaucon in the Agora Welcome Cephalus said Adeimantus taking me by the hand is there anything which we can do for you in Athens?

Yes that is why I am here I wish to ask a favour of you

What may that be? he said

I want you to tell me the name of your half brother which I have forgotten he was a mere child when I last came hither from Clazomenae, but that was a long time ago his father s name if I remember rightly was Pyrilampes?

Yes he said and the name of our brother Antiphon but why do you ask?

Let me introduce some countrymen of mine I said they are lovers of philosophy and have heard that Antiphon was intimate with a certain Pythodorus a friend of Zeno and remembers a conversation which took place between Socrates Zeno and Parmenides many years ago Pythodorus having often recited it to him

Quite true

And could we hear it? I asked

Nothing easier he replied when he was a youth he made a careful study of the piece at present his thoughts run in another direction like his grandfather Antiphon he is devoted to horses But if that is what you want let us go and look for him he dwells at Melita which is quite near and he has only just left us to go home

[127] Accordingly we went to look for him he was at home and in the act of giving a bridle to a smith to be fitted When he had done with the smith his brothers told him the purpose of our visit and he saluted me as an acquaintance whom he remembered from my former visit and we asked him to repeat the dialogue At first he was not very willing and complained of the trouble but at length he consented He told us that Pythodorus had described to him the appearance of Parmenides and Zeno they came to Athens as he said at the great Panathenaea the former was at the time of his visit, about 65 years old very white with age but well favoured Zeno was nearly 40 years of age tall and fair to look upon in the days of his youth he was reported to have been beloved by Parmenides He said that they lodged with Pythodorus in the Ceramicus, outside the wall whither Socrates then a very young man came to see them and many others with him they wanted to hear the writings of Zeno which had been brought to Athens for the first time on the occasion of their visit These Zeno himself read to them in the absence of Parmenides and had very nearly finished when Pythodorus entered and with him Parmenides and Aristoteles who was afterwards one of the Thirty and heard the little that remained of the dialogue Pythodorus had heard Zeno repeat them before

ment might be read over again and thus having been done, he said What is your meaning, Zeno? Do you maintain that if being is many it must be both like and unlike, and that this is impossible, for neither can the like be unlike, nor the unlike like—is that your position?

Just so, said Zeno

And if the unlike cannot be like or the like unlike, then according to you, being could not be many for this would involve an impossibility In all that you say have you any other purpose except to disprove the being of the many? and is not each division of your treatise intended to furnish a separate proof of this there being in all as many proofs of the not-being of the many as you have composed arguments? Is that your meaning, or have I misunderstood you?

[128] No said Zeno you have correctly understood my general purpose.

I see, Parmenides, said Socrates, that Zeno would like to be not only one with you in friendship but your second self in his writings too he puts what you say in another way and would fain make believe that he is telling us something which is new For you, in your poems, say The All is one, and of this you adduce excellent proofs and he on the other hand says There is no many and on behalf of this he offers overwhelming evidence. You affirm unity he denies plurality And so you deceive the world into believing that you are saying different things when really you are saying much the same. This is a strain of art beyond the reach of most of us.

Yes, Socrates, said Zeno But although you are as keen as a Spartan hound in pursuing the track, you do not fully apprehend the true motive of the composition, which is not really such an artificial work as you imagine for what you speak of was an accident there was no pretence of a great purpose nor any serious intention of deceiving the world The truth is that these writings of mine were meant to protect the arguments of Parmenides against those who make fun of him and seek to show the many ridiculous and contradictory results which they suppose to follow from the affirmation of the one. My answer is addressed to the partisans of the many whose attack I return with interest by retorting upon them that their hypothesis of the being of many if carried out, appears to be still more ridiculous than the hypothesis of the being of one Zeal for my master led me to write the book in the days of my youth but some one stole the copy and therefore I had no choice whether it should be published or not the motive, however of writing was not the ambition of an elder man but the pugnacity of a young one This you do not seem to see Socrates though in other respects, as I was saying your notion is a very just one.

I understand, said Socrates, and quite accept your account But tell me, Zeno do you not further think that there is an idea of likeness in itself [129] and another idea of unlikeness, which is the opposite of likeness and that in these two you and I and all other things to which we apply the term many participate—things which participate in likeness become in that degree and manner like and so far as they participate in unlikeness become in that degree unlike, or both like and unlike in the degree in which they participate in both? And may not all things partake of both opposites, and be both like and unlike, by reason of this participation?—Where is the wonder? Now if a person could prove the absolute like to become unlike or the absolute unlike to become like, that, in my opinion would indeed be a wonder but there is nothing extraordinary Zeno in showing that the things which only partake of likeness and unlikeness experience both Nor again, if a person were to show that all is one by partaking of one, and at the same time many by partaking of many would that be very astonishing But if he were to show me that the absolute one was many or the absolute many one, I should be truly amazed And so of all the rest I should be surprised to hear that the natures or ideas themselves had these opposite qualities but not if a person wanted to prove of me that I was many and also one When he wanted to show that I was many he would say that I have a right and a left side, and a front and a back and an upper and a lower half for I cannot deny that I partake of multitude when on the other hand he wants to prove that I am one, he will say that we who are here assembled are seven and that I am one and partake of the one In both instances he proves his case So again if a person shows that such things as wood stones and the like, being many are also one, we admit that he shows the coexistence of the one and many but he does not show that the many are one or the one many he is uttering not a paradox but a truism If however as I just now suggested some one were to abstract simple notions of like unlike, one many rest, motion and similar ideas, and then to show that these admit of admixture and separation in themselves, I should be very much astonished This part of the argument appears to be treated by you Zeno in a very spirited manner but as I was saying, I should be far more amazed if any one found in the ideas themselves which are [130] apprehended by reason the same puzzle and entanglement which you have shown to exist in visible objects

While Socrates was speaking Pythodorus thought that Parmenides and Zeno were not altogether pleased at the successive steps of the argument but still they gave the closest attention and often looked at one another and smiled as if in admiration of him When he had finished Parmenides expressed their feelings in the following words —

Socrates he said I admire the bent of your mind towards philosophy tell me now was this your own distinction between ideas in themselves and the things which partake of them? and do you think that there is an idea of likeness apart from the likeness which we possess, and of the one and many and of the other things which Zeno mentioned?

I think that there are such ideas said Socrates

Parmenides proceeded And would you also make absolute ideas of the just and the beautiful and the good and of all that class?

Yes he said I should

And would you make an idea of man apart from us and from all other human creatures or of fire and water?

I am often undecided Parmenides as to whether I ought to include them or not

And would you feel equally undecided Socrates about things of which the mention may provoke a smile?—I mean such things as hair mud dirt or anything else which is vile and paltry would you suppose that each of these has an idea distinct from the actual objects with which we come into contact or not?

Certainly not, said Socrates visible things like these are such as they appear to us and I am afraid that there would be an absurdity in assuming any idea of them although I sometimes get disturbed and begin to think that there is nothing without an idea but then again when I have taken up this position I run away, because I am afraid that I may fall into a bottomless pit of nonsense and perish and so I return to the ideas of which I was just now speaking and occupy myself with them

Yes, Socrates said Parmenides that is because you are still young the time will come, if I am not mistaken when philosophy will have a firmer grasp of you, and then you will not despise even the meanest things at your age you are too much disposed to regard the opinions of men But I should like to know whether you mean that there are certain ideas of which all other things partake and from which they derive their names [131] that similars for example become similar because they partake of similarity and great things become great because they partake of greatness and that just and beautiful things become just and beautiful because they partake of justice and beauty?

Yes, certainly said Socrates that is my meaning

Then each individual partakes either of the whole of the idea or else of a part of the idea? Can there be any other mode of participation?

There cannot be he said

Then do you think that the whole idea is one, and yet, being one, is in each one of the many?

Why not Parmenides? said Socrates

Because one and the same thing will exist as a whole at the same time in many separate individuals and will therefore be in a state of separation from itself

Nay but the idea may be like the day which is one and the same in many places at once and yet continuous with itself in this way each idea may be one and the same in all at the same time.

I like your way, Socrates of making one in many places at once You mean to say that if I were to spread out a sail and cover a number of men there would be one whole including many —is not that your meaning?

I think so

And would you say that the whole sail includes each man or a part of it only and different parts different men?

The latter

Then Socrates the ideas themselves will be divisible and things which participate in them will have a part of them only and not the whole idea existing in each of them?

That seems to follow

Then would you like to say Socrates that the one idea is really divisible and yet remains one?

Certainly not, he said

Suppose that you divide absolute greatness and that of the many great things each one is great in virtue of a portion of greatness less than absolute greatness—is that conceivable?

No

Or will each equal thing if possessing some small portion of equality less than absolute equality be equal to some other thing by virtue of that portion only?

Impossible

Or suppose one of us to have a portion of smallness: this is but a part of the small; and therefore the absolutely small is greater; if the absolutely small be greater, that to which the part of the small is added will be smaller and not greater than before.

How absurd!

Then in what way, Socrates, will all things participate in the ideas, if they are unable to participate in them either as parts or wholes?

Indeed, he said, you have asked a question which is not easily answered.

Well, said Parmenides, and what do you say of another question?

What question?

I imagine that the way in which you are led to assume one idea of each kind is as follows: [132]—You see a number of great objects, and when you look at them there seems to you to be one and the same idea (or nature) in them all; hence you conceive of greatness as one.

Very true, said Socrates.

And if you go on and allow your mind in like manner to embrace in one view the idea of greatness and of great things which are not the idea, and to compare them, will not another greatness arise, which will appear to be the source of all these?

It would seem so.

Then another idea of greatness now comes into view over and above absolute greatness, and the individuals which partake of it; and then another, over and above all these, by virtue of which they will all be great, and so each idea instead of being one will be infinitely multiplied.

But may not the ideas, asked Socrates, be thoughts only, and have no proper existence except in our minds, Parmenides? For in that case each idea may still be one, and not experience this infinite multiplication.

And can there be individual thoughts which are thoughts of nothing?

Impossible, he said.

The thought must be of something?

Yes.

Of something which is or which is not?

Of something which is.

Must it not be of a single something, which the thought recognizes as attaching to all, being a single form or nature?

Yes.

And will not the something which is apprehended as one and the same in all, be an idea?

From that, again, there is no escape.

Then, said Parmenides, if you say that everything else participates in the ideas, must you not say either that everything is made up of thoughts, and that all things think; or that they are thoughts but have no thought?

The latter view, Parmenides, is no more rational than the previous one. In my opinion, the ideas are, as it were, patterns fixed in nature, and other things are like them, and resemblances of them—what is meant by the participation of other things in the ideas, is really assimilation to them.

But if, said he, the individual is like the idea, must not the idea also be like the individual, in so far as the individual is a resemblance of the idea? That which is like, cannot be conceived of as other than the like of like.

Impossible.

And when two things are alike, must they not partake of the same idea?

They must.

And will not that of which the two partake, and which makes them alike, be the idea itself?

Certainly.

Then the idea cannot be like the individual, or the individual like the idea; for if they are alike, some further idea of likeness will always be coming to light, [133] and if that be like anything else, another; and new ideas will be always arising, if the idea resembles that which partakes of it?

Quite true.

The theory, then, that other things participate in the ideas by resemblance, has to be given up, and some other mode of participation devised?

It would seem so.

Do you see then, Socrates, how great is the difficulty of affirming the ideas to be absolute?

Yes, indeed.

And, further, let me say that as yet you only understand a small part of the difficulty which is involved if you make of each thing a single idea, parting it off from other things.

What difficulty? he said.

There are many, but the greatest of all is this:—If an opponent argues that these ideas, being such as we say they ought to be, must remain unknown, no one can prove to him that he is wrong, unless he who denies their existence be a man of great ability and knowledge, and is willing to follow a long and laborious demonstration; he will remain unconvinced, and still insist that they cannot be known.

What do you mean, Parmenides? said Socrates.

In the first place, I think, Socrates, that you or any one who maintains the existence of ab-soluteessences will admit that they cannot exist in us

No, said Socrates for then they would be no longer absolute

True he said and therefore when ideas are what they are in relation to one another their essence is determined by a relation among them selves and has nothing to do with the resem blances or whatever they are to be termed, which are in our sphere, and from which we receive this or that name when we partake of them And the things which are within our sphere and have the same names with them are likewise only relative to one another and not to the ideas which have the same names with them but belong to themselves and not to them

What do you mean? said Socrates

I may illustrate my meaning in this way said Parmenides —A master has a slave now there is nothing absolute in the relation between them which is simply a relation of one man to anoth er But there is also an idea of mastership in the abstract which is relative to the idea of slavery in the abstract [134] These natures have noth ing to do with us nor we with them they are concerned with themselves only and we with ourselves Do you see my meaning?

Yes said Socrates I quite see your meaning

And will not knowledge—I mean absolute knowledge—answer to absolute truth?

Certainly

And each kind of absolute knowledge will answer to each kind of absolute being?

Yes

But the knowledge which we have will an swer to the truth which we have and again each kind of knowledge which we have will be a knowledge of each kind of being which we have?

Certainly

But the ideas themselves as you admit we have not and cannot have?

No we cannot

And the absolute natures or kinds are known severally by the absolute idea of knowledge?

Yes

And we have not got the idea of knowledge?

No

Then none of the ideas are known to us be cause we have no share in absolute knowledge?

I suppose not

Then the nature of the beautiful in itself and of the good in itself and all other ideas which we suppose to exist absolutely are unknown to us?

It would seem so

I think that there is a stranger consequence still

What is it?

Would you or would you not say, that ab solute knowledge if there is such a thing must be a far more exact knowledge than our knowledge and the same of beauty and of the rest?

Yes

And if there be such a thing as participation in absolute knowledge no one is more likely than God to have this most exact knowledge?

Certainly

But then will God having absolute knowl edge have a knowledge of human things?

Why not?

Because Socrates said Parmenides we have admitted that the ideas are not valid in relation to human things nor human things in relation to them the relations of either are limited to their respective spheres

Yes that has been admitted

And if God has this perfect authority and perfect knowledge his authority cannot rule us, nor his knowledge know us or any human thing just as our authority does not extend to the gods nor our knowledge know anything which is divine so by parity of reason they be ing gods are not our masters neither do they know the things of men

Yet surely said Socrates to deprive God of knowledge is monstrous

[135] These Socrates said Parmenides are a few and only a few of the difficulties in which we are involved if ideas really are and we deter mine each one of them to be an absolute unity He who hears what may be said against them will deny the very existence of them—and even if they do exist he will say that they must of ne cessity be unknown to man and he will seem to have reason on his side and as we were re marking just now will be very difficult to con vince a man must be gifted with very consider able ability before he can learn that everything has a class and an absolute essence and still more remarkable will he be who discovers all these things for himself and having thorough ly investigated them is able to teach them to others

I agree with you Parmenides said Socrates and what you say is very much to my mind

And yet Socrates said Parmenides if a man fixing his attention on these and the like diffi culties does away with ideas of things and will not admit that every individual thing has its own determinate idea which is always one and the same, he will have nothing on which his mind can rest and so he will utterly destroy the power of reasoning, as you seem to me to have particularly noted.

Very true, he said

But, then, what is to become of philosophy? Whither shall we turn, if the ideas are unknown?

I certainly do not see my way at present.

Yes, said Parmenides and I think that this arises, Socrates, out of your attempting to define the beautiful, the just, the good, and the ideas generally without sufficient previous training. I noticed your deficiency when I heard you talking here with your friend Aristoteles, the day before yesterday The impulse that carries you towards philosophy is assuredly noble and divine but there is an art which is called by the vulgar idle talking, and which is often imagined to be useless in that you must train and exercise yourself, now that you are young or truth will elude your grasp

And what is the nature of this exercise, Parmenides, which you would recommend?

That which you heard Zeno practising at the same time, I give you credit for saying to him that you did not care to examine the perplexity in reference to visible things, or to consider the question in that way but only in reference to objects of thought, and to what may be called ideas.

Why yes, he said, there appears to me to be no difficulty in showing by this method that visible things are like and unlike and may experience anything.

Quite true, said Parmenides but I think that you should go a step further and consider not only the consequences which flow from a given hypothesis, [136] but also the consequences which flow from denying the hypothesis and that will be still better training for you.

What do you mean he said

I mean, for example, that in the case of this very hypothesis of Zeno's about the many you should inquire not only what will be the consequences to the many in relation to themselves and to the one, and to the one in relation to itself and the many on the hypothesis of the being of the many but also what will be the consequences to the one and the many in their relation to themselves and to each other on the opposite hypothesis. Or again, if likeness is or is not, what will be the consequences in either of these cases to the subjects of the hypothesis, and to other things, in relation both to themselves and to one another and so of unlikeness and the same holds good of motion and rest, of generation and destruction, and even of being and not-being In a word, when you suppose any thing to be or not to be, or to be in any way affected, you must look at the consequences in relation to the thing itself and to any other things which you choose—to each of them singly to more than one, and to all and so of other things, you must look at them in relation to themselves and to anything else which you suppose either to be or not to be, if you would train yourself perfectly and see the real truth.

That, Parmenides, is a tremendous business of which you speak, and I do not quite understand you will you take some hypothesis and go through the steps?—then I shall apprehend you better

That, Socrates, is a serious task to impose on a man of my years.

Then will you, Zeno? said Socrates.

Zeno answered with a smile —Let us make our petition to Parmenides himself, who is quite right in saying that you are hardly aware of the extent of the task which you are imposing on him and if there were more of us I should not ask him for these are not subjects which any one, especially at his age, can well speak of before a large audience most people are not aware that this round about progress through all things is the only way in which the mind can attain truth and wisdom And therefore, Parmenides, I join in the request of Socrates, that I may hear the process again which I have not heard for a long time.

When Zeno had thus spoken Pythodorus, according to Antiphon's report of him, said, that he himself and Aristoteles and the whole company entreated Parmenides to give an example of the process [137] I cannot refuse, said Parmenides and yet I feel rather like Ibycus, who, when in his old age, against his will, he fell in love, compared himself to an old racehorse, who was about to run in a chariot race, shaking with fear at the course he knew so well—this was his simile of himself And I also experience a trembling when I remember through what an ocean of words I have to wade at my time of life But I must indulge you, as Zeno says that I ought, and we are alone. Where shall I begin? And what shall be our first hypothesis if I am to attempt this laborious pastime? Shall I begin with myself, and take my own hypothesis of the one? and consider the consequences which follow on the supposition either of the being or of the not being of one?

By all means said Zeno

And who will answer me? he said Shall I propose the youngest? He will not make difficulties and will be the most likely to say what he thinks, and his answers will give me time to breathe

I am the one whom you mean Parmenides said Aristoteles for I am the youngest and at your service Ask and I will answer

Parmenides proceeded If one is he said the one cannot be many?

Impossible

Then the one cannot have parts and cannot be a whole?

Why not?

Because every part is part of a whole is it not?

Yes

And what is a whole? would not that of which no part is wanting be a whole?

Certainly

Then, in either case the one would be made up of parts, both as being a whole and also as having parts?

To be sure

And in either case the one would be many and not one?

True

But surely it ought to be one and not many?

It ought

Then if the one is to remain one it will not be a whole and will not have parts?

No

But if it has no parts it will have neither beginning middle nor end for these would of course be parts of it

Right

But then again a beginning and an end are the limits of everything?

Certainly

Then the one having neither beginning nor end is unlimited?

Yes unlimited

And therefore formless for it cannot partake either of round or straight

But why?

Why because the round is that of which all the extreme points are equidistant from the centre?

Yes

And the straight is that of which the centre intercepts the view of the extremes?

True

[138] Then the one would have parts and would be many if it partook either of a straight or of a circular form?

Assuredly

But having no parts it will be neither straight nor round?

Right

And being of such a nature it cannot be in any place, for it cannot be either in another or in itself

How so?

Because if it were in another it would be encircled by that in which it was and would touch it at many places and with many parts but that which is one and indivisible, and does not partake of a circular nature cannot be touched all round in many places

Certainly not

But if on the other hand one were in itself it would also be contained by nothing else but itself that is to say, if it were really in itself for nothing can be in anything which does not contain it

Impossible

But then that which contains must be other than that which is contained? for the same whole cannot do and suffer both at once and if so one will be no longer one but two?

True

Then one cannot be anywhere either in itself or in another?

No

Further consider whether that which is of such a nature can have either rest or motion

Why not?

Why because the one if it were moved would be either moved in place or changed in nature for these are the only kinds of motion

Yes

And the one when it changes and ceases to be itself cannot be any longer one

It cannot

It cannot therefore experience the sort of motion which is change of nature?

Clearly not

Then can the motion of the one be in place?

Perhaps

But if the one moved in place must it not either move round and round in the same place or from one place to another?

It must

And that which moves in a circle must rest upon a centre and that which goes round upon a centre must have parts which are different from the centre but that which has no centre and no parts cannot possibly be carried round upon a centre?

Impossible.

But perhaps the motion of the one consists in change of place?

Perhaps so if it moves at all

And have we not already shown that it can not be in anything?

Yes.

Then its coming into being in anything is still more impossible is it not?

I do not see why

Why because anything which comes into being in anything can neither as yet be in that other thing while still coming into being nor be altogether out of it, if already coming into being in it.

Certainly not.

And therefore whatever comes into being in another must have parts and then one part may be in, and another part out of that other but that which has no parts can never be at one and the same time neither wholly within nor wholly without anything

True.

And is there not a still greater impossibility in that which has no parts, and is not a whole coming into being anywhere, since it cannot come into being either as a part or as a whole?

Clearly

Then it does not change place by revolving in the same spot, nor by going somewhere and coming into being in something nor again by change in itself?

Very true

Then in respect of any kind of motion the one is immoveable?

Immoveable

But neither can the one be in anything as we affirm?

Yes, we said so

Then it is never in the same?

Why not?

Because if it were in the same it would be in something

Certainly

And we said that it could not be in itself, and could not be in other?

True

Then one is never in the same place?

It would seem not

But that which is never in the same place is never quiet or at rest?

Never

One then as would seem is neither at rest nor in motion

It certainly appears so

Neither will it be the same with itself or other nor again other than itself or other

How is that?

If other than itself it would be other than one, and would not be one

True

And if the same with other it would be that other and not itself so that upon this supposition too it would not have the nature of one, but would be other than one?

It would

Then it will not be the same with other or other than itself?

It will not

Neither will it be other than other while it remains one for not one but only other can be other than other and nothing else.

True.

Then not by virtue of being one will it be other?

Certainly not

But if not by virtue of being one not by virtue of itself and if not by virtue of itself not itself and itself not being other at all will not be other than anything?

Right.

Neither will one be the same with itself

How not?

Surely the nature of the one is not the nature of the same

Why not?

It is not when anything becomes the same with anything that it becomes one

What of that?

Anything which becomes the same with the many necessarily becomes many and not one.

True.

But, if there were no difference between the one and the same when a thing became the same it would always become one and when it became one, the same?

Certainly

And therefore, if one be the same with itself it is not one with itself and will therefore be one and also not one.

Surely that is impossible

And therefore the one can neither be other than other nor the same with itself

Impossible.

And thus the one can neither be the same, nor other either in relation to itself or other?

No

Neither will the one be like anything or unlike itself or other

Why not?

Because likeness is sameness of affections.

Yes.

And sameness has been shown to be of a nature distinct from oneness?

That has been shown

[140] But if the one had any other affection than that of being one it would be affected in such a way as to be more than one which is impossible

True

Then the one can never be so affected as to be the same either with another or with itself?

Clearly not

Then it cannot be like another or like itself?

No

Nor can it be affected so as to be other for then it would be affected in such a way as to be more than one

It would

That which is affected otherwise than itself or another will be unlike itself or another for sameness of affections is likeness

True

But the one as appears never being affected otherwise is never unlike itself or other?

Never

Then the one will never be either like or unlike itself or other?

Plainly not

Again being of this nature it can neither be equal nor unequal either to itself or to other

How is that?

Why because the one if equal must be of the same measures as that to which it is equal

True

And if greater or less than things which are commensurable with it the one will have more measures than that which is less and fewer than that which is greater?

Yes

And so of things which are not commensurate with it the one will have greater measures than that which is less and smaller than that which is greater

Certainly

But how can that which does not partake of sameness have either the same measures or have anything else the same?

Impossible

And not having the same measures the one cannot be equal either with itself or with another?

It appears so

But again whether it have fewer or more measures it will have as many parts as it has measures and thus again the one will be no longer one but will have as many parts as measures

Right

And if it were of one measure it would be equal to that measure yet it has been shown to be incapable of equality

It has

Then it will neither partake of one measure nor of many nor of few nor of the same at all nor be equal to itself or another nor be greater or less than itself or other?

Certainly

Well and do we suppose that one can be older or younger than anything or of the same age with it?

Why not?

Why, because that which is of the same age with itself or other must partake of equality or likeness of time and we said that the one did not partake either of equality or of likeness?

We did say so

And we also said that it did not partake of inequality or unlikeness

[141] Very true

How then can one being of this nature be either older or younger than anything or have the same age with it?

In no way

Then one cannot be older or younger or of the same age either with itself or with an other?

Clearly not.

Then the one being of this nature cannot be in time at all for must not that which is in time be always growing older than itself?

Certainly

And that which is older must always be older than something which is younger?

True

Then that which becomes older than itself also becomes at the same time younger than itself if it is to have something to become older than

What do you mean?

I mean this —A thing does not need to become different from another thing which is already different it is different, and if its different has become it has become different if its different will be it will be different but of that which is becoming different there cannot have been or be about to be or yet be, a different—the only different possible is one which is becoming

That is inevitable

But surely the elder is a difference relative to the younger and to nothing else

True

Then that which becomes older than itself

must also, at the same time, become younger than itself?

Yes.

But again, it is true that it cannot become for a longer or for a shorter time than itself, but it must become, and be, and have become, and be about to be, for the same time with itself?

That again is inevitable.

Then things which are in time, and partake of time, must in every case, I suppose, be of the same age with themselves and must also become at once older and younger than themselves?

Yes.

But the one did not partake of those affections?

Not at all.

Then it does not partake of time, and is not in any time?

So the argument shows.

Well, but do not the expressions "was," and "has become," and "was becoming," signify a participation of past time?

Certainly.

And do not "will be," "will become," "will have become," signify a participation of future time?

Yes.

And "is," or "becomes," signifies a participation of present time?

Certainly.

And if the one is absolutely without participation in time, it never had become, or was becoming, or was at any time, or is now become or is becoming, or is, or will become, or will have become, or will be, hereafter.

Most true.

But are there any modes of partaking of being other than these?

There are none.

Then the one cannot possibly partake of being?

That is the inference.

Then the one is not at all?

Clearly not.

Then the one does not exist in such way as to be one; for if it were and partook of being, it would already be; but if the argument is to be trusted, the one neither is nor is one?

[142] True.

But that which is not admits of no attribute or relation?

Of course not.

Then there is no name, nor expression, nor perception, nor opinion, nor knowledge of it?

Clearly not.

Then it is neither named, nor expressed, nor opined, nor known, nor does anything that is perceive it.

So we must infer.

But can all this be true about the one?

I think not.

Suppose, now, that we return once more to the original hypothesis; let us see whether on a further review any new aspect of the question appears.

I shall be very happy to do so.

We say that we have to work out together all the consequences, whatever they may be, which follow, if the one is?

Yes.

Then we will begin at the beginning:—If one is, can one be, and not partake of being?

Impossible.

Then the one will have being, but its being will not be the same with the one; for if the same, it would not be the being of the one; nor would the one have participated in being, for the proposition that one is would have been identical with the proposition that one is one; but our hypothesis is not if one is one, what will follow, but if one is:—am I not right?

Quite right.

We mean to say, that being has not the same significance as one?

Of course.

And when we put them together shortly, and say "One is," that is equivalent to saying, "partakes of being"?

Quite true.

Once more then let us ask, if one is what will follow. Does not this hypothesis necessarily imply that one is of such a nature as to have parts?

How so?

In this way:—If being is predicated of the one, if the one is, and one of being, if being is one; and if being and one are not the same; and since the one, which we have assumed, is, must not the whole, if it is one, itself be, and have for its parts, one and being?

Certainly.

And is each of these parts—one and being—to be simply called a part, or must the word "part" be relative to the word "whole"?

The latter.

Then that which is one is both a whole and has a part?

Certainly.

Again, of the parts of the one, if it is—I mean being and one—does either fail to imply the

Then the one is not at all?

Clearly not.

Then the one does not exist in such way as to be one; for if it were and partook of being, it would already be; but if the argument is to be trusted, the one neither is nor is one?

[142] True.

But that which is not admits of no attribute or relation?

Of course not.

Then there is no name, nor expression, nor perception, nor opinion, nor knowledge of it?

Clearly not.

Then it is neither named, nor expressed, nor opined, nor known, nor does anything that is perceive it.

So we must infer.

But can all this be true about the one?

I think not.

Suppose, now, that we return once more to the original hypothesis; let us see whether on a further review any new aspect of the question appears.

I shall be very happy to do so.

We say that we have to work out together all the consequences, whatever they may be, which follow, if the one is?

Yes.

Then we will begin at the beginning:—If one is, can one be, and not partake of being?

Impossible.

Then the one will have being, but its being will not be the same with the one; for if the same, it would not be the being of the one; nor would the one have participated in being, for the proposition that one is would have been identical with the proposition that one is one; but our hypothesis is not if one is one, what will follow, but if one is:—am I not right?

Quite right.

We mean to say, that being has not the same significance as one?

Of course.

And when we put them together shortly, and say "One is," that is equivalent to saying, "partakes of being"?

Quite true.

Once more then let us ask, if one is what will follow. Does not this hypothesis necessarily imply that one is of such a nature as to have parts?

How so?

In this way:—If being is predicated of the one, if the one is, and one of being, if being is one; and if being and one are not the same; and since the one, which we have assumed, is, must not the whole, if it is one, itself be, and have for its parts, one and being?

Certainly.

And is each of these parts—one and being—to be simply called a part, or must the word "part" be relative to the word "whole"?

The latter.

Then that which is one is both a whole and has a part?

Certainly.

Again, of the parts of the one, if it is—I mean being and one—does either fail to imply the

And sameness has been shown to be of a nature distinct from oneness?

That has been shown

[140] But if the one had any other affection than that of being one it would be affected in such a way as to be more than one which is impossible

True

Then the one can never be so affected as to be the same either with another or with itself?

Clearly not

Then it cannot be like another or like itself?

No

Nor can it be affected so as to be other for then it would be affected in such a way as to be more than one

It would

That which is affected otherwise than itself or another, will be unlike itself or another for sameness of affections is likeness

True

But the one, as appears never being affected otherwise, is never unlike itself or other?

Never

Then the one will never be either like or unlike itself or other?

Plainly not

Again being of this nature it can neither be equal nor unequal either to itself or to other

How is that?

Why because the one if equal must be of the same measures as that to which it is equal

True

And if greater or less than things which are commensurable with it the one will have more measures than that which is less and fewer than that which is greater?

Yes

And so of things which are not commensurate with it the one will have greater measures than that which is less and smaller than that which is greater

Certainly

But how can that which does not partake of sameness have either the same measures or have anything else the same?

Impossible

And not having the same measures the one cannot be equal either with itself or with another?

It appears so

But again whether it have fewer or more measures, it will have as many parts as it has measures and thus again the one will be no longer one but will have as many parts as measures

Right.

And if it were of one measure, it would be equal to that measure yet it has been shown to be incapable of equality

It has

Then it will neither partake of one measure, nor of many nor of few, nor of the same at all nor be equal to itself or another not be greater or less than itself or other?

Certainly

Well and do we suppose that one can be older or younger than anything or of the same age with it?

Why not?

Why because that which is of the same age with itself or other must partake of equality or likeness of time and we said that the one did not partake either of equality or of likeness?

We did say so

And we also said that it did not partake of inequality or unlikeness

[141] Very true

How then can one being of this nature be either older or younger than anything or have the same age with it?

In no way

Then one cannot be older or younger or of the same age either with itself or with another?

Clearly not

Then the one being of this nature cannot be in time at all for must not that which is in time be always growing older than itself?

Certainly

And that which is older must always be older than something which is younger?

True

Then that which becomes older than itself also becomes at the same time younger than itself if it is to have something to become older than

What do you mean?

I mean this —A thing does not need to become different from another thing which is already different it is different, and if its different has become it has become different if its different will be it will be different but of that which is becoming different there cannot have been or be about to be or yet be, a different—the only different possible is one which is becoming

That is inevitable

But surely the elder is a difference relative to the younger and to nothing else

True

Then that which becomes older than itself

the smallest, and into being of all sizes, and is broken up more than all things: the divisions of it have no limit.

True.

Then it has the greatest number of parts?

Yes, the greatest number.

Is there any of these which is a part of being, and yet no part?

Impossible.

But if it is at all and so long as it is, it must be one, and cannot be none?

Certainly.

Then the one attaches to every single part of being, and does not fail in any part, whether great or small, or whatever may be the size of it?

True.

But reflect:—Can one, in its entirety, be in many places at the same time?

No; I see the impossibility of that.

And if not in its entirety, then it is divided; for it cannot be present with all the parts of being, unless divided.

True.

And that which has parts will be as many as the parts are?

Certainly.

Then we were wrong in saying just now, that being was distributed into the greatest number of parts. For it is not distributed into parts more than the one, but into parts equal to the one; the one is never wanting to being, or being to the one, but being two they are co-equal and coextensive.

Certainly that is true.

The one itself, then, having been broken up into parts by being, is many and infinite?

True.

Then not only the one which has being is many, but the one itself distributed by being, must also be many?

Certainly.

Further, inasmuch as the parts are parts of a whole, the one, as a whole, [145] will be limited; for are not the parts contained by the whole?

Certainly.

And that which contains, is a limit?

Of course.

Then the one if it has being is one and many, whole and parts, having limits and yet unlimited in number?

Clearly.

And because having limits, also having extremes?

Certainly.

e And if a whole, having beginning and middle and end. For can anything be a whole without these three? And if any one of them is wanting to anything, will that any longer be a whole?

No.

Then the one, as appears, will have beginning, middle, and end.

It will.

But, again, the middle will be equidistant from the extremes; or it would not be in the middle?

Yes.

Then the one will partake of figure, either rectilinear or round, or a union of the two?

True.

And if this is the case, it will be both in itself and in another too.

How?

Every part is in the whole, and none is outside the whole.

True.

And all the parts are contained by the whole?

Yes.

And the one is all its parts, and neither more nor less than all?

No.

And the one is the whole?

Of course.

But if all the parts are in the whole, and the one is all of them and the whole, and they are all contained by the whole, the one will be contained by the one; and thus the one will be in itself.

That is true.

But then, again, the whole is not in the parts—neither in all the parts, nor in some one of them. For if it is in all, it must be in one; for if there were any one in which it was not, it could not be in all the parts; for the part in which it is wanting is one of all, and if the whole is not in this, how can it be in them all?

It cannot.

Nor can the whole be in some of the parts; for if the whole were in some of the parts, the greater would be in the less, which is impossible.

Yes, impossible.

But if the whole is neither in one, nor in more than one, nor in all of the parts, it must be in something else, or cease to be anywhere at all?

Certainly.

If it were nowhere, it would be nothing; but being a whole, and not being in itself, it must be in another.

Very true.

The one then, regarded as a whole, is in another? is the one wanting to being or being to the one?

Impossible

Thus each of the parts also has in turn both one and being and is at the least made up of two parts and the same principle goes on for ever and every part whatever has always these two parts for being always involves one, and one being so that one is always disappearing, and becoming two

[143] Certainly

And so the one if it is must be infinite in multiplicity?

Clearly

Let us take another direction

What direction?

We say that the one partakes of being and therefore it is?

Yes

And in this way the one if it has being has turned out to be many?

True

But now let us abstract the one which as we say partakes of being and try to imagine it apart from that of which, as we say it partakes—will this abstract one be one only or many?

One I think

Let us see —Must not the being of one be other than one? for the one is not being but considered as one, only partook of being?

Certainly

If being and the one be two different things, it is not because the one is one that it is other than being nor because being is being that it is other than the one but they differ from one another in virtue of otherness and difference

Certainly

So that the other is not the same—either with the one or with being?

Certainly not

And therefore whether we take being and the other or being and the one or the one and the other in every such case we take two things which may be rightly called both

How so

In this way—you may speak of being?

Yes

And also of one?

Yes

Then now we have spoken of either of them?

Yes

Well and when I speak of being and one, I speak of them both?

Certainly

And if I speak of being and the other or of the one and the other—in any such case do I not speak of both?

Yes

And must not that which is correctly called both be also two?

Undoubtedly

And of two things how can either by any possibility not be one?

It cannot

Then if the individuals of the pair are together two they must be severally one?

Clearly

And if each of them is one then by the addition of any one to any pair the whole becomes three?

Yes

And three are odd, and two are even?

Of course

And if there are two there must also be twice, and if there are three there must be thrice that is if twice one makes two and thrice one three?

Certainly

There are two and twice and therefore there must be twice two and there are three and there is thrice and therefore there must be thrice three?

Of course

If there are three and twice there is twice three and if there are two and thrice there is thrice two?

Undoubtedly

[144] Here then we have even taken even times and odd taken odd times and even taken odd times and odd taken even times

True

And if this is so does any number remain which has no necessity to be?

None whatever

Then if one is number must also be?

It must

But if there is number there must also be many and infinite multiplicity of being for number is infinite in multiplicity and partakes also of being am I not right?

Certainly

And if all number participates in being every part of number will also participate?

Yes

Then being is distributed over the whole multitude of things and nothing that is however small or however great, is devoid of it? And indeed the very supposition of this is absurd for how can that which is, be devoid of being?

In no way

And it is divided into the greatest and into the smallest, and into being of all sizes, and is broken up more than all things; the divisions of it have no limit.

True.

Then it has the greatest number of parts?

Yes, the greatest number.

Is there any of these which is a part of being, and yet no part?

Impossible.

But if it is at all and so long as it is, it must be one, and cannot be none?

Certainly.

Then the one attaches to every single part of being, and does not fail in any part, whether great or small, or whatever may be the size of it?

No; I see the impossibility of that.

And if not in its entirety, then it is divided; for it cannot be present with all the parts of being, unless divided.

True.

And that which has parts will be as many as the parts are?

Certainly.

Then we were wrong in saying just now, that being was distributed into the greatest number of parts. For it is not distributed into parts more than the one, but into parts equal to the one; the one is never wanting to being, or being to the one, but being two they are co-equal and coextensive.

Certainly that is true.

The one itself, then, having been broken up into parts by being, is many and infinite?

True.

Then not only the one which has being is many, but the one itself distributed by being, must also be many?

Certainly.

Further, inasmuch as the parts are parts of a whole, the one, as a whole, [145] will be limited; for are not the parts contained by the whole?

It will.

But, again, the middle will be equidistant from the extremes; or it would not be in the middle?

Yes.

Then the one will partake of figure, either rectilinear or round, or a union of the two?

True.

And if this is the case, it will be both in itself and in another too.

How?

Every part is in the whole, and none is outside the whole.

True.

And all the parts are contained by the whole?

Yes.

And the one is all its parts, and neither more nor less than all?

No.

And the one is the whole?

Of course.

But if all the parts are in the whole, and the one is all of them and the whole, and they are all contained by the whole, the one will be contained by the one; and thus the one will be in itself.

That is true.

But then, again, the whole is not in the parts—neither in all the parts, nor in some one of them. For if it is in all, it must be in one; for if there were any one in which it was not, it could not be in all the parts; for the part in which it is wanting is one of all, and if the whole is not in this, how can it be in them all?

It cannot.

Nor can the whole be in some of the parts; for if the whole were in some of the parts, the greater would be in the less, which is impossible.

Yes, impossible.

But if the whole is neither in one, nor in more than one, nor in all of the parts, it must be in something else, or cease to be anywhere at all?

Certainly.

If it were nowhere, it would be nothing; but being a whole, and not being in itself, it must be in another.

Very true.

The one then, regarded as a whole, is in another but regarded as being all its parts is in itself, and therefore the one must be itself in itself and also in another

Certainly

The one then being of this nature, is of necessity both at rest and in motion?

How?

The one is at rest since it is in itself for being in one and not passing out of this [146] it is in the same which is itself

True

And that which is ever in the same must be ever at rest?

Certainly

Well and must not that on the contrary which is ever in other never be in the same and if never in the same never at rest and if not at rest, in motion?

True

Then the one being always itself in itself and other must always be both at rest and in motion?

Clearly

And must be the same with itself and other than itself and also the same with the others and other than the others this follows from its previous affections

How so?

Every thing in relation to every other thing is either the same or other or if neither the same nor other then in the relation of a part to a whole or of a whole to a part

Clearly

And is the one a part of itself?

Certainly not

Since it is not a part in relation to itself it cannot be related to itself as whole to part?

It cannot

But is the one other than one?

No

And therefore not other than itself?

Certainly not

If then it be neither other nor a whole nor a part in relation to itself must it not be the same with itself?

Certainly

But then again a thing which is in another place from itself if this itself' remains in the same place with itself, must be other than itself for it will be in another place?

True

Then the one has been shown to be at once in itself and in another?

Yes

Thus then as appears the one will be other than itself?

True

Well then if anything be other than anything will it not be other than that which is other?

Certainly

And will not all things that are not one be other than the one and the one other than the not one?

Of course

Then the one will be other than the others?

True

But consider —Are not the absolute same, and the absolute other opposites to one another?

Of course

Then will the same ever be in the other or the other in the same?

They will not

If then the other is never in the same there is nothing in which the other is during any space of time for during that space of time however small the other would be in the same Is not that true?

Yes

And since the other is never in the same it can never be in anything that is

True

Then the other will never be either in the not one or in the one?

Certainly not

Then not by reason of otherness is the one other than the not-one or the not-one other than the one

No

Nor by reason of themselves will they be other than one another if not partaking of the other [147]

How can they be?

But if they are not other either by reason of themselves or of the other will they not altogether escape being other than one another?

They will

Again the not-one cannot partake of the one otherwise it would not have been not-one but would have been in some way one

True

Nor can the not-one be number for having number it would not have been not-one at all

It would not

Again is the not-one part of the one or rather, would it not in that case partake of the one?

It would

If then in every point of view the one and the not-one are distinct then neither is the one part or whole of the not-one nor is the not-one part or whole of the one?

No

But we said that things which are neither parts nor wholes of one another nor other than one another will be the same with one another—so we said?

Yes.

Then shall we say that the one, being in this relation to the not-one, is the same with it?

Let us say so.

Then it is the same with itself and the others, and also other than itself and the others.

That appears to be the inference.

And it will also be like and unlike itself and the others?

Perhaps.

Since the one was shown to be other than the others, the others will also be other than the one.

Yes.

And the one is other than the others in the same degree that the others are other than it, and neither more nor less?

True.

And if neither more nor less, then in a like degree?

Yes.

In virtue of the affection by which the one is other than others and others in like manner other than it, the one will be affected like the others and the others like the one.

How do you mean?

I may take as an illustration the case of names. You give a name to a thing?

Yes.

And you may say the name once or oftener?

Yes.

And when you say it once, you mention that of which it is the name? and when more than once, is it something else which you mention? or must it always be the same thing of which you speak, whether you utter the name once or more than once?

Of course it is the same.

And is not "other" a name given to a thing?

Certainly.

Whenever, then, you use the word "other," whether once or oftener, you name that of which it is the name, and to no other do you give the name?

True.

Then when we say that the others are other than the one, and the one other than the others, in repeating the word "other" we speak of that nature to which the name is applied, and of no other?

Quite true.

Then the one which is other than others, and the other which is other than the one, [143] in that the word "other" is applied to both, will be in the same condition; and that which is in the same condition is like?

Yes.

Then in virtue of the affection by which the one is other than the others, every thing will be like every thing, for every thing is other than every thing.

True.

Again, the like is opposed to the unlike?

Yes.

And the other to the same?

True again.

And the one was also shown to be the same with the others?

Yes.

And to be the same with the others is the opposite of being other than the others?

Certainly.

And in that it was other it was shown to be like?

Yes.

But in that it was the same it will be unlike by virtue of the opposite affection to that which made it like; and this was the affection of otherness.

Yes.

The same then will make it unlike; otherwise it will not be the opposite of the other.

True.

Then the one will be both like and unlike the others; like in so far as it is other, and unlike in so far as it is the same.

Yes, that argument may be used.

And there is another argument.

What?

In so far as it is affected in the same way it is not affected otherwise, and not being affected otherwise is not unlike, and not being unlike, is like; but in so far as it is affected by other it is otherwise, and being otherwise affected is unlike.

True.

Then because the one is the same with the others and other than the others, on either of these two grounds, or on both of them, it will be both like and unlike the others?

Certainly.

And in the same way as being other than itself and the same with itself, on either of these two grounds and on both of them, it will be like and unlike itself?

Of course.

Again, how far can the one touch or not touch itself and others?—consider.

I am considering.

other but regarded as being all its parts is in itself and therefore the one must be itself in it self and also in another

Certainly

The one then being of this nature is of ne cessity both at rest and in motion?

How?

The one is at rest since it is in itself for be ing in one and not passing out of this [146] it is in the same which is itself

True

And that which is ever in the same must be ever at rest?

Certainly

Well and must not that on the contrary which is ever in other never be in the same and if never in the same never at rest and if not at rest, in motion?

True

Then the one being always itself in itself and other must always be both at rest and in motion?

Clearly

And must be the same with itself and other than itself and also the same with the others and other than the others this follows from its previous affections

How so?

Every thing in relation to every other thing is either the same or other or if neither the same nor other then in the relation of a part to a whole or of a whole to a part

Clearly

And is the one a part of itself?

Certainly not

Since it is not a part in relation to itself it cannot be related to itself as whole to part?

It cannot

But is the one other than one?

No

And therefore not other than itself?

Certainly not

If then it be neither other nor a whole nor a part in relation to itself must it not be the same with itself?

Certainly

But then again a thing which is in another place from itself if this itself' remains in the same place with itself must be other than itself for it will be in another place?

True

Then the one has been shown to be at once in itself and in another?

Yes

Thus then as appears the one will be other than itself?

True

Well then if anything be other than any thing will it not be other than that which is other?

Certainly

And will not all things that are not one, be other than the one and the one other than the not-one?

Of course

Then the one will be other than the others?

True

But consider —Are not the absolute same, and the absolute other opposites to one another?

Of course

Then will the same ever be in the other, or the other in the same?

They will not

If then the other is never in the same there is nothing in which the other is during any space of time for during that space of time however small the other would be in the same Is not that true?

Yes

And since the other is never in the same, it can never be in anything that is

True

Then the other will never be either in the not one or in the one?

Certainly not

Then not by reason of otherness is the one other than the not-one or the not-one other than the one

No

Nor by reason of themselves will they be oth er than one another if not partaking of the oth er [147]

How can they be?

But if they are not other either by reason of themselves or of the other will they not altogether escape being other than one another?

They will

Again the not one cannot partake of the one otherwise it would not have been not-one, but would have been in some way one

True

Nor can the not-one be number for having number it would not have been not-one at all

It would not

Again is the not one part of the one or rath er would it not in that case partake of the one?

It would

If then in every point of view the one and the not-one are distinct then neither is the one part or whole of the not-one nor is the not-one part or whole of the one?

No

But can smallness be equal to anything or greater than anything, and have the functions of greatness and equality and not its own functions?

Impossible.

Then smallness cannot be in the whole of one, but, if at all, in a part only?

Yes.

And surely not in all of a part, for then the difficulty of the whole will recur; it will be equal to or greater than any part in which it is.

Certainly.

Then smallness will not be in anything, whether in a whole or in a part; nor will there be anything small but actual smallness.

True.

Neither will greatness be in the one, for if greatness be in anything there will be something greater other and besides greatness itself, namely that in which greatness is; and this too when the small itself is not there, which the one, if it is great, must exceed; this, however, is impossible, seeing that smallness is wholly absent.

True.

But absolute greatness is only greater than absolute smallness, and smallness is only smaller than absolute greatness.

Very true.

Then other things are not greater or less than the one, if they have neither greatness nor smallness; nor have greatness or smallness any power of exceeding or being exceeded in relation to the one, but only in relation to one another; nor will the one be greater or less than them or others, if it has neither greatness nor smallness.

Clearly not.

Then if the one is neither greater nor less than the others, it cannot either exceed or be exceeded by them?

Certainly not.

And that which neither exceeds nor is exceeded, must be on an equality; and being on an equality, must be equal.

Of course.

And this will be true also of the relation of the one to itself; having neither greatness nor smallness in itself, it will neither exceed nor be exceeded by itself, but will be on an equality with and equal to itself.

Certainly.

Then the one will be equal to both itself and the others?

Clearly so.

And yet the one, being itself in itself, will also surround and be without itself; [151] and, as containing itself, will be greater than itself; and, as contained in itself, will be less; and will thus be greater and less than itself.

It will.

Now there cannot possibly be anything which is not included in the one and the others?

Of course not.

But, surely, that which is must always be somewhere?

Yes.

But that which is in anything will be less, and that in which it is will be greater; in no other way can one thing be in another.

True.

And since there is nothing other or besides the one and the others, and they must be in something, must they not be in one another, the one in the others and the others in the one, if they are to be anywhere?

That is clear.

But inasmuch as the one is in the others, the others will be greater than the one, because they contain the one, which will be less than the others, because it is contained in them; and inasmuch as the others are in the one, the one on the same principle will be greater than the others, and the others less than the one.

True.

The one, then, will be equal to and greater and less than itself and the others?

Clearly.

And if it be greater and less and equal, it will be of equal and more and less measures or divisions than itself and the others, and if of measures, also of parts?

Of course.

And if of equal and more and less measures or divisions, it will be in number more or less than itself and the others, and likewise equal in number to itself and to the others?

How is that?

It will be of more measures than those things which it exceeds, and of as many parts as measures; and so with that to which it is equal, and that than which it is less.

True.

And being greater and less than itself, and equal to itself, it will be of equal measures with itself and of more and fewer measures than itself; and if of measures then also of parts?

It will.

And being of equal parts with itself, it will be numerically equal to itself; and being of more parts, more, and being of less, less than itself?

The one was shown to be in itself which was a whole?

True

And also in other things?

Yes

In so far as it is in other things it would touch other things but in so far as it is in itself it would be debarred from touching them and would touch itself only

Clearly

Then the inference is that it would touch both?

It would

But what do you say to a new point of view? Must not that which is to touch another be next to that which it is to touch and occupy the place nearest to that in which what it touches is situated?

True

Then the one if it is to touch itself ought to be situated next to itself and occupy the place next to that in which itself is?

It ought

And that would require that the one should be two and be in two places at once [149] and this while it is one, will never happen

No

Then the one cannot touch itself any more than it can be two?

It cannot.

Neither can it touch others

Why not?

The reason is that whatever is to touch another must be in separation from and next to that which it is to touch and no third thing can be between them

True

Two things then, at the least are necessary to make contact possible?

They are

And if to the two a third be added in due order the number of terms will be three and the contacts two?

Yes

And every additional term makes one additional contact whence it follows that the contacts are one less in number than the terms the first two terms exceeded the number of contacts by one and the whole number of terms exceeds the whole number of contacts by one in like manner and for every one which is afterwards added to the number of terms one contact is added to the contacts

True

Whatever is the whole number of things the contacts will be always one less

True

But if there be only one and not two there will be no contact?

How can there be?

And do we not say that the others being other than the one are not one and have no part in the one?

True

Then they have no number if they have no one in them?

Of course not

Then the others are neither one nor two nor are they called by the name of any number?

No

One then, alone is one and two do not exist?

Clearly not

And if there are not two there is no contact?

There is not

Then neither does the one touch the others nor the others the one if there is no contact?

Certainly not

For all which reasons the one touches and does not touch itself and the others?

True

Further—is the one equal and unequal to itself and others?

How do you mean?

If the one were greater or less than the others or the others greater or less than the one they would not be greater or less than each other in virtue of their being the one and the others but if in addition to their being what they are they had equality, they would be equal to one another or if the one had smallness and the others greatness or the one had greatness and the others smallness—whichever kind had greatness would be greater and whichever had smallness would be smaller?

Certainly

Then there are two such ideas as greatness and smallness for if they were not they could not be opposed to each other and be present in that which is

How could they?

[150] If then smallness is present in the one it will be present either in the whole or in a part of the whole?

Certainly

Suppose the first it will be either co equal and co-extensive with the whole one or will contain the one?

Clearly

If it be co-extensive with the one it will be coequal with the one or if containing the one it will be greater than the one?

Of course.

But can smallness be equal to anything or greater than anything and have the functions of greatness and equality and not its own functions?

Impossible.

Then smallness cannot be in the whole of one, but, if at all, in a part only?

Yes.

And surely not in all of a part, for then the difficulty of the whole will recur; it will be equal to or greater than any part in which it is.

Certainly.

Then smallness will not be in anything, whether in a whole or in a part; nor will there be anything small but actual smallness.

True.

Neither will greatness be in the one, for if greatness be in anything there will be something greater other and besides greatness itself, namely that in which greatness is; and this too when the small itself is not there, which the one, if it is great, must exceed; this, however, is impossible, seeing that smallness is wholly absent.

True.

But absolute greatness is only greater than absolute smallness, and smallness is only smaller than absolute greatness.

Very true.

Then other things are not greater or less than the one, if they have neither greatness nor smallness; nor have greatness or smallness any power of exceeding or being exceeded in relation to the one, but only in relation to one another; nor will the one be greater or less than them or others, if it has neither greatness nor smallness.

Clearly not.

Then if the one is neither greater nor less than the others, it cannot either exceed or be exceeded by them?

Certainly not.

And that which neither exceeds nor is exceeded, must be on an equality; and being on an equality, must be equal.

Of course.

And this will be true also of the relation of the one to itself; having neither greatness nor smallness in itself, it will neither exceed nor be exceeded by itself, but will be on an equality with and equal to itself.

Certainly.

Then the one will be equal to both itself and the others?

Clearly so.

And yet the one, being itself in itself, will also surround and be without itself [151] and, as containing itself, will be greater than itself and, as contained in itself, will be less; and will thus be greater and less than itself.

It will.

Now there cannot possibly be anything which is not included in the one and the others?

Of course not.

But, surely, that which is must always be somewhere?

Yes.

But that which is in anything, will be less, and that in which it is will be greater; in no other way can one thing be in another.

True.

And since there is nothing other or besides the one and the others, and they must be in something, must they not be in one another, the one in the others and the others in the one, if they are to be anywhere?

That is clear.

But inasmuch as the one is in the others, the others will be greater than the one, because they contain the one, which will be less than the others, because it is contained in them; and inasmuch as the others are in the one, the one on the same principle will be greater than the others, and the others less than the one.

True.

The one, then, will be equal to and greater and less than itself and the others?

Clearly.

And if it be greater and less and equal, it will be of equal and more and less measures or divisions than itself and the others, and if of measures, also of parts?

Of course.

And if of equal and more and less measures or divisions, it will be in number more or less than itself and the others, and likewise equal in number to itself and to the others?

How is that?

It will be of more measures than those things which it exceeds, and of as many parts as measures; and so with that to which it is equal, and that than which it is less.

True.

And being greater and less than itself, and equal to itself, it will be of equal measures with itself and of more and fewer measures than itself; and if of measures then also of parts?

It will.

And being of equal parts with itself, it will be numerically equal to itself; and being of more parts, more, and being of less, less than itself?

Certainly

And the same will hold of its relation to other things, inasmuch as it is greater than them it will be more in number than them and inasmuch as it is smaller it will be less in number and inasmuch as it is equal in size to other things it will be equal to them in number

Certainly

Once more then as would appear the one will be in number both equal to and more and less than both itself and all other things

It will

Does the one also partake of time? And is it and does it become older and younger than itself and others and again neither younger nor older than itself and others by virtue of participation in time?

How do you mean?

If one is being must be predicated of it?

Yes

But to be (εἶναι) is only participation of being in present time and to have been is the participation of being at a past time [152] and to be about to be is the participation of being at a future time?

Very true

Then the one since it partakes of being partakes of time?

Certainly

And is not time always moving forward?

Yes

Then the one is always becoming older than itself since it moves forward in time?

Certainly

And do you remember that the older becomes older than that which becomes younger?

I remember

Then since the one becomes older than itself, it becomes younger at the same time?

Certainly

Thus then the one becomes older as well as younger than itself?

Yes

And it is older (is it not?) when in becoming it gets to the point of time between was and will be which is now for surely in going from the past to the future, it cannot skip the present?

No

And when it arrives at the present it stops from becoming older and no longer becomes but is older for if it went on it would never be reached by the present for it is the nature of that which goes on to touch both the present and the future, letting go the present and seizing the future while in process of becoming between them

True

But that which is becoming cannot skip the present when it reaches the present it ceases to become and is then whatever it may happen to be becoming

Clearly

And so the one when in becoming older it reaches the present, ceases to become and is then older

Certainly

And it is older than that than which it was becoming older and it was becoming older than itself

Yes

And that which is older is older than that which is younger?

True

Then the one is younger than itself when in becoming older it reaches the present?

Certainly

But the present is always present with the one during all its being for whenever it is it is always now

Certainly

Then the one always both is and becomes older and younger than itself?

Truly

And is it or does it become a longer time than itself or an equal time with itself?

An equal time

But if it becomes or is for an equal time with itself it is of the same age with itself?

Of course

And that which is of the same age is neither older nor younger?

No

The one then becoming and being the same time with itself, neither is nor becomes older or younger than itself? [153]

I should say not.

And what are its relations to other things? Is it or does it become older or younger than they?

I cannot tell you

You can at least tell me that others than the one are more than the one—other would have been one but the others have multitude and are more than one?

They will have multitude

And a multitude implies a number larger than one?

Of course

And shall we say that the lesser or the greater is the first to come or to have come into existence?

The lesser.

Then the least is the first? And that is the one?

Yes.

Then the one of all things that have number is the first to come into being; but all other things have also number, being plural and not singular.

They have.

And since it came into being first it must be supposed to have come into being prior to the others, and the others later; and the things which came into being later are younger than that which preceded them? And so the other things will be younger than the one, and the one older than other things?

True.

What would you say of another question? Can the one have come into being contrary to its own nature, or is that impossible?

Impossible.

And yet, surely, the one was shown to have parts; and if parts, then a beginning, middle and end?

Yes.

And a beginning, both of the one itself and of all other things, comes into being first of all; and after the beginning, the others follow, until you reach the end?

Certainly.

And all these others we shall affirm to be parts of the whole and of the one, which, as soon as the end is reached, has become whole and one?

Yes; that is what we shall say.

But the end comes last, and the one is of such a nature as to come into being with the last; and, since the one cannot come into being except in accordance with its own nature, its nature will require that it should come into being after the others, simultaneously with the end.

Clearly.

Then the one is younger than the others and the others older than the one.

That also is clear in my judgment.

Well, and must not a beginning or any other part of the one or of anything, if it be a part and not parts, being a part, be also of necessity one?

Certainly.

And will not the one come into being together with each part—together with the first part when that comes into being, and together with the second part and with all the rest, and will not be wanting to any part, which is added to any other part until it has reached the last and become one whole; it will be wanting neither to the middle, nor to the first, nor to the last, nor to any of them, while the process of becoming is going on?

True.

Then the one is of the same age with all the others, so that if the one itself does not contradict its own nature, it will be neither prior nor posterior to the others, but simultaneous; and according to this argument the one will be neither older nor younger than the others, [154] nor the others than the one, but according to the previous argument the one will be older and younger than the others and the others than the one.

Certainly.

After this manner then the one is and has become. But as to its becoming older and younger than the others, and the others than the one, and neither older nor younger, what shall we say? Shall we say as of being, so also of becoming, or otherwise?

I cannot answer.

But I can venture to say, that even if one thing were older or younger than another, it could not become older or younger in a greater degree than it was at first; for equals added to unequals, whether to periods of time or to any thing else, leave the difference between them the same as at first.

Of course.

Then that which is, cannot become older or younger than that which is, since the difference of age is always the same; the one is and has become older and the other younger; but they are no longer becoming so.

True.

And the one which is does not therefore become either older or younger than the others which are.

No.

But consider whether they may not become older and younger in another way.

In what way?

Just as the one was proven to be older than the others and the others than the one.

And what of that?

If the one is older than the others, it has come into being a longer time than the others.

Yes.

But consider again; if we add equal time to a greater and a less time, will the greater differ from the less time by an equal or by a smaller portion than before?

By a smaller portion.

Certainly

And the same will hold of its relation to other things inasmuch as it is greater than them it will be more in number than them and inasmuch as it is smaller it will be less in number and inasmuch as it is equal in size to other things it will be equal to them in number

Certainly

Once more then as would appear the one will be in number both equal to and more and less than both itself and all other things

It will

Does the one also partake of time? And is it and does it become older and younger than itself and others and again neither younger nor older than itself and others by virtue of participation in time?

Yes

And that which is older is older than that which is younger?

True

Then the one is younger than itself when in becoming older it reaches the present?

Certainly

But the present is always present with the one during all its being for whenever it is it is always now

Certainly

Then the one always both is and becomes older and younger than itself?

Truly

And is it or does it become a longer time than itself or an equal time with itself?

An equal time

Certainly.

After this manner then the one is and has become. But as to its becoming older and younger than the others, and the others than the one, and neither older nor younger, what shall we say? Shall we say as of being so also of becoming, or otherwise?

I cannot answer.

But I can venture to say, that even if one thing were older or younger than another, it could not become older or younger in a greater degree than it was at first; for equals added to unequals, whether to periods of time or to any thing else, leave the difference between them the same as at first.

Of course.

Then that which is, cannot become older or younger than that which is, since the difference of age is always the same; the one is and has become older and the other younger; but they are no longer becoming so.

True.

And the one which is does not therefore become either older or younger than the others which are.

No.

But consider whether they may not become older and younger in another way.

In what way?

Just as the one was proven to be older than the others and the others than the one.

And what of that?

If the one is older than the others, it has come into being a longer time than the others.

Yes.

But consider again; if we add equal time to a greater and a less time, will the greater differ from the less time by an equal or by a smaller portion than before?

By a smaller portion.

Then the difference between the age of the one and the age of the others will not be afterwards so great as at first but if an equal time be added to both of them they will differ less and less in age?

Yes

And that which differs in age from some other less than formerly from being older will become younger in relation to that other than which it was older?

Yes younger

And if the one becomes younger the others aforesaid will become older than they were before in relation to the one

Certainly

Then that which had become younger becomes older relatively to that which previously had become and was older it never really is older [155] but is always becoming for the one is always growing on the side of youth and the other on the side of age And in like manner the older is always in process of becoming younger than the younger for as they are always going in opposite directions they become in ways the opposite to one another the younger older than the older, and the older younger than the younger They cannot however have become for if they had already become they would be and not merely become But that is impossible for they are always becoming both older and younger than one another the one becomes younger than the others because it was seen to be older and prior and the others become older than the one because they came into being later and in the same way the others are in the same relation to the one because they were seen to be older and prior to the one

That is clear

Inasmuch then as one thing does not become older or younger than another in that they always differ from each other by an equal number the one cannot become older or younger than the others nor the others than the one but inasmuch as that which came into being earlier and that which came into being later must continually differ from each other by a different portion—in this point of view the others must become older and younger than the one and the one than the others

Certainly

For all these reasons then the one is and becomes older and younger than itself and the others and neither is nor becomes older or younger than itself or the others

Certainly

But since the one partakes of time and partakes of becoming older and younger must it not also partake of the past the present, and the future?

Of course it must

Then the one was and is and will be, and was becoming and is becoming and will become?

Certainly

And there is and was and will be something which is in relation to it and belongs to it?

True

And since we have at this moment opinion and knowledge and perception of the one there is opinion and knowledge and perception of it?

Quite right

Then there is name and expression for it, and it is named and expressed and everything of this kind which appertains to other things appertains to the one

Certainly that is true

Yet once more and for the third time, let us consider It the one is both one and many as we have described and is neither one nor many and participates in time must it not in as far as it is one at times partake of being and in as far as it is not one at times not partake of being?

Certainly

But can it partake of being when not partaking of being or not partake of being when partaking of being?

Impossible

Then the one partakes and does not partake of being at different times for that is the only way in which it can partake and not partake of the same

True

[156] And is there not also a time at which it assumes being and relinquishes being—for how can it have and not have the same thing unless it receives and also gives it up at some time?

Impossible

And the assuming of being is what you would call becoming?

I should

And the relinquishing of being you would call destruction?

I should

The one then as would appear becomes and is destroyed by taking and giving up being

Certainly

And being one and many and in process of becoming and being destroyed when it becomes one it ceases to be many and when many it ceases to be one?

Certainly

And as it becomes one and many must it not necessarily experience separation and aggregation

Inevitably

And whenever it becomes like and unlike it must be assimilated and dissimilated?

Yes.

And when it becomes greater or less or equal it must grow or diminish or be equalized?

True.

And when being in motion it rests, and when being at rest it changes to motion, it can surely be in no time at all?

How can it?

But that a thing which is previously at rest should be afterwards in motion, or previously in motion and afterwards at rest, without experiencing change, is impossible.

Impossible.

And surely there cannot be a time in which a thing can be at once neither in motion nor at rest.

There cannot.

But neither can it change without changing

True.

When then does it change for it cannot change either when at rest, or when in motion, or when in time?

It cannot.

And does this strange thing in which it is at the time of changing really exist?

What thing?

The moment. For the moment seems to imply a something out of which change takes place into either of two states for the change is not from the state of rest as such, nor from the state of motion as such but there is this curious nature which we call the moment lying between rest and motion, not being in any time and into this and out of this what is in motion changes into rest, and what is at rest into motion

So it appears.

And the one then, since it is at rest and also in motion, will change to either for only in this way can it be in both. And in changing it changes in a moment, and when it is changing it will be in no time, and will not then be either in motion or at rest.

It will not

[157] And it will be in the same case in relation to the other changes, when it passes from being into cessation of being, or from not-being into becoming—then it passes between certain states of motion and rest, and neither is nor is not, nor becomes nor is destroyed.

Very true.

And on the same principle, in the passage from one to many and from many to one, the one is neither one nor many neither separated nor aggregated and in the passage from like to unlike and from unlike to like, it is neither like nor unlike, neither in a state of assimilation nor of dissimilation and in the passage from small to great and equal and back again it will be neither small nor great, nor equal nor in a state of increase, or diminution, or equalization.

True.

All these, then, are the affections of the one, if the one has being

Of course.

But if one is, what will happen to the others —is not that also to be considered?

Yes.

Let us show then, if one is what will be the affections of the others than the one.

Let us do so

Inasmuch as there are things other than the one, the others are not the one for if they were they could not be other than the one.

Very true.

Nor are the others altogether without the one, but in a certain way they participate in the one

In what way?

Because the others are other than the one inasmuch as they have parts for if they had no parts they would be simply one.

Right.

And parts, as we affirm, have relation to a whole?

So we say

And a whole must necessarily be one made up of many and the parts will be parts of the one for each of the parts is not a part of many but of a whole.

How do you mean?

If anything were a part of many being itself one of them, it will surely be a part of itself which is impossible, and it will be a part of each one of the other parts, if of all for if not a part of some one, it will be a part of all the others but this one, and thus will not be a part of each one and if not a part of each one it will not be a part of any one of the many and not being a part of any one, it cannot be a part or anything else of all those things of none of which it is anything

Clearly not.

Then the part is not a part of the many nor of all but is of a certain single form which we call a whole being one perfect unity framed out of all—of this the part will be a part

Certainly

If, then the others have parts they will participate in the whole and in the one

True

Then the others than the one must be one perfect whole, having parts

Certainly

And the same argument holds of each part for the part must participate in the one [158] for if each of the parts is a part this means I suppose, that it is one separate from the rest and self related otherwise it is not each

True

But when we speak of the part participating in the one, it must clearly be other than one for if not it would not merely have participated but would have been one whereas only the one itself can be one

Very true

Both the whole and the part must participate in the one for the whole will be one whole of which the parts will be parts and each part will be one part of the whole which is the whole of the part.

True

And will not the things which participate in the one be other than it?

Of course

And the things which are other than the one will be many for if the things which are other than the one were neither one nor more than one they would be nothing

True.

But seeing that the things which participate in the one as a part and in the one as a whole are more than one must not those very things which participate in the one be infinite in number?

How so?

Let us look at the matter thus —Is it not a fact that in partaking of the one they are not one and do not partake of the one at the very time when they are partaking of it?

Clearly

They do so then as multitudes in which the one is not present?

Very true

And if we were to abstract from them in idea the very smallest fraction must not that least fraction if it does not partake of the one be a multitude and not one?

It must

And if we continue to look at the other side of their nature regarded simply and in itself will not they as far as we see them be unlimited in number?

Certainly

And yet when each several part becomes a part then the parts have a limit in relation to the whole and to each other and the whole in relation to the parts

Just so

The result to the others than the one is that the union of themselves and the one appears to create a new element in them which gives to them limitation in relation to one another whereas in their own nature they have no limit

That is clear

Then the others than the one both as whole and parts are infinite and also partake of limit.

Certainly

Then they are both like and unlike one another and themselves

How is that?

Inasmuch as they are unlimited in their own nature they are all affected in the same way

True

And inasmuch as they all partake of limit, they are all affected in the same way

Of course

But inasmuch as their state is both limited and unlimited they are affected in opposite ways

Yes

[159] And opposites are the most unlike of things

Certainly

Considered then in regard to either one of their affections they will be like themselves and one another considered in reference to both of them together most opposed and most unlike

That appears to be true

Then the others are both like and unlike themselves and one another?

True

And they are the same and also different from one another and in motion and at rest and experience every sort of opposite affection as may be proved without difficulty of them since they have been shown to have experienced the affections aforesaid?

True

Suppose now that we leave the further discussion of these matters as evident and consider again upon the hypothesis that the one is, whether the opposite of all this is or is not equally true of the others

By all means.

Then let us begin again, and ask, If one is, what must be the affections of the others?

Let us ask that question.

Must not the one be distinct from the others, and the others from the one?

Why so?

Why because there is nothing else beside them which is distinct from both of them; for the expression "one and the others" includes all things.

Yes, all things.

Then we cannot suppose that there is anything different from them in which both the one and the others might exist?

There is nothing.

Then the one and the others are never in the same?

True.

Then they are separated from each other?

Yes.

And we surely cannot say that what is truly one has parts?

Impossible.

Then the one will not be in the others as a whole, nor as part, if it be separated from the others, and has no parts?

Impossible.

Then there is no way in which the others can partake of the one, if they do not partake either in whole or in part?

It would seem not.

Then there is no way in which the others are one, or have in themselves any unity?

There is not.

Nor are the others many; for if they were many, each part of them would be a part of the whole; but now the others, not partaking in any way of the one, are neither one nor many, nor whole, nor part.

True.

Then the others neither are nor contain two or three, if entirely deprived of the one?

True.

Then the others are neither like nor unlike the one, nor is likeness and unlikeness in them; for if they were like and unlike, or had in them likeness and unlikeness, they would have two natures in them opposite to one another.

That is clear.

But for that which partakes of nothing, to partake of two things was held by us to be impossible?

Impossible.

[160] Then the others are neither like nor unlike nor both, for if they were like or unlike they would partake of one of those two natures, which would be one thing, and if they were both they would partake of opposites which would be two things, and this has been shown to be impossible.

True.

Therefore they are neither the same, nor other, nor in motion, nor at rest, nor in a state of becoming, nor of being destroyed, nor greater nor less, nor equal, nor have they experienced anything else of the sort; for if they are capable of experiencing any such affection, they will participate in one and two and three, and odd and even, and in these, as has been proved, they do not participate, seeing that they are altogether and in every way devoid of the one.

Very true.

Therefore if one is, the one is all things, and also nothing, both in relation to itself and to other things.

Certainly.

Well, and ought we not to consider next what will be the consequence if the one is not?

Yes, we ought.

What is the meaning of the hypothesis—If the one is not; is there any difference between this and the hypothesis—If the not one is not?

There is a difference, certainly.

Is there a difference only, or rather are not the two expressions—if the one is not, and if the not one is not, entirely opposed?

They are entirely opposed.

And suppose a person to say:—If greatness is not, if smallness is not, or anything of that sort, does he not mean, whenever he uses such an expression, that "what is not" is other than other things?

To be sure.

And so when he says, If one is not, he clearly means, that what "is not" is other than all others; we know what he means—do we not?

Yes, we do.

When he says "one," he says something which is known; and secondly something which is other than all other things; it makes no difference whether he predicate of one being or not being, for that which is said "not to be" is known to be something all the same, and is distinguished from other things.

Certainly.

Then I will begin again, and ask, If one is not, what are the consequences. In the first place, as would appear, there is a knowledge of it, or the very meaning of the words, "if one is not," would not be known.

True

Secondly the others differ from it or it could not be described as different from the others?

Certainly

Difference then belongs to it as well as knowledge, for in speaking of the one as different from the others we do not speak of a difference in the others but in the one

Clearly so

Moreover the one that is not is something and partakes of relation to that and this and these and the like and is an attribute of this for the one or the others than the one could not have been spoken of nor could any attribute or relative of the one that is not have been or been spoken of nor could it have been said to be anything if it did not partake of some or of the other relations just now mentioned

True

Being then cannot be ascribed to the one since it is not but the one that is not may or rather must participate in many things [161] if it and nothing else is not if however neither the one nor the one that is not is supposed not to be and we are speaking of something of a different nature we can predicate nothing of it But supposing that the one that is not and nothing else is not then it must participate in the predicate "that and in many others

Certainly

And it will have unlikeness in relation to the others for the others being different from the one will be of a different kind

Certainly

And are not things of a different kind also other in kind?

Of course

And are not things other in kind unlike?

They are unlike

And if they are unlike the one that which they are unlike will clearly be unlike them?

Clearly so

Then the one will have unlikeness in respect of which the others are unlike it?

That would seem to be true

And if unlikeness to other things is attributed to it, it must have likeness to itself

How so?

If the one have unlikeness to one something else must be meant nor will the hypothesis relate to one but it will relate to something other than one?

Quite so

But that cannot be

No

Then the one must have likeness to itself?

It must

Again it is not equal to the others for if it were equal then it would at once be and be like them in virtue of the equality but if one has no being then it can neither be nor be like?

It cannot

But since it is not equal to the others neither can the others be equal to it?

Certainly not

And things that are not equal are unequal?

True

And they are unequal to an unequal?

Of course

Then the one partakes of inequality and in respect of this the others are unequal to it?

Very true

And inequality implies greatness and smallness?

Yes

Then the one if of such a nature has greatness and smallness?

That appears to be true

And greatness and smallness always stand apart?

True

Then there is always something between them?

There is

And can you think of anything else which is between them other than equality?

No it is equality which lies between them

Then that which has greatness and smallness also has equality which lies between them?

That is clear

Then the one which is not partakes as would appear of greatness and smallness and equality?

Clearly

Further it must surely in a sort partake of being?

How so?

It must be so for if not then we should not speak the truth in saying that the one is not But if we speak the truth clearly we must say what is Am I not right?

[162] Yes

And since we affirm that we speak truly we must also affirm that we say what is?

Certainly

Then as would appear the one when it is not is for if it were not to be when it is not but were to relinquish something of being so as to become not being it would at once be

Quite true

Then the one which is not if it is to main tain itself, must have the being of not-being as the bond of not-being just as being must have as a bond the not-being of not-being in order to perfect its own being for the truest assertion of the being of being and of the not being of not being is when being partakes of the being of being, and not of the being of not being—that is, the perfection of being and when not-being does not partake of the not being of not being but of the being of not being—that is the perfection of not-being

Most true.

Since then what is partakes of not being, and what is not of being must not the one also partake of being in order not to be?

Certainly

Then the one if it is not, clearly has being?

Clearly

And has not-being also if it is not?

Of course.

But can anything which is in a certain state not be in that state without changing?

Impossible

Then everything which is and is not in a certain state, implies change?

Certainly

And change is motion—we may say that?

Yes, motion

And the one has been proved both to be and not to be?

Yes.

And therefore is and is not in the same state?

Yes.

Thus the one that is not has been shown to have motion also because it changes from being to not-being?

That appears to be true

But surely if it is nowhere among what is, as is the fact, since it is not, it cannot change from one place to another?

Impossible

Then it cannot move by changing place?

No

Nor can it turn on the same spot for it nowhere touches the same, for the same is and that which is not cannot be reckoned among things that are?

It cannot.

Then the one if it is not, cannot turn in that in which it is not?

No

Neither can the one, whether it is or is not, be altered into other than itself, for if it altered and became different from itself then we could not be still speaking of the one, but of something else?

True.

But if the one neither suffers alteration nor turns round in the same place nor changes place, can it still be capable of motion?

Impossible.

Now that which is unmoved must surely be at rest and that which is at rest must stand still?

Certainly

Then the one that is not stands still and is also in motion?

That seems to be true.

But if it be in motion it must necessarily undergo alteration for anything which is moved [163] in so far as it is moved is no longer in the same state, but in another?

Yes.

Then the one, being moved is altered?

Yes.

And further if not moved in any way it will not be altered in any way?

No

Then, in so far as the one that is not is moved it is altered but in so far as it is not moved it is not altered?

Right.

Then the one that is not is altered and is not altered?

That is clear

And must not that which is altered become other than it previously was and lose its former state and be destroyed but that which is not altered can neither come into being nor be destroyed?

Very true.

And the one that is not, being altered, becomes and is destroyed and not being altered neither becomes nor is destroyed and so the one that is not becomes and is destroyed and neither becomes nor is destroyed?

True.

And now let us go back once more to the beginning, and see whether these or some other consequences will follow

Let us do as you say

If one is not, we ask what will happen in respect of one? That is the question

Yes

Do not the words is not" signify absence of being in that to which we apply them?

Just so

And when we say that a thing is not, do we mean that it is not in one way but is in another? or do we mean absolutely that what is not has in no sort or way or kind participation of being?

Quite absolutely

Then that which is not cannot be or in any way participate in being?

It cannot

And did we not mean by becoming and being destroyed the assumption of being and the loss of being?

Nothing else

And can that which has no participation in being either assume or lose being?

Impossible

The one then since it in no way is cannot have or lose or assume being in any way?

True

Then the one that is not since it in no way partakes of being neither perishes nor becomes?

No

Then it is not altered at all for if it were it would become and be destroyed?

True

But if it be not altered it cannot be moved?

Certainly not

Nor can we say that it stands if it is nowhere for that which stands must always be in one and the same spot?

Of course

Then we must say that the one which is not never stands still and never moves?

Neither

Nor is there any existing thing which can be attributed to it for if there had been, [164] it would partake of being?

That is clear

And therefore neither smallness nor greatness nor equality can be attributed to it?

No

Nor yet likeness nor difference either in relation to itself or to others?

Clearly not

Well and if nothing should be attributed to it, can other things be attributed to it?

Certainly not

And therefore other things can neither be like or unlike the same or different in relation to it?

They cannot

Nor can what is not be anything or be this thing or be related to or the attribute of this or that or other or be past present or future Nor can knowledge or opinion or perception or expression or name or any other thing that is have any concern with it?

No

Then the one that is not has no condition of any kind?

Such appears to be the conclusion

Yet once more if one is not, what becomes of the others? Let us determine that

Yes let us determine that.

The others must surely be for if they like the one were not we could not be now speaking of them

True

But to speak of the others implies difference —the terms other and different are synonymous?

True

Other means other than other and different, different from the different?

Yes

Then if there are to be others there is something than which they will be other?

Certainly

And what can that be?—for if the one is not they will not be other than the one

They will not

Then they will be other than each other for the only remaining alternative is that they are other than nothing

True

And they are each other than one another as being plural and not singular for if one is not they cannot be singular but every particle of them is infinite in number and even if a person takes that which appears to be the smallest fraction this which seemed one in a moment evanesces into many as in a dream and from being the smallest becomes very great in comparison with the fractions into which it is split up?

Very true

And in such particles the others will be other than one another if others are and the one is not?

Exactly

And will there not be many particles, each appearing to be one but not being one, if one is not?

True

And it would seem that number can be predicated of them if each of them appears to be one though it is really many?

It can

And there will seem to be odd and even among them which will also have no reality if one is not?

Yes

And there will appear to be a least among them and even this will seem large and manifold in comparison with the many small [165] fractions which are contained in it?

Certainly

And each particle will be imagined to be equal to the many and little for it could not have appeared to pass from the greater to the less without having appeared to arrive at the middle and thus would arise the appearance of equality

Yes.

And having neither beginning middle nor end, each separate particle yet appears to have a limit in relation to itself and other

How so?

Because, when a person conceives of any one of these as such, prior to the beginning another beginning appears, and there is another end, remaining after the end, and in the middle truer middles within but smaller because no unity can be conceived of any of them since the one is not.

Very true

And so all being whatever we think of must be broken up into fractions, for a particle will have to be conceived of without unity?

Certainly

And such being when seen indistinctly and at a distance, appears to be one but when seen near and with keen intellect, every single thing appears to be infinite, since it is deprived of the one, which is not?

Nothing more certain

Then each of the others must appear to be infinite and finite, and one and many if others than the one exist and not the one

They must

Then will they not appear to be like and unlike?

In what way?

Just as in a picture things appear to be all one to a person standing at a distance, and to be in the same state and alike?

True

But when you approach them, they appear to be many and different and because of the appearance of the difference different in kind from and unlike, themselves?

True

And so must the particles appear to be like and unlike themselves and each other

Certainly

And must they not be the same and yet different from one another and in contact with themselves, although they are separated, and having every sort of motion, and every sort of rest, and becoming and being destroyed and in neither state, and the like, all which things may be easily enumerated if the one is not and the many are?

Most true.

Once more let us go back to the beginning and ask if the one is not and the others of the one are what will follow

Let us ask that question

In the first place the others will not be one?

Impossible

Nor will they be many for if they were many one would be contained in them But if no one of them is one, all of them are nought, and therefore they will not be many

True.

If there be no one in the others, the others are neither many nor one

[166] They are not

Nor do they appear either as one or many

Why not?

Because the others have no sort or manner or way of communion with any sort of not being nor can anything which is not, be connected with any of the others for that which is not has no parts.

True

Nor is there an opinion or any appearance of not being in connection with the others, nor is not being ever in any way attributed to the others.

No

Then if one is not, the others neither are, nor any of the others either as one or many for you cannot conceive the many without the one.

You cannot.

Then if one is not there is no conception of any of the others either as one or many for you cannot conceive the many without the one

It would seem not.

Nor as like or unlike?

No

Nor as the same or different, nor in contact or separation, nor in any of those states which we enumerated as appearing to be —the others neither are nor appear to be any of these if one is not?

True

Then may we not sum up the argument in a word and say truly If one is not then nothing is?

Certainly

Let thus much be said and further let us affirm what seems to be the truth that, whether one is or is not, one and the others in relation to themselves and one another all of them in every way are and are not, and appear to be and appear not to be.

Most true.

Quite absolutely

Then that which is not cannot be or in any way participate in being?

It cannot

And did we not mean by becoming and being destroyed the assumption of being and the loss of being?

Nothing else

And can that which has no participation in being either assume or lose being?

Impossible

The one then since it in no way is cannot have or lose or assume being in any way?

THEAETETUS

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE SOCRATES THEODORUS THEAETETUS Euclid and Terpsion meet in front of Euclid s house in Megara they enter the house and the dialogue is read to them by a servant

[142] Euclid Have you only just arrived from the country Terpsion?

Terpsion No I came some time ago and I have been in the Agora looking for you and wondering that I could not find you

Euc But I was not in the city

Terp Where then?

Euc As I was going down to the harbour I met Theaetetus—he was being carried up to Athens from the army at Corinth

Terp Was he alive or dead?

Euc He was scarcely alive for he has been badly wounded but he was suffering even more from the sickness which has broken out in the army

Terp The dysentery you mean?

Euc Yes

Terp Alas! what a loss he will be!

Euc Yes Terpsion he is a noble fellow only to-day I heard some people highly praising his behaviour in this very battle

Terp No wonder I should rather be surprised at hearing anything else of him But why did he go on instead of stopping at Megara?

Euc He wanted to get home although I entreated and advised him to remain he would not listen to me so I set him on his way and turned back and then I remembered what Socrates had said of him and thought how remarkably this like all his predictions had been fulfilled I believe that he had seen him a little before his own death when Theaetetus was a youth and he had a memorable conversation with him which he repeated to me when I came to Athens he was full of admiration of his genius and said that he would most certainly be a great man if he lived

Terp The prophecy has certainly been fulfilled but what was the conversation? can you tell me?

[143] Euc No indeed not offhand but I took notes of it as soon as I got home these I filled up from memory writing them out at leisure and whenever I went to Athens I asked Socrates about any point which I had forgotten and on my return I made corrections thus I have nearly the whole conversation written down

Terp I remember—you told me and I have always been intending to ask you to show me the writing but have put off doing so and now why should we not read it through?—having just come from the country I should greatly like to rest

Euc I too shall be very glad of a rest for I went with Theaetetus as far as Erineum Let us go in then and while we are reposing the servant shall read to us

Terp Very good

Euc Here is the roll Terpsion I may observe that I have introduced Socrates not as narrating to me but as actually conversing with the persons whom he mentioned—these were Theodorus the geometrician (of Cyrene) and Theaetetus I have omitted for the sake of convenience the interlocutory words I said I remarked " which he used when he spoke of himself and again he agreed or dist,eed, in the answer lest the repetition of them should be troublesome

Terp Quite r ht, Euclid

Euc And now boy you may take the roll and read

Euclid's servant reads

Socrates If I cared enough about the Cyrenians, Theodorus, I would ask you whether there are any rising geometricians or philosophers in that part of the world But I am more interested in our own Athenian youth and I would rather know who among them are likely to do well I observe them as far as I can myself, and I enquire of any one whom they follow and I see that a great many of them follow you, in which they are quite right, considering your eminence in geometry and in other ways Tell me then, if you have met with any one who is good for anything

Theodo s Yes, Socrates I have become acquainted with one very remarkable Athenian youth, whom I commend to you as well worthy of your attention. If he had been a beauty I should have been afraid to praise him lest you should suppose that I was in love with him but he is no beauty and you must not be offended if I say that he is very like you for he has a snub nose and projecting eyes although these features are less marked in him than in you. Seeing, [144] then that he has no personal attractions I may freely say that in all my acquaintance, wh ch is very large, I never knew any one who was his equal in natural gifts for he has a quickness of apprehension which is almost unrivalled and he is exceedingly gentle and also the most courageous of men there is a uni n of qualities in him such as I have never seen in any other and should scarcely have tho ght poss ble for those who like him, have qu ck and ready and retentive wits have generally also quick tempers they are sh ps with o t ballast, and go darting about and are mad rather than courageous and the steadier sort, when they have t face study pro e stupid and cannot remember Whereas he moves surely and smoothly and successfully n the path of kn wl edge and enquiry and he is full of gentleness flowing on silently like a ri er of oil at his age it is wonderful

Soc That is good news whose son is he?

Theod The name of his father I have forgotten but the y uth himself is the middle one f those who are approaching us he and his companions ha e been anointing themselves in the out r court, and now they seem t have finished, and are coming towards us Look and see whether you know him

Soc I know the youth but I do not know his name he is the son of Euphronius the Sunian who was himself an eminent man and such another as his son is, according to your a count of him I believe that he left a considerable fortune.

Theod Theaetetus, Socrates, is his name but I rather think that the property disappeared in the hands of trustees notwithstanding which he is wonderfully liberal

Soc He must be a fine fellow tell him to come and sit by me

Theod I will Come hither Theaetetus and sit by Socrates.

Soc By all means Theaetetus in order that I may see the reflection of myself in your face for Theodorus says that we are alike and yet if each of us held in his hands a lyre and he said that they were tuned alike should we at once take his word or should we ask whether he who said so was or was not a musician?

Theaetetus We should ask.

Soc And if we found that he was we should take his word and if not, not?

Theaet True

Soc And if this supposed likeness of our faces is a matter of any interest to us, we should enquire whether he who says that we are alike is a painter or not?

[145] Theaet Certainly we should.

Soc And is Theodorus a painter?

Theaet I never heard that he was.

Soc Is he a geometrician?

Theaet Of course he is, Socrates.

Soc And is he an astronomer and calculator and musician and in general an educated man?

Theaet I think so

Soc If then he remarks on a similarity in our persons either by way of praise or blame, there is no particular reason why we should attend to him

Theaet I should say not

Soc But if he praises the virtue or wisdom which are the mental endowments of either of us, then he who hears the praises will naturally desire to examine him who is praised and he again should be willing to exhibit himself

Theaet Very true Socrates

Soc Then now is the time my dear Theaetetus for me to examine and for you to exhibit s nce although Theodorus has praised many a citizen and stranger in my hearing never did I hear him praise any one as he has been pra sing you

Theaet I am glad to hear it Socrates but what if he was only in jest?

Soc Nay Theodorus is not given to jesting and I cannot allow you to retract your consent on any such pretence as that If you do he will have to swear to his words and we are perfectly sure that no one will be found to impugn him Do not be shy then but stand to your word

Theaet I suppose I must, if you wish it

Soc In the first place I should like to ask what you learn of Theodorus something of geometry perhaps?

Theaet Yes

Soc And astronomy and harmony and calculation?

Theaet I do my best

Soc Yes my boy and so do I and my desire is to learn of him or of anybody who seems to understand these things And I get on pretty well in general but there is a little difficulty which I want you and the company to aid me in investigating Will you answer me a question Is not learning growing wiser about that which you learn?

Theaet Of course

Soc And by wisdom the wise are wise?

Theaet Yes

Soc And is that different in any way from knowledge?

Theaet What?

Soc Wisdom are not men wise in that which they know?

Theaet Certainly they are

Soc Then wisdom and knowledge are the same?

Theaet Yes

[146] Soc Herein lies the difficulty which I can never solve to my satisfaction—What is knowledge? Can we answer that question? What say you? which of us will speak first? whoever misses shall sit down as at a game of ball and shall be donkey as the boys say he who lasts out his competitors in the game without missing shall be our king and shall have the right of putting to us any questions which he pleases Why is there no reply? I hope Theodorus that I am not betrayed into rudeness by my love of conversation? I only want to make us talk and be friendly and sociable.

Theod The reverse of rudeness Socrates but I would rather that you would ask one of the young fellows for the truth is that I am unused to your game of question and answer and I am too old to learn the young will be more suitable and they will improve more than I shall for youth is always able to improve And so having made a beginning with Theaetetus I would advise you to go on with him and not let him off

Soc Do you hear Theaetetus what Theodorus says? The philosopher whom you would not like to disobey and whose word ought to be a command to a young man bids me interrogate you Take courage then and nobly say what you think that knowledge is

Theaet Well, Socrates I will answer as you and he bid me and if I make a mistake, you will doubtless correct me

Soc We will if we can

Theaet Then I think that the sciences which I learn from Theodorus—geometry and those which you just now mentioned—are knowledge and I would include the art of the cobbler and other craftsmen these each and all of them are knowledge

Soc Too much Theaetetus too much the nobility and liberality of your nature make you give many and diverse things when I am asking for one simple thing

Theaet What do you mean Socrates?

Soc Perhaps nothing I will endeavour however to explain what I believe to be my meaning When you speak of cobbling you mean the art or science of making shoes?

Theaet Just so

Soc And when you speak of carpentering you mean the art of making wooden implements?

Theaet I do

Soc In both cases you define the subject matter of each of the two arts?

Theaet True

Soc But that Theaetetus was not the point of my question we wanted to know not the subjects nor yet the number of the arts or sciences for we were not going to count them but we wanted to know the nature of knowledge in the abstract Am I not right?

Theaet Perfectly right

[147] Soc Let me offer an illustration Suppose that a person were to ask about some very trivial and obvious thing—for example What is clay? and we were to reply that there is a clay of potters there is a clay of oven makers there is a clay of brick makers would not the answer be ridiculous?

Theaet Truly

Soc In the first place, there would be an absurdity in assuming that he who asked the question would understand from our answer the nature of clay merely because we added of the image makers or of any other workers.

How can a man understand the name of any thing, when he does not know the nature of it?

Theaet He cannot

Soc Then he who does not know what science or knowledge is, has no knowledge of the art or science of making shoes?

Theaet None.

Soc Nor of any other science?

Theaet No

Soc And when a man is asked what science or knowledge is, to give in answer the name of some art or science is ridiculous for the question is, "What is knowledge? and he replies, A knowledge of this or that.

Theaet True

Soc Moreover he might answer shortly and simply but he makes an enormous circuit. For example, when asked about the clay he might have said simply that clay is moistened earth—what sort of clay is not to the point.

Theaet Yes, Socrates there is no difficulty as you put the question You mean if I am not mistaken something like what occurred to me and to my friend here, your namesake Socrates, in a recent discussion.

Soc What was that, Theaetetus?

Theaet Theodorus was writing out for us something about roots such as the roots of three or five, showing that they are incommensurable by the unit he selected other examples up to seventeen—there he stopped Now as there are innumerable roots, the notion occurred to us of attempting to include them all under one name or class.

Soc And did you find such a class?

Theaet I think that we did but I should like to have your opinion.

Soc Let me hear

Theaet We divided all numbers into two classes those which are made up of equal factors multiplying into one another which we compared to square figures and called square or equilateral numbers —that was one class.

Soc Very good

Theaet The intermediate numbers, such as three and five and every other number which is made up of unequal factors [148] either of a greater multiplied by a less or of a less multiplied by a greater and when regarded as a figure, is contained in unequal sides —all these we compared to oblong figures and called them oblong numbers

Soc Capital and what followed?

Theaet The lines or sides which have for their squares the equilateral plane numbers, were called by us lengths or magnitudes and the lines which are the roots of (or whose squares are equal to) the oblong numbers were called powers or roots the reason of this latter name being that they are commensurable with the former [i.e., with the so-called lengths or magnitudes] not in linear measurement but in the value of the superficial content of their squares and the same about solids

Soc Excellent, my boys I think that you fully justify the praises of Theodorus, and that he will not be found guilty of false witness

Theaet But I am unable, Socrates, to give you a similar answer about knowledge which is what you appear to want and therefore Theodorus is a deceiver after all

Soc Well but if some one were to praise you for running and to say that he never met your equal among boys, and afterwards you were beaten in a race by a grown up man, who was a great runner—would the praise be any the less true?

Theaet Certainly not

Soc And is the discovery of the nature of knowledge so small a matter as I just now said? Is it not one which would task the powers of men perfect in every way?

Theaet By heaven they should be the top of all perfection!

Soc Well then be of good cheer do not say that Theodorus was mistaken about you but do your best to ascertain the true nature of knowledge as well as of other things.

Theaet I am eager enough Socrates, if that would bring to light the truth

Soc Come, you made a good beginning just now let your own answer about roots be your model and as you comprehended them all in one class try and bring the many sorts of knowledge under one definition

Theaet I can assure you, Socrates, that I have tried very often when the report of questions asked by you was brought to me but I can neither persuade myself that I have a satisfactory answer to give nor hear of any one who answers as you would have him and I cannot shake off a feeling of anxiety

Soc These are the pangs of labour my dear Theaetetus you have something within you which you are bringing to the birth

Theaet I do not know Socrates I only say what I feel [149] Soc And have you never heard simpleton that I am the son of a midwife, brave and burly whose name was Phaenarete?

Theaet Yes I have

Soc And that I myself practise midwifery?

Theaet No never

Soc Let me tell you that I do though my friend but you must not reveal the secret as the world in general have not found me out and therefore they only say of me that I am the strangest of mortals and drive men to their wits end Did you ever hear that too?

Theaet Yes

Soc Shall I tell you the reason?

Theaet By all means

Soc Bear in mind the whole business of the midwives and then you will see my meaning better —No woman as you are probably aware who is still able to conceive and bear attends other women but only those who are past bearing

Theaet Yes I know

Soc The reason of this is said to be that Artemis—the goddess of childbirth—is not a mother and she honours those who are like herself but she could not allow the barren to be midwives because human nature cannot know the mystery of an art without experience and therefore she assigned this office to those who are too old to bear

Theaet I dare say

Soc And I dare say too or rather I am absolutely certain that the midwives know better than others who is pregnant and who is not?

Theaet Very true

Soc And by the use of potions and incantations they are able to arouse the pangs and to soothe them at will they can make those bear who have a difficulty in bearing and if they think fit they can smother the embryo in the womb

Theaet They can

Soc Did you ever remark that they are also most cunning matchmakers and have a thorough knowledge of what unions are likely to produce a brave brood?

Theaet No never

Soc Then let me tell you that this is their greatest pride more than cutting the umbilical cord And if you reflect you will see that the same art which cultivates and gathers in the fruits of the earth will be most likely to know in what soils the several plants or seeds should be deposited

Theaet Yes the same art

Soc And do you suppose that with women the case is otherwise?

[150] Theaet I should think not.

Soc Certainly not but midwives are respectable women who have a character to lose and they avoid this department of their profession, because they are afraid of being called procuresses which is a name given to those who join together man and woman in an unlawful and unscientific way and yet the true midwife is also the true and only matchmaker

Theaet Clearly

Soc Such are the midwives whose task is a very important one but not so important as mine for women do not bring into the world at one time real children and at another time counterfeits which are with difficulty distinguished from them if they did then the discernment of the true and false birth would be the crowning achievement of the art of midwifery—you would think so?

Theaet Indeed I should

Soc Well my art of midwifery is in most respects like theirs but differs in that I attend men and not women and I look after their souls when they are in labour and not after their bodies and the triumph of my art is in thoroughly examining whether the thought which the mind of the young man brings forth is a false idol or a noble and true birth And like the midwives I am barren and the reproach which is often made against me that I ask questions of others and have not the wit to answer them myself is very just—the reason is that the god compels me to be a midwife, but does not allow me to bring forth And therefore I am not myself at all wise nor have I anything to show which is the invention or birth of my own soul but those who converse with me profit Some of them appear dull enough at first but afterwards as our acquaintance ripens if the god is gracious to them they all make astonishing progress and this in the opinion of others as well as in their own It is quite clear that they never learned anything from me the many fine discoveries to which they cling are of their own making But to me and the god they owe their delivery And the proof of my words is that many of them in their ignorance either in their self conceit despising me or falling under the influence of others, have gone away too soon and have not only lost the children of whom I had previously delivered them by an ill bringing up but have stifled whatever else they had in them by evil communications, being fonder of lies and shams than of the truth and they have at last ended by seeing themselves as others see them to be great fools Aristeides the son of Lysimachus is one of them [151] and there are many others The truants often return to me, and beg that I would consort with them again—they are ready to go to me on their knees—and then, if my familiar allows, which is not always the case, I receive them, and they begin to grow again. Dire are the pangs which my art is able to arouse and to allay in those who consort with me, just like the pangs of women in childbirth; night and day they are full of perplexity and travail which is even worse than that of the women. So much for them. And there are others, Theaetetus, who come to me apparently having nothing in them; and as I know that they have no need of my art, I coax them into marrying some one, and by the grace of God I can generally tell who is likely to do them good. Many of them I have given away to Prodicus, and many to other inspired sages. I tell you this long story, friend Theaetetus, because I suspect, as indeed you seem to think yourself, that you are in labour—great with some conception. Come then to me, who am a midwife's son and myself a midwife, and do your best to answer the questions which I will ask you. And if I abstract and expose your first-born, because I discover upon inspection that the conception which you have formed is a vain shadow, do not quarrel with me on that account, as the manner of women is when their first children are taken from them. For I have actually known some who were ready to bite me when I deprived them of a darling folly; they did not perceive that I acted from good will, not knowing that no god is the enemy of man—that was not within the range of their ideas; neither am I their enemy in all this, but it would be wrong for me to admit falsehood, or to stifle the truth. Once more, then, Theaetetus, I repeat my old question, "What is knowledge?"—and do not say that you cannot tell; but quit yourself like a man, and by the help of God you will be able to tell.

Theaet. At any rate, Socrates, after such an exhortation I should be ashamed of not trying to do my best. Now he who knows perceives what he knows, and, as far as I can see at present, knowledge is perception.

Soc. Bravely said, boy; that is the way in which you should express your opinion. And now let us examine together this conception of yours, and see whether it is a true birth or a mere wind-egg:—You say that knowledge is perception?

Theaet. Yes.

Soc. Well, you have delivered yourself of a very important doctrine about knowledge; [152] it is indeed the opinion of Protagoras, who has another way of expressing it. Man, he says, is the measure of all things, of the existence of things that are, and of the non-existence of things that are not:—You have read him?

Theaet. O yes, again and again.

Soc. Does he not say that things are to you such as they appear to you, and to me such as they appear to me, and that you and I are men?

Theaet. Yes, he says so.

Soc. A wise man is not likely to talk nonsense. Let us try to understand him: the same wind is blowing, and yet one of us may be cold and the other not, or one may be slightly and the other very cold?

Theaet. Quite true.

Soc. Now is the wind, regarded not in relation to us but absolutely, cold or not; or are we to say, with Protagoras, that the wind is cold to him who is cold, and not to him who is not?

Theaet. I suppose the last.

Soc. Then it must appear so to each of them?

Theaet. Yes.

Soc. And "appears to him" means the same as "he perceives."

Theaet. True.

Soc. Then appearing and perceiving coincide in the case of hot and cold, and in similar instances; for things appear, or may be supposed to be, to each one such as he perceives them?

Theaet. Yes.

Soc. Then perception is always of existence, and being the same as knowledge is unerring?

Theaet. Clearly.

Soc. In the name of the Graces, what an almighty wise man Protagoras must have been! He spoke these things in a parable to the common herd, like you and me, but told the truth, his Truth, in secret to his own disciples.

Theaet. What do you mean, Socrates?

Soc. I am about to speak of a high argument, in which all things are said to be relative; you cannot rightly call anything by any name, such as great or small, heavy or light, for the great will be small and the heavy light—there is no single thing or quality, but out of motion and change and admixture all things are becoming relatively to one another, which "becoming" is by us incorrectly called being, but is really becoming, for nothing ever is, but all things are becoming. Summon all philosophers—Protagoras, Heracleitus, Empedocles, and the rest of them, one after another, and with the exception of Parmenides they will agree with you in this.

In allusion to a book of Protagoras' which bore this title.

Summon the great masters of either kind of poetry—Epicharmus the prince of Comedy and Homer of Tragedy when the latter sings of

O can whence sprang the gods and mother Tethys does he not mean that all things are the off spring of flux and motion?

Theaet I think so

[153] Soc And who could take up arms against such a great army having Homer for its general and not appear ridiculous? [1]

Theaet Who indeed Socrates?

Soc Yes Theaetetus and there are plenty of other proofs which will show that motion is the source of what is called being and becom ing and inactivity of not being and destruc tion for fire and warmth which are supposed to be the parent and guardian of all other things are born of movement and of friction which is a kind of motion —is not this the origin of fire?

Theaet It is

Soc And the race of animals is generated in the same way?

Theaet Certainly

Soc And is not the bodily habit spoiled by rest and idleness but preserved for a long time by motion and exercise?

Theaet True

Soc And what of the mental habit? Is not the soul informed and improved and pre served by study and attention which are mo tions but when at rest which in the soul only means want of attention and study is unin formed and speedily forgets whatever she has learned

Theaet True

Soc Then motion is a good and rest an evil to the soul as well as to the body?

Theaet Clearly

Soc I may add that breathless calm stillness and the like waste and impair while wind and storm preserve and the palmary argument of all which I strongly urge is the golden chain in Homer by which he means the sun thereby indicating that so long as the sun and the heavens go round in their orbits all things human and divine are and are preserved but if they were chained up and their motions ceased then all things would be destroyed and as the saying is turned upside down

Theaet I believe Socrates that you have truly explained his meaning

Soc Then now apply his doctrine to percep tion my good friend and first of all to vision that which you call white colour is not in your eyes and is not a distinct thing which exists out of them And you must not assign any place to it for if it had position it would be and be at rest, and there would be no process of be coming

Theaet Then what is colour?

Soc Let us carry out the principle which has just been affirmed that nothing is self-existent and then we shall see that white, black and every other colour arises out of the eye meeting the appropriate motion [154] and that what we call a colour is in each case neither the ac tive nor the passive element but something which passes between them and is peculiar to each percipient are you quite certain that the several colours appear to a dog or to any animal whatever as they appear to you?

Theaet Far from it

Soc Or that anything appears the same to you as to another man? Are you so profoundly convinced of this? Rather would it not be true that it never appears exactly the same to you because you are never exactly the same?

Theaet The latter

Soc And if that with which I compare my self in size or which I apprehend by touch were great or white or hot it could not become dif ferent by mere contact with another unless it actually changed nor again if the comparing or apprehending subject were great or white or hot could this when unchanged from with in become changed by any approximation or affection of any other thing The fact is that in our ordinary way of speaking we allow our selves to be driven into most ridiculous and wonderful contradictions as Protagoras and all who take his line of argument would remark

Theaet How? and of what sort do you mean?

Soc A little instance will sufficiently explain my meaning Here are six dice which are more by a half when compared with four and fewer by a half than twelve—they are more and also fewer How can you or any one maintain the contrary?

Theaet Very true

Soc Well then suppose that Protagoras or some one asks whether anything can become greater or more if not by increasing, how would you answer him Theaetetus?

Theaet I should say No Socrates if I were to speak my mind in reference to this last question and if I were not afraid of contradict ing my former answer

[1] Cf Cratylus 401 ff

Soc. Capital! excellent! spoken like an oracle, my boy! And if you reply "Yes," there will be a case for Euripides for our tongue will be convinced, but not our mind.

Theaet. Very true.

Soc. The thoroughbred Sophists, who know all that can be known about the mind, and argue only out of the superfluity of their wits, would have had a regular sparring match over this, and would have knocked their arguments together finely But you and I who have no professional aims, only desire to see what is the mutual relation of these principles—whether they are consistent with each other or not.

Theaet. Yes, that would be my desire.

Soc. And mine too. But since this is our feeling, and there is plenty of time, why should we not calmly and patiently review our own thoughts, [155] and thoroughly examine and see what these appearances in us really are? If I am not mistaken, they will be described by us as follows —first, that nothing can become greater or less, either in number or magnitude, while remaining equal to itself—you would agree?

Theaet. Yes.

Soc. Secondly that without addition or subtraction there is no increase or diminution of anything, but only equality

Theaet. Quite true.

Soc. Thirdly that what was not before cannot be afterwards, without becoming and having become.

Theaet. Yes, truly

Soc. These three axioms, if I am not mistaken, are fighting with one another in our minds in the case of the dice, or again, in such a case as this—if I were to say that I, who am of a certain height and taller than you, may within a year without gaining or losing in height, be not so tall—not that I should have lost, but that you would have increased. In such a case, I am afterwards what I once was not, and yet I have not become for I could not have become without becoming, neither could I have become less without losing somewhat of my height, and I could give you ten thousand examples of similar contradictions, if we admit them at all I believe that you follow me, Theaetetus for I suspect that you have thought of these questions before now

Theaet. Yes, Socrates, and I am amazed when I think of them by the Gods I am! and I want to know what on earth they mean and there are times when my head quite swims with the contemplation of them.

Soc. I see, my dear Theaetetus, that Theodorus had a true insight into your nature when he said that you were a philosopher for wonder is the feeling of a philosopher and philosophy begins in wonder He was not a bad genealogist who said that Iris (the messenger of heaven) is the child of Thaumas (wonder) But do you begin to see what is the explanation of this perplexity on the hypothesis which we attribute to Protagoras?

Theaet. Not as yet.

Soc. Then you will be obliged to me if I help you to unearth the hidden "truth" of a famous man or school

Theaet. To be sure, I shall be very much obliged

Soc. Take a look round, then, and see that none of the uninitiated are listening Now by the uninitiated I mean the people who believe in nothing but what they can grasp in their hands, and who will not allow that action or generation or anything invisible can have real existence.

Theaet. Yes, indeed, Socrates, they are very hard and impenetrable mortals.

[156] Soc. Yes, my boy outer barbarians. Far more ingenious are the brethren whose mysteries I am about to reveal to you Their first principle is, that all is motion, and upon this all the affections of which we were just now speaking are supposed to depend there is nothing but motion, which has two forms, one active and the other passive, both in endless number and out of the union and friction of them there is generated a progeny endless in number having two forms, sense and the object of sense, which are ever breaking forth and coming to the birth at the same moment. The senses are variously named hearing seeing, smelling there is the sense of heat, cold pleasure, pain, desire, fear and many more which have names, as well as innumerable others which are without them each has its kindred object—each variety of colour has a corresponding variety of sight, and so with sound and hearing, and with the rest of the senses and the objects akin to them Do you see, Theaetetus, the bearings of this tale on the preceding argument?

Theaet. Indeed I do not.

Soc. Then attend, and I will try to finish the story The purport is that all these things are in motion, as I was saying and that this motion is of two kinds, a slower and a quicker and the slower elements have their motions in the same place and with reference to things near them and so they beget but what is begotten is swifter for it is carried to and fro and moves from place to place Apply this to sense —When the eye and the appropriate object meet together and give birth to whiteness and the sensation connatural with it which could not have been given by either of them going elsewhere then while the sight is flowing from the eye whiteness proceeds from the object which combines in producing the colour and so the eye is fulfilled with sight and really sees and becomes not sight but a seeing eye and the object which combined to form the colour is fulfilled with whiteness and becomes not whiteness but a white thing whether wood or stone or whatever the object may be which happens to be coloured white And this is true of all sensible objects hard warm and the like which are similarly to be regarded [157] as I was saying before not as having any absolute existence, but as being all of them of whatever kind generated by motion in their intercourse with one another for of the agent and patient as existing in separation no trustworthy conception as they say, can be formed for the agent has no existence until united with the patient and the patient has no existence until united with the agent and that which by uniting with something becomes an agent by meeting with some other thing is converted into a patient And from all these considerations as I said at first there arises a general reflection that there is no one self-existent thing but everything is becoming and in relation and being must be altogether abolished although from habit and ignorance we are compelled even in this discussion to retain the use of the term But great philosophers tell us that we are not to allow either the word something or belonging to something or to me or this or that or any other detaining name to be used in the language of nature all things are being created and destroyed coming into being and passing into new forms nor can any name fix or detain them he who attempts to fix them is easily refuted And this should be the way of speaking not only of particulars but of aggregates such aggregates as are expressed in the word man or stone or any name of an animal or of a class O Theaetetus are not these speculations sweet as honey? And do you not like the taste of them in the mouth?

Theaet I do not know what to say Socrates for indeed, I cannot make out whether you are giving your own opinion or only wanting to draw me out

Soc You forget my friend that I neither know nor profess to know anything of these matters you are the person who is in labour I am the barren midwife and this is why I soothe you and offer you one good thing after another that you may taste them And I hope that I may at last help to bring your own opinion into the light of day when this has been accomplished then we will determine whether what you have brought forth is only a wind-egg or a real and genuine birth Therefore keep up your spirits and answer like a man what you think

Theaet Ask me

Soc Then once more Is it your opinion that nothing is but what becomes?—the good and the noble as well as all the other things which we were just now mentioning?

Theaet When I hear you discoursing in this style I think that there is a great deal in what you say and I am very ready to assent

Soc Let us not leave the argument unfinished then for there still remains to be considered an objection which may be raised about dreams and diseases in particular about madness and the various illusions of hearing and sight or of other senses For you know that in all these cases the esse percipi theory appears to be [158] unmistakably refuted since in dreams and illusions we certainly have false perceptions and far from saying that everything is which appears we should rather say that nothing is which appears

Soc But then my boy how can any one contend that knowledge is perception or that to every man what appears is?

Theaet I am afraid to say Socrates, that I have nothing to answer because you rebuked me just now for making this excuse but I certainly cannot undertake to argue that madmen or dreamers think truly when they imagine some of them that they are gods and others that they can fly and are flying in their sleep

Soc Do you see another question which can be raised about these phenomena notably about dreaming and waking?

Theaet What question?

Soc A question which I think that you must often have heard persons ask —How can you determine whether at this moment we are sleeping and all our thoughts are a dream or whether we are awake and talking to one another in the waking state?

Theaet. Indeed, Socrates, I do not know how to prove the one any more than the other for in both cases the facts precisely correspond and there is no difficulty in supposing that during all this discussion we have been talking to one another in a dream and when in a dream we seem to be narrating dreams, the resemblance of the two states is quite astonishing

Soc You see, then, that a doubt about the reality of sense is easily raised, since there may even be a doubt whether we are awake or in a dream. And as our time is equally divided between sleeping and waking, in either sphere of existence the soul contends that the thoughts which are present to our minds at the time are true and during one half of our lives we affirm the truth of the one, and, during the other half, of the other and are equally confident of both.

Theaet Most true.

Soc And may not the same be said of madness and other disorders the difference is only that the times are not equal.

Theaet. Certainly

Soc And is truth or falsehood to be determined by duration of time?

Theaet That would be in many ways ridiculous.

Soc But can you certainly determine by any other means which of these opinions is true?

Theaet. I do not think that I can

Soc Listen, then, to a statement of the other side of the argument, which is made by the champions of appearance. They would say as I imagine—Can that which is wholly other than something have the same quality as that from which it differs and observe, Theaetetus, that the word "other" means not "partially but wholly other

[159] Theaet Certainly putting the question as you do, that which is wholly other cannot either potentially or in any other way be the same

Soc And must therefore be admitted to be unlike

Theaet True.

Soc If, then, anything happens to become like or unlike itself or another when it becomes like we call it the same—when unlike, other?

Theaet. Certainly

Soc Were we not saying that there are agents many and infinite, and patients many and infinite?

Theaet. Yes.

Soc And also that different combinations will produce results which are not the same but different?

Theaet Certainly

Soc Let us take you and me, or anything, as an example —There is Socrates in health, and Socrates sick—Are they like or unlike?

Theaet You mean to compare Socrates in health as a whole and Socrates in sickness as a whole?

Soc Exactly that is my meaning

Theaet I answer they are unlike.

Soc And if unlike, they are other?

Theaet Certainly

Soc And would you not say the same of Socrates sleeping and waking or in any of the states which we were mentioning?

Theaet. I should

Soc All agents have a different patient in Socrates, accordingly as he is well or ill.

Theaet. Of course.

Soc And I who am the patient, and that which is the agent, will produce something different in each of the two cases?

Theaet. Certainly

Soc The wine which I drink when I am in health, appears sweet and pleasant to me?

Theaet True.

Soc For as has been already acknowledged the patient and agent meet together and produce sweetness and a perception of sweetness, which are in simultaneous motion, and the perception which comes from the patient makes the tongue percipient, and the quality of sweetness which arises out of and is moving about the wine, makes the wine both to be and to appear sweet to the healthy tongue.

Theaet Certainly that has been already acknowledged.

Soc But when I am sick, the wine really acts upon another and a different person?

Theaet. Yes.

Soc The combination of the draught of wine, and the Socrates who is sick, produces quite another result which is the sensation of bitterness in the tongue, and the motion and creation of bitterness in and about the wine, which becomes not bitterness but something bitter as I myself become not perception but percipient?

Theaet. True.

Soc There is no other object of which I shall ever have the same perception, [160] for another object would give another perception, and would make the percipient other and different, nor can that object which affects me, meeting another subject, produce the same, or become similar for that too will produce another result from another subject and become different

Theaet True

Soc Neither can I by myself have this sensation nor the object by itself, this quality

Theaet Certainly not

Soc When I perceive I must become percipient of something—there can be no such thing as perceiving and perceiving nothing the object whether it become sweet bitter or of any other quality must have relation to a percipient nothing can become sweet which is sweet to no one

Theaet Certainly not

Soc Then the inference is that we [the agent and patient] are or become in relation to one another there is a law which binds us one to the other but not to any other existence nor each of us to himself and therefore we can only be bound to one another so that whether a person says that a thing is or becomes he must say that it is or becomes to or of or in relation to something else but he must not say or allow any one else to say that anything is or becomes absolutely —such is our conclusion

Theaet Very true, Socrates

Soc Then if that which acts upon me has relation to me and to no other I and no other am the percipient of it?

Theaet Of course

Soc Then my perception is true to me being inseparable from my own being and as Protagoras says to myself I am judge of what is and what is not to me

Theaet I suppose so

Soc How then if I never err and if my mind never trips in the conception of being or becoming can I fail of knowing that which I perceive?

Theaet You cannot

Soc Then you were quite right in affirming that knowledge is only perception and the meaning turns out to be the same whether with Homer and Heracleitus and all that company you say that all is motion and flux or with the great sage Protagoras that man is the measure of all things or with Theaetetus that given these premises perception is knowledge Am I not right Theaetetus and is not this your new born child of which I have delivered you? What say you?

Theaet I cannot but agree Socrates

Soc Then this is the child however he may turn out which you and I have with difficulty brought into the world And now that he is born [161] we must run round the hearth with him and see whether he is worth rearing, or is only a wind-egg and a sham Is he to be reared in any case and not exposed? or will you bear to see him rejected and not get into a passion if I take away your first born?

Theod Theaetetus will not be angry for he is very good natured But tell me, Socrates in heaven s name is this after all not the truth?

Soc You Theodorus are a lover of theories and now you innocently fancy that I am a bag full of them and can easily pull one out which will overthrow its predecessor But you do not see that in reality none of these theories come from me they all come from him who talks with me I only know just enough to extract them from the wisdom of another and to receive them in a spirit of fairness And now I shall say nothing myself but shall endeavour to elicit something from our young friend

Theod Do as you say Socrates you are quite right

Soc Shall I tell you Theodorus, what amazes me in your acquaintance Protagoras?

Theod What is it?

Soc I am charmed with his doctrine, that what appears is to each one but I wonder that he did not begin his book on Truth with a declaration that a pig or a dog faced baboon or some other yet stranger monster which has sensation is the measure of all things then he might have shown a magnificent contempt for our opinion of him by informing us at the outset that while we were reverencing him like a God for his wisdom he was no better than a tadpole not to speak of his fellow men—would not this have produced an overpowering effect? For if truth is only sensation and no man can discern another s feelings better than he or has any superior right to determine whether his opinion is true or false but each as we have several times repeated is to himself the sole judge and everything that he judges is true and right why my friend should Protagoras be preferred to the place of wisdom and instruction and deserve to be well paid and we poor ignoramuses have to go to him if each one is the measure of his own wisdom? Must he not be talking ad captandum in all this? I say nothing of the ridiculous predicament in which my own midwifery and the whole art of dialectic is placed for the attempt to supervise or refute the notions or opinions of others would be a tedious and enormous piece of folly [162] if to each man his own are right and this must be the case if Protagoras Truth is the real truth and the philosopher is not merely amusing himself by giving oracles out of the shrine of his book

Theod He was a friend of mine Socrates as you were saying, and therefore I cannot have him refuted by my lips nor can I oppose you when I agree with you please then to take Theaetetus again he seemed to answer very nicely

Soc If you were to go into a Lacedaemonian palestra, Theodorus, would you have a right to look on at the naked wrestlers, some of them making a poor figure, if you did not strip and give them an opportunity of judging of your own person?

Theod Why not, Socrates, if they would allow me, as I think you will in consideration of my age and stiffness let some more supple youth try a fall with you and do not drag me into the gymnasium

Soc Your will is my will Theodorus as the proverbial philosophers say and therefore I will return to the sage Theaetetus Tell me, Theaetetus in reference to what I was saying are you not lost in wonder like myself when you find that all of a sudden you are raised to the level of the wisest of men or indeed of the gods?—for you would assume the measure of Protagoras to apply to the gods as well as men?

Theaet Certainly I should and I confess to you that I am lost in wonder At first hearing I was quite satisfied with the doctrine, that whatever appears is to each one but now the face of things has changed

Soc Why my dear boy you are young and therefore your ear is quickly caught and your mind influenced by popular arguments. Protagoras, or some one speaking on his behalf will doubtless say in reply —Good people young and old you meet and harangue and bring in the gods whose existence or non-existence I banish from writing and speech or you talk about the reason of man being degraded to the level of the brutes which is a telling argument with the multitude, but not one word of proof or demonstration do you offer All is probability with you, and yet surely you and Theodorus had better reflect whether you are disposed to admit of probability and figures of speech in matters of such importance [163] He or any other mathematician who argued from probabilities and likelihoods in geometry would not be worth an ace

Theaet But neither you nor we Socrates, would be satisfied with such arguments

Soc Then you and Theodorus mean to say that we must look at the matter in some other way?

Theaet Yes in quite another way

Soc And the way will be to ask whether perception is or is not the same as knowledge for this was the real point of our argument and with a view to this we raised (did we not?) those many strange questions

Theaet Certainly

Soc Shall we say that we know every thing which we see and hear? for example shall we say that not having learned we do not hear the language of foreigners when they speak to us? or shall we say that we not only hear but know what they are saying? Or again if we see letters which we do not understand shall we say that we do not see them? or shall we aver that seeing them we must know them?

Theaet We shall say Socrates that we know what we actually see and hear of them—that is to say we see and know the figure and colour of the letters, and we hear and know the elevation or depression of the sound of them but we do not perceive by sight and hearing or know that which grammarians and interpreters teach about them

Soc Capital Theaetetus and about this there shall be no dispute because I want you to grow but there is another difficulty coming which you will also have to repulse

Theaet What is it?

Soc Some one will say Can a man who has ever known anything and still has and preserves a memory of that which he knows, not know that which he remembers at the time when he remembers? I have I fear a tedious way of putting a simple question which is only whether a man who has learned and remembers can fail to know?

Theaet Impossible, Socrates the supposition is monstrous

Soc Am I talking nonsense then? Think is not seeing perceiving and is not sight perception?

Theaet True

Soc And if our recent definition holds every man knows that which he has seen?

Theaet Yes

Soc And you would admit that there is such a thing as memory?

Theaet Yes

Soc And is memory of something or of nothing?

Theaet Of something surely

Soc Of things learned and perceived that is?

Theaet Certainly

Soc Often a man remembers that which he has seen?

Theaet True

Soc And if he closed his eyes would he forget?

[164] Theaet Who Socrates would dare to say so?

Soc But we must say so if the previous argument is to be maintained

Theaet What do you mean? I am not quite sure that I understand you though I have a strong suspicion that you are right

Soc As thus he who sees knows as we say that which he sees for perception and sight and knowledge are admitted to be the same

Theaet Certainly

Soc But he who saw, and has knowledge of that which he saw remembers when he closes his eyes that which he no longer sees

Theaet True

Soc And seeing is knowing, and therefore not seeing is not knowing?

Theaet Very true

Soc Then the inference is that a man may have attained the knowledge of something which he may remember and yet not know because he does not see and this has been affirmed by us to be a monstrous supposition

Theaet Most true

Soc Thus then the assertion that knowledge and perception are one involves a manifest impossibility?

Theaet Yes

Soc Then they must be distinguished?

Theaet I suppose that they must

Soc Once more we shall have to begin and ask What is knowledge? and yet Theaetetus what are we going to do?

Theaet About what?

Soc Like a good for nothing cock without having won the victory we walk away from the argument and crow

Theaet How do you mean?

Soc After the manner of disputers we were satisfied with mere verbal consistency and were well pleased if in this way we could gain an advantage Although professing not to be mere Eristics but philosophers I suspect that we have unconsciously fallen into the error of that ingenious class of persons

Theaet I do not as yet understand you

Soc Then I will try to explain myself just now we asked the question whether a man who had learned and remembered could fail to know and we showed that a person who had seen might remember when he had his eyes shut and could not see and then he would at the same time remember and not know But this was an impossibility And so the Protagorean fable came to nought, and yours also who maintained that knowledge is the same as perception

Soc And yet my friend I rather suspect that the result would have been different if Protagoras who was the father of the first of the two brats had been alive he would have had a great deal to say on their behalf But he is dead and we insult over his orphan child and even the guardians whom he left and of whom our friend Theodorus is one are unwilling to give any help and therefore I suppose that I must take up his cause myself and see justice done?

[165] Theod Not I Socrates but rather Callias the son of Hipponicus, is guardian of his orphans I was too soon diverted from the abstractions of dialectic to geometry Nevertheless I shall be grateful to you if you assist him

Soc Very good Theodorus you shall see how I will come to the rescue If a person does not attend to the meaning of terms as they are commonly used in argument he may be involved even in greater paradoxes than these Shall I explain this matter to you or to Theaetetus?

Theod To both of us and let the younger answer he will incur less disgrace if he is discomfited

Soc Then now let me ask the awful question which is this —Can a man know and also not know that which he knows?

Theod How shall we answer Theaetetus?

Theaet He cannot I should say

Soc He can if you maintain that seeing is knowing When you are imprisoned in a well as the saying is and the self assured adversary closes one of your eyes with his hand and asks whether you can see his cloak with the eye which he has closed how will you answer the inevitable man?

Theaet I should answer Not with that eye but with the other

Soc Then you see and do not see the same thing at the same time

Theaet Yes in a certain sense

Soc None of that he will reply I do not ask or bid you answer in what sense you know but only whether you know that which you do not know You have been proved to see that which you do not see and you have already admitted

Lysis 216 Phaedo 90 101 Republic v 453 ff

that seeing is knowing and that not seeing is not-knowing I leave you to draw the inference.

Theaet Yes, the inference is the contradictory of my assertion.

Soc Yes, my marvel and there might have been yet worse things in store for you, if an opponent had gone on to ask whether you can have a sharp and also a dull knowledge, and whether you can know near but not at a distance, or know the same thing with more or less intensity and so on without end. Such questions might have been put to you by a light armed mercenary who argued for pay He would have lain in wait for you, and when you took up the position that sense is knowledge, he would have made an assault upon hearing smelling and the other senses —he would have shown you no mercy and while you were lost in envy and admiration of his wisdom, he would have got you into his net, out of which you would not ha e escaped until you had come to an understanding about the sum to be paid for your release Well, you ask, and how will Protagoras reinforce his position? Shall I answer for him?

Theaet. By all means.

Soc He will repeat all those things which we have been urging on his behalf [166] and then he will close w th us in disdain and say —The worthy Socrates asked a little boy whether the same man could remember and not know the same thing and the boy said No because he was frightened, and could not see what was coming and then Socrates made fun of poor me. The truth is, O slatternly Socrates that when you ask questions about any assertion of mine, and the person asked is found tripping if he has answered as I sh uld ha e answered then I am refuted, but if he answers something else then he is refuted and not I For do you really suppose that any one would admit the memory which a man has of an impression which has passed away to be the same with that which h exper enced at the time? Assuredly not. Or would he hesitate to acknowledge that the same man may know and not know the same thing? Or if he is afraid of making this admission, would he e er grant that one who has become unl ke s the sam as before he became unl ke? Or w uld he admit that a man is on at all and not ther many and infinite as the hanges wh ch take place in him? I speak by the card in ord r to avo d entanglements of words. But, O my good sir he will say come to the argument n a more generous spirit and eith r show if you can, that our sensations are not relative and individual or if you admit them to be so, prove that this does not involve the consequence that the appearance becomes or if you will have the word is, to the individual only As to your talk about pigs and baboons, you are yourself behaving like a pig and you teach your hearers to make sport of my writings in the same ignorant manner but this is not to your credit. For I declare that the truth is as I have written and that each of us is a measure of existence and of non-existence Yet one man may be a thousand times better than another in proportion as different things are and appear to him

And I am far from saying that wisdom and the wise man have no existence but I say that the wise man is he who makes the evils which appear and are to a man into goods which are and appear to him And I would beg you not to press my words in the letter but to take the meaning of them as I will explain them Remember what has been already said —that to the sick man his food appears to be and is b t ter and to the man in health the opposite of bitter Now I cannot conceive that one of these men can be or ought to be made wiser than the other [167] nor can you assert that the sick man because he has one impression is foolish and the healthy man because he has another is wise but the one state requires to be changed into the other the vorse into the better As in education, a change of state has to be effected, and the sophist accomplishes by words the change which the physician works by the aid of drugs Not that any one ever made another think truly who prev ously thought falsely For no one can think what is not, or think any thing different from that which he feels and th s is always true But as the inferior habit of mind has thoughts of kindred nature, so I conceive that a good mind causes men to have good thoughts and these which the inexperienced call true, I maintain to be only better and not truer than others And O my dear Socrates I do not call w se men tadpoles far from it I say that they are the physicians of the human body and the husbandmen of plants—for the husbandmen also take away the evil and disordered sensations of plants, and infuse into them good and healthy sensations—aye and true ones and the wise and good rhetoricians make the good instead of the evil to seem just to states for whatever appears to a state to be just and fair so long as it is regarded as such is just and fair to it but the teacher of wisdom causes the good to take the place of the evil

both in appearance and in reality And in like manner the Sophist who is able to train his pupils in this spirit is a wise man and deserves to be well paid by them And so one man is wiser than another, and no one thinks falsely and you whether you will or not, must endure to be a measure On these foundations the argument stands firm which you Socrates may if you please overthrow by an opposite argument or if you like you may put questions to me—a method to which no intelligent person will object quite the reverse But I must beg you to put fair questions for there is great inconsistency in saying that you have a zeal for virtue and then always behaving unfairly in argument The unfairness of which I complain is that you do not distinguish between mere disputation and dialectic the disputer may trip up his opponent as often as he likes, and make fun but the dialectician will be in earnest and only correct his adversary when necessary telling him the errors into which he has fallen through his own fault or that of the company which he has previously kept [168] If you do so your adversary will lay the blame of his own confusion and perplexity on himself and not on you He will follow and love you and will hate himself and escape from himself into philosophy in order that he may become different from what he was But the other mode of arguing which is practised by the many will have just the opposite effect upon him and as he grows older instead of turning philosopher he will come to hate philosophy I would recommend you therefore as I said before not to encourage yourself in this polemical and controversial temper but to find out in a friendly and congenial spirit what we really mean when we say that all things are in motion and that to every individual and state what appears is In this manner you will consider whether knowledge and sensation are the same or different but you will not argue as you were just now doing from the customary use of names and words which the vulgar pervert in all sorts of ways causing infinite perplexity to one another Such Theodorus is the very slight help which I am able to offer to your old friend had he been living he would have helped himself in a far more gloriose style.

Theod You are jesting Socrates indeed your defence of him has been most valorous

Soc Thank you friend and I hope that you observed Protagoras bidding us be serious as the text Man is the measure of all things was a solemn one and he reproached us with making a boy the medium of discourse, and said that the boy s timidity was made to tell against his argument he also declared that we made a joke of him

Theod How could I fail to observe all that, Socrates?

Soc Well and shall we do as he says?

Theod By all means

Soc But if his wishes are to be regarded you and I must take up the argument and in all seriousness and ask and answer one another for you see that the rest of us are nothing but boys In no other way can we escape the imputation that in our fresh analysis of his thesis we are making fun with boys

Theod Well but is not Theaetetus better able to follow a philosophical enquiry than a great many men who have long beards?

So Yes Theodorus but not better than you and therefore please not to imagine that I am to defend by every means in my power your departed friend [169] and that you are to defend nothing and nobody At any rate my good man do not sheer off until we know whether you are a true measure of diagrams or whether all men are equally measures and sufficient for themselves in astronomy and geometry and the other branches of knowledge in which you are supposed to excel them

Theod He who is sitting by you Socrates, will not easily avoid being drawn into an argument and when I said just now that you would excuse me and not like the Lacedaemonians compel me to strip and fight, I was talking nonsense—I should rather compare you to Scirrhon who threw travellers from the rocks for the Lacedaemonian rule is strip or depart but you seem to go about your work more after the fashion of Antaeus you will not allow any one who approaches you to depart until you have stripped him and he has been compelled to try a fall with you in argument

Soc There Theodorus you have hit off precisely the nature of my complaint but I am even more pugnacious than the giants of old for I have met with no end of heroes many a Heracles many a Theseus mighty in words has broken my head nevertheless I am always at this rough exercise which inspires me like a passion Please then to try a fall with me whereby you will do yourself good as well as me

Theod I consent lead me whither you will for I know that you are like destiny no man can escape from any argument which you may weave for him But I am not disposed to go further than you suggest

Soc Once will be enough and now take particular care that we do not again unwittingly expose ourselves to the reproach of talking childishly

Theod I will do my best to avoid that error

Soc In the first place, let us return to our old objection, and see whether we were right in blaming and taking offence at Protagoras on the ground that he assumed all to be equal and sufficient in wisdom although he admitted that there was a better and worse, and that in respect of this some who as he said were the wise excelled others

Theod Very true

Soc Had Protagoras been living and answered for himself instead of our answering for him there would have been no need of our reviewing or reinforcing the argument But as he is not here and some one may accuse us of speaking without authority on his behalf had we not better come to a clearer agreement about his meaning for a great deal may be at stake?

Theod True.

[170] Soc Then let us obtain not through any third person but from his own statement and in the fewest words possible, the basis of agreement

Theod In what way?

Soc In this way —His words are What seems to a man is to him

Theod Yes so he says

Soc And are not we Protagoras, uttering the opinion of man or rather of all mankind when we say that every one thinks himself wiser than other men in some things and their inferior in others? In the hour of danger when they are in perils of war or of the sea or of sickness do they not look up to their commanders as if they were gods and expect salvation from them only because they excel them in knowledge? Is not the world full of men in their several employments who are looking for teachers and rulers of themselves and of the animals and there are plenty who think that they are able to teach and able to rule Now in all this is implied that ignorance and wisdom exist among them at least in their own opinion

Theod Certainly

Soc And wisdom is assumed by them to be true thought, and ignorance to be false opinion

Theod Exactly

Soc How then, Protagoras would you have us treat the argument? Shall we say that the opinions of men are always true or sometimes true and sometimes false? In either case the result is the same and their opinions are not always true, but sometimes true and sometimes false For tell me Theodorus do you suppose that you yourself or any other follower of Protagoras would contend that no one deems another ignorant or mistaken in his opinion?

Theod The thing is incredible Socrates

Soc And yet that absurdity is necessarily involved in the thesis which declares man to be the measure of all things

Theod How so?

Soc Why suppose that you determine in your own mind something to be true and declare your opinion to me let us assume as he argues that this is true to you Now if so, you must either say that the rest of us are not the judges of this opinion or judgment of yours, or that we judge you always to have a true opinion? But are there not thousands upon thousands who whenever you form a judgment take up arms against you and are of an opposite judgment and opinion deeming that you judge falsely?

Theod Yes indeed Socrates thousands and tens of thousands, as Homer says who give me a world of trouble.

Soc Well but are we to assert that what you think is true to you and false to the ten thousand others?

Theod No other inference seems to be possible

Soc And how about Protagoras himself? If neither he nor the multitude thought, as indeed they do not think, that man is the measure of all things [171] must it not follow that the truth of which Protagoras wrote would be true to no one? But if you suppose that he himself thought this and that the multitude does not agree with him you must begin by allowing that in whatever proportion the many are more than one in that proportion his truth is more untrue than true

Theod That would follow if the truth is supposed to vary with individual opinion

Soc And the best of the joke is that he acknowledges the truth of their opinion who believe his own opinion to be false for he admits that the opinions of all men are true

Theod Certainly

Soc And does he not allow that his own opinion is false if he admits that the opinion of those who think him false is true?

Theod Of course

Soc Whereas the other side do not admit that they speak falsely?

Theod They do not

Soc And he as may be inferred from his writings agrees that this opinion is also true

Theod Clearly

Soc Then all mankind beginning with Protagoras will contend or rather I should say that he will allow, when he concedes that his adversary has a true opinion—Protagoras I say will himself allow that neither a dog nor any ordinary man is the measure of anything which he has not learned—am I not right?

Theod Yes

Soc And the truth of Protagoras being doubted by all will be true neither to himself nor to any one else?

Theod I think Socrates that we are running my old friend too hard

Soc But I do not know that we are going beyond the truth Doubtless as he is older he may be expected to be wiser than we are And if he could only just get his head out of the world below he would have overthrown both of us again and again me for talking nonsense and you for assenting to me and have been off and underground in a trice But as he is not within call we must make the best use of our own faculties such as they are and speak out what appears to us to be true And one thing which no one will deny is that there are great differences in the understandings of men

Theod In that opinion I quite agree

Soc And is there not most likely to be firm ground in the distinction which we were indicating on behalf of Protagoras viz that most things and all immediate sensations such as hot dry sweet are only such as they appear if however difference of opinion is to be allowed at all surely we must allow it in respect of health or disease? for every woman child or living creature has not such a knowledge of what conduces to health as to enable them to cure themselves

Theod I quite agree

[172] Soc Or again in politics while affirming that just and unjust honourable and disgraceful holy and unholy are in reality to each state such as the state thinks and makes lawful and that in determining these matters no individual or state is wiser than another still the followers of Protagoras will not deny that in determining what is or is not expedient for the community one state is wiser and one counsellor better than another—they will scarcely venture to maintain that what a city enacts in the belief that it is expedient will always be really expedient But in the other case I mean when they speak of justice and injustice, piety and impiety, they are confident that in nature these have no existence or essence of their own —the truth is that which is agreed on at the time of the agreement and as long as the agreement lasts and this is the philosophy of many who do not altogether go along with Protagoras Here arises a new question Theodorus which threatens to be more serious than the last.

Theod Well Socrates we have plenty of leisure

Soc That is true, and your remark recalls to my mind an observation which I have often made that those who have passed their days in the pursuit of philosophy are ridiculously at fault when they have to appear and speak in court How natural is this!

Theod What do you mean?

Soc I mean to say that those who have been trained in philosophy and liberal pursuits are as unlike those who from their youth upwards have been knocking about in the courts and such places as a freeman is in breeding unlike a slave

Theod In what is the difference seen?

Soc In the leisure spoken of by you which a freeman can always command he has his talk out in peace and like ourselves he wanders at will from one subject to another and from a second to a third—if the fancy takes him he begins again as we are doing now caring not whether his words are many or few his only aim is to attain the truth But the lawyer is always in a hurry there is the water of the clepsydra driving him on and not allowing him to expatiate at will and there is his adversary standing over him enforcing his rights the indictment which in their phraseology is termed the affidavit is recited at the time and from this he must not deviate He is a servant and is continually disputing about a fellow servant before his master who is seated and has the cause in his hands the trial is never about some indifferent matter but always concerns himself [173] and often the race is for his life The consequence has been that he has become keen and shrewd he has learned how to flatter his master in word and indulge him in deed but his soul is small and unrighteous His condition which has been that of a slave from his youth upwards has deprived him of growth and uprightness and independence dangers and fears which were too much for his truth and honesty came upon him in early years when the tenderness of youth was unequal to them and he has been driven into crooked ways from the first he has practised deception and retaliation, and has become stunted and warped. And so he has passed out of youth into manhood, having no soundness in him; and is now, as he thinks, a master in wisdom. Such is the lawyer, Theodorus. Will you have the companion picture of the philosopher, who is of our brotherhood; or shall we return to the argument? Do not let us abuse the freedom of digression which we claim.

Theod. Nay, Socrates, not until we have finished what we are about; for you truly said that we belong to a brotherhood which is free, and are not the servants of the argument; but the argument is our servant, and must wait our leisure. Who is our judge? Or where is the spectator having any right to censure or control us, as he might the poets?

Soc. Then, as this is your wish, I will describe the leaders; for there is no use in talking about the inferior sort. In the first place, the lords of philosophy have never, from their youth upwards, known their way to the Agora, or the dicastery, or the council, or any other political assembly; they neither see nor hear the laws or decrees, as they are called, of the state written or recited; the eagerness of political societies in the attainment of offices—clubs, and banquets, and revels, and singing-maidens,—do not enter even into their dreams. Whether any event has turned out well or ill in the city, what disgrace may have descended to any one from his ancestors, male or female, are matters of which the philosopher no more knows than he can tell, as they say, how many pints are contained in the ocean. Neither is he conscious of his ignorance. For he does not hold aloof in order that he may gain a reputation; but the truth is, that the outer form of him only is in the city: his mind, disdaining the littlenesses and nothingnesses of human things, is 'flying all abroad' as Pindar says, measuring earth and heaven and the things which are under and on the earth and above the heaven, interrogating the whole nature of each and all in their entirety [174] but not condescending to anything which is within reach.

Theod. What do you mean, Socrates?

Soc. I will illustrate my meaning, Theodorus, by the jest which the clever witty Thracian handmaid is said to have made about Thales, when he fell into a well as he was looking up at the stars. She said, that he was so eager to know what was going on in heaven, that he could not see what was before his feet. This is a jest which is equally applicable to all philosophers. For the philosopher is wholly unacquainted with his next-door neighbour; he is ignorant, not only of what he is doing, but he hardly knows whether he is a man or an animal; he is searching into the essence of man, and busy in enquiring what belongs to such a nature to do or suffer different from any other;—I think that you understand me, Theodorus?

Theod. I do, and what you say is true.

Soc. And thus, my friend, on every occasion, private as well as public, as I said at first, when he appears in a law-court, or in any place in which he has to speak of things which are at his feet and before his eyes, he is the jest, not only of Thracian handmaids but of the general herd, tumbling into wells and every sort of disaster through his inexperience. His awkwardness is fearful, and gives the impression of imbecility. When he is reviled, he has nothing personal to say in answer to the civilities of his adversaries, for he knows no scandals of any one, and they do not interest him; and therefore he is laughed at for his sheepishness; and when others are being praised and glorified, in the simplicity of his heart he cannot help going into fits of laughter, so that he seems to be a downright idiot. When he hears a tyrant or king eulogized, he fancies that he is listening to the praises of some keeper of cattle—a swineherd, or shepherd, or perhaps a cowherd, who is congratulated on the quantity of milk which he squeezes from them; and he remarks that the creature whom they tend, and out of whom they squeeze the wealth, is of a less tractable and more insidious nature. Then, again, he observes that the great man is of necessity as ill-mannered and uneducated as any shepherd—for he has no leisure, and he is surrounded by a wall, which is his mountain pen. Hearing of enormous landed proprietors of ten thousand acres and more, our philosopher deems this to be a trifle, because he has been accustomed to think of the whole earth; and when they sing the praises of family, and say that someone is a gentleman because he can show seven generations of wealthy ancestors, he thinks that their sentiments only betray a dull and narrow vision in those [175] who utter them, and who are not educated enough to look at the whole, nor to consider that every man has had thousands and ten thousands of progenitors, and among them have been rich and poor, kings and slaves, Hellenes and barbarians, innumerable. And when people pride themselves on having a pedigree of twenty-five ancestors, which goes back to Heracles, the son of Amphitryon, he cannot understand their poverty of ideas Why are they unable to calculate that Amphitryon had a twenty fifth ancestor who might have been anybody and was such as fortune made him and he had a fiftieth and so on? He amuses himself with the notion that they cannot count, and thinks that a little arithmetic would have got rid of their senseless vanity Now in all these cases our philosopher is derided by the vulgar partly because he is thought to despise them and also because he is ignorant of what is before him and always at a loss

Theod That is very true, Socrates

Soc But O my friend when he draws the other into upper air and gets him out of his pleas and rejoinders into the contemplation of justice and injustice in their own nature and in their difference from one another and from all other things or from the commonplaces about the happiness of a king or of a rich man to the consideration of government and of human happiness and misery in general—what they are, and how a man is to attain the one and avoid the other—when that narrow keen little legal mind is called to account about all this he gives the philosopher his revenge for dizzied by the height at which he is hanging whence he looks down into space which is a strange experience to him he being dismayed and lost and stammering broken words is laughed at, not by Thracian handmaidens or any other uneducated persons for they have no eye for the situation but by every man who has not been brought up a slave Such are the two characters Theodorus the one of the freeman who has been trained in liberty and leisure whom you call the philosopher—him we cannot blame because he appears simple and of no account when he has to perform some menial task such as packing up bed-clothes or flavouring a sauce or fawning speech the other character is that of the man who is able to do all this kind of service smartly and neatly [176] but knows not how to wear his cloak like a gentleman still less with the music of discourse can he hymn the true life aright which is lived by immortals or men blessed of heaven

Theod If you could only persuade everybody Socrates as you do me of the truth of your words there would be more peace and fewer evils among men

Soc Evils Theodorus can never pass away for there must always remain something which is antagonistic to good Having no place among the gods in heaven of necessity they hover around the mortal nature, and this earthly sphere Wherefore we ought to fly away from earth to heaven as quickly as we can and to fly away is to become like God as far as this is possible and to become like him is to become holy just, and wise But O my friend you cannot easily convince mankind that they should pursue virtue or avoid vice not merely in order that a man may seem to be good which is the reason given by the world and in my judgment is only a repetition of an old wives fable Whereas the truth is that God is never in any way unrighteous—he is perfect righteousness and he of us who is the most righteous is most like him Herein is seen the true cleverness of a man and also his nothingness and want of manhood For to know this is true wisdom and virtue and ignorance of this is manifest folly and vice All other kinds of wisdom or cleverness which seem only, such as the wisdom of politicians, or the wisdom of the arts are coarse and vulgar The unrighteous man or the sayer and doer of unholy things, had far better not be encouraged in the illusion that his roguery is clever for men glory in their shame—they fancy that they hear others saying of them These are not mere good for nothing persons, mere burdens of the earth but such as men should be who mean to dwell safely in a state Let us tell them that they are all the more truly what they do not think they are because they do not know it for they do not know the penalty of injustice which above all things they ought to know—not stripes and death as they suppose which evil doers often escape but a penalty which cannot be escaped

Theod What is that?

Soc There are two patterns eternally set before them the one blessed and divine, the other godless and wretched but they do not see them or perceive that in their utter folly and infatuation they are growing like the one and unlike the other [177] by reason of their evil deeds and the penalty is that they lead a life answering to the pattern which they are growing like. And if we tell them that unless they depart from their cunning the place of innocence will not receive them after death and that here on earth they will live ever in the likeness of their own evil selves and with evil friends—when they hear this they in their superior cunning will seem to be listening to the talk of idiots.

Theod Very true, Socrates

Soc Too true, my friend as I well know there is however one peculiarity in their case when they begin to reason in private about their dislike of philosophy if they have the courage to hear the argument out, and do not run away they grow at last strangely discontented with themselves their rhetoric fades away and they become helpless as children These however are digressions from which we must now desist, or they will overflow and drown the original ar gument to which, if you please, we will now return.

Theod For my part, Socrates I would rather ha e the digressions for at my age I find them eas er to follow but if you wish, let us go back to the argument.

Soc Had we not reached the point at which the partisans of the perpetual flux who say that things are as they seem to each one, were confidently maintaining that the ordinances which the state commanded and thought just, were just to the state which imposed them, while they were in force this was especially asserted of justice but as to the good no one had any longer the hardihood to contend of any ordi nances which the state thought and enacted to be good that these, while they were in force, were really good —he who said so would be playing w th the name good and would not touch the real question—it would be a mock ery would it not?

Theod Certainly it would

Soc He ought not to speak of the name but of the thing which is contemplated under the name

Theod R ght.

Soc Whate er be the term used the good or exped ent is the aim of legislation and as far as she has an opinion the state imposes all laws with a view to the greatest exped ency can leg islatio have any other aim?

[178] Theod Certainly not

Soc But is the aim attained always? do not mistakes often happen?

Th od Yes I think that there are mistakes

Soc The poss bility of err r will be more d stinctly recognized, if we put the quest n in reference to the whole class under which the good or exped ent falls. That whole class has to do with the future and laws are passed under the idea that they will be useful in after-time which in oth r words is the future

Theod Very true.

Soc Suppose now that we ask Protagoras, or one of his disc ples a question —O Protagoras we will say to him M n is as you declare the measure f all things—white, heavy light of all such things he is the judge for he has the cr terion of them in himself and when he thinks that things are such as he exper ences them to be he thinks what is and is true to himself. Is it not so?

Theod Yes

Soc And do you extend your doctrine Protagoras (as we shall further say) to the future as well as to the present and has he the cri terion not only of what in his opinion is but of what will be and do things always happen to him as he expected? For example, take the case of heat —When an ordinary man thinks that he is going to have a fever and that this kind of heat is coming on and another person who is a physician thinks the contrary whose opinion is likely to prove right? Or are they both right?—he will have a heat and fever in his own judgment, and not have a fever in the physician s judgment?

Theod How ludicrous!

Soc And the vinegrower if I am not mistaken is a better judge of the sweetness or dry ness of the vintage which is not yet gathered than the harp-player?

Theod Certainly

Soc And in musical composition the musician will know better than the training master what the training master himself will hereafter think harmonious or the reverse?

Theod Of course

Soc And the cook will be a better judge than the guest who is not a cook, of the pleasure to be derived from the dinner which is in prepara tion for of present or past pleasure we are not as yet arguing but can we say that every one will be to himself the best judge of the pleasure which will seem to be and will be to him in the future?—nay would not you, Protagoras, bet ter guess which arguments in a court would convince any one of us than the ordinary man?

Theod Certainly Socrates, he used to profess in the strongest manner that he was the supe r or of all men in this respect.

[179] Soc To be sure friend who would have paid a large sum for the privilege of talk ing to him if he had really persuaded his visi tors that neither a prophet nor any other man was better able to judge what will be and seem to be in the future than every one could for himself?

Theod Who indeed?

Soc And leg slation and expediency are all concerned w th the future and e ery one will admit that states, in passing laws, must often fail of their highest interests?

Theod Quite true

Soc Then we may fairly argue against your master that he must admit one man to be wiser than another and that the wiser is a measure but I who know nothing am not at all obliged to accept the honour which the advocate of Protagoras was just now forcing upon me whether I would or not, of being a measure of anything

Theod That is the best refutation of him Socrates although he is also caught when he ascribes truth to the opinions of others who give the lie direct to his own opinion

Soc There are many ways Theodorus in which the doctrine that every opinion of every man is true may be refuted but there is more difficulty in proving that states of feeling which are present to a man and out of which arise sensations and opinions in accordance with them are also untrue And very likely I have been talking nonsense about them for they may be unassailable and those who say that there is clear evidence of them and that they are matters of knowledge may probably be right in which case our friend Theaetetus was not so far from the mark when he identified perception and knowledge And therefore let us draw nearer as the advocate of Protagoras desires and give the truth of the universal flux a ring is the theory sound or not? at any rate no small war is raging about it and there are combatants not a few

Theod No small war indeed for in Ionia the sect makes rapid strides the disciples of Heracleitus are most energetic upholders of the doctrine

Soc Then we are the more bound my dear Theodorus to examine the question from the foundation as it is set forth by themselves

Theod Certainly we are About these speculations of Heracleitus which as you say are as old as Homer or even older still the Ephesians themselves who profess to know them are downright mad and you cannot talk with them on the subject For in accordance with their text books they are always in motion but as for dwelling upon an argument or a question [180] and quietly asking and answering in turn they can no more do so than they can fly or rather the determination of these fellows not to have a particle of rest in them is more than the utmost powers of negation can express If you ask any of them a question he will produce as from a quiver sayings brief and dark and shoot them at you and if you inquire the reason of what he has said you will be hit by some other newfangled word and will make no way with any of them nor they with one another their great care is not to allow of any settled principle either in their arguments or in their minds conceiving as I imagine that any such principle would be stationary for they are at war with the stationary and do what they can to drive it out everywhere

Soc I suppose Theodorus that you have only seen them when they were fighting and have never stayed with them in time of peace for they are no friends of yours and their peace doctrines are only communicated by them at leisure as I imagine to those disciples of theirs whom they want to make like themselves

Theod Disciples! my good sir they have none men of their sort are not one another's disciples but they grow up at their own sweet will and get their inspiration anywhere, each of them saying of his neighbour that he knows nothing From these men then as I was going to remark you will never get a reason whether with their will or without their will we must take the question out of their hands and make the anaylsis ourselves as if we were doing a geometrical problem

Soc Quite right too but as touching the aforesaid problem have we not heard from the ancients who concealed their wisdom from the many in poetical figures that Oceanus and Tethys the origin of all things are streams and that nothing is at rest? And now the moderns, in their superior wisdom have declared the same openly that the cobbler too may hear and learn of them and no longer foolishly imagine that some things are at rest and others in motion—having learned that all is motion he will duly honour his teachers I had almost forgotten the opposite doctrine Theodorus

Alone Being remains unmoved which is the name for the all

This is the language of Parmenides Melissus and their followers who stoutly maintain that all being is one and self-contained and has no place which to move What shall we do friend with all these people for advancing step by step we have imperceptibly got between the combatants [181] and unless we can protect our retreat we shall pay the penalty of our rashness—like the players in the palaestra who are caught upon the line, and are dragged different ways by the two parties Therefore I think that we had better begin by considering those whom we first accosted the river gods and if we find any truth in them we will help them to pull us over and try to get away from the others But if the partisans of the whole appear to speak more truly we will fly off from the part which would move the immovable, to them. And if we find that neither of them have anything reasonable to say, we shall be in a ridiculous position, having so great a conceit of our own poor opinion and rejecting that of ancient and famous men. O Theodorus, do you think that there is any use in proceeding when the danger is so great?

Theod. Nay, Socrates, not to examine thoroughly what the two parties have to say would be quite intolerable.

Soc. Then examine we must, since you, who were so reluctant to begin, are so eager to proceed. The nature of motion appears to be the question with which we begin. What do they mean when they say that all things are in motion? Is there only one kind of motion, or, as I rather incline to think, two? I should like to have your opinion upon this point in addition to my own, that I may err, if I must err, in your company; tell me, then, when a thing changes from one place to another, or goes round in the same place, is not that what is called motion?

Theod. Yes.

Soc. Here then we have one kind of motion. But when a thing, remaining on the same spot, grows old, or becomes black from being white, or hard from being soft, or undergoes any other change, may not this be properly called motion of another kind?

Theod. I think so.

Soc. Say rather that it must be so. Of motion then there are these two kinds, "change," and motion in place.

Theod. You are right.

Soc. And now, having made this distinction, let us address ourselves to those who say that all is motion, and ask them whether all things according to them have the two kinds of motion, and are changed as well as move in place, or is one thing moved in both ways, and another in one only?

Theod. Indeed, I do not know what to answer; but I think they would say that all things are moved in both ways.

Soc. Yes, comrade; for, if not, they would have to say that the same things are in motion and at rest, and there would be no more truth in saying that all things are in motion, than that all things are at rest.

Theod. To be sure.

Soc. And if they are to be in motion, and nothing is to be devoid of motion, [182] all things must always have every sort of motion?

Theod. Most true.

Soc. Consider a further point: did we not understand them to explain the generation of heat, whiteness, or anything else, in some such manner as the following:—were they not saying that each of them is moving between the agent and the patient, together with a perception, and that the patient ceases to be a perceiving power and becomes a percipient, and the agent a quale instead of a quality? I suspect that quality may appear a strange and uncouth term to you, and that you do not understand the abstract expression. Then I will take concrete instances: I mean to say that the producing power or agent becomes neither heat nor whiteness, but hot and white, and the like of other things. For I must repeat what I said before, that neither the agent nor patient have any absolute existence, but when they come together and generate sensations and their objects, the one becomes a thing of a certain quality, and the other a percipient. You remember?

Theod. Of course.

Soc. We may leave the details of their theory unexamined, but we must not forget to ask them the only question with which we are concerned: Are all things in motion and flux?

Theod. Yes, they will reply.

Soc. And they are moved in both those ways which we distinguished; that is to say, they move in place and are also changed?

Theod. Of course, if the motion is to be perfect.

Soc. If they only moved in place and were not changed, we should be able to say what is the nature of the things which are in motion and flux.

Theod. Exactly.

Soc. But now, since not even white continues to flow white, and whiteness itself is a flux or change which is passing into another colour, and is never to be caught standing still, can the name of any colour be rightly used at all?

Theod. How is that possible, Socrates, either in the case of this or of any other quality—if while we are using the word the object is escaping in the flux?

Soc. And what would you say of perceptions, such as sight and hearing, or any other kind of perception? Is there any stopping in the act of seeing and hearing?

Theod. Certainly not, if all things are in motion.

Soc. Then we must not speak of seeing any more than of not seeing, nor of any other perception more than of any non-perception, if all things partake of every kind of motion?

Theod. Certainly not.

Soc Yet perception is knowledge so at least Theaetetus and I were saying

Theod Very true

Soc Then when we were asked what is knowledge we no more answered what is knowledge than what is not knowledge?

Theod I suppose not

[183] Soc Here then is a fine result we corrected our first answer in our eagerness to prove that nothing is at rest But if nothing is at rest every answer upon whatever subject is equally right you may say that a thing is or is not thus or if you prefer becomes thus and if we say becomes we shall not then hamper them with words expressive of rest

Theod Quite true

Soc Yes Theodorus except in saying thus and not thus But you ought not to use the word thus for there is no motion in thus or in not thus The maintainers of the doctrine have as yet no words in which to express themselves and must get a new language I know of no word that will suit them except perhaps no how which is perfectly indefinite

Theod Yes that is a manner of speaking in which they will be quite at home

Soc And so Theodorus we have got rid of your friend without assenting to his doctrine, that every man is the measure of all things—a wise man only is a measure neither can we allow that knowledge is perception certainly not on the hypothesis of a perpetual flux unless perchance our friend Theaetetus is able to convince us that it is

Theod Very good Socrates and now that the argument about the doctrine of Protagoras has been completed I am absolved from answering for this was the agreement

Theaet Not, Theodorus until you and Socrates have discussed the doctrine of those who say that all things are at rest as you were proposing

Theod You Theaetetus who are a young rogue must not instigate your elders to a breach of faith but should prepare to answer Socrates in the remainder of the argument

Theaet Yes if he wish s but I would rather have heard about the doctrine of rest

Theod Invite Socrates to an argument—invite horsemen to the open plain do but ask him and he will answer

Soc Nevertheless Theodorus I am afraid that I shall not be able to comply with the request of Theaetetus

Theod Not comply! for what reason?

Soc My reason is that I have a kind of reverence not so much for Melissus and the others, who say that All is one and at rest, as for the great leader himself Parmenides venerable and awful as in Homeric language he may be called —him I should be ashamed to approach in a spirit unworthy of him I met him when he was an old man and I was a mere youth and he appeared to me to have a glorious depth of mind [184] And I am afraid that we may not understand his words and may be still further from understanding his meaning above all I fear that the nature of knowledge which is the main subject of our discussion may be thrust out of sight by the unbidden guests who will come pouring in upon our feast of discourse if we let them in—besides the question which is now stirring is of immense extent and will be treated unfairly if only considered by the way or if treated adequately and at length will put into the shade the other question of knowledge Neither the one nor the other can be allowed but I must try by my art of midwifery to deliver Theaetetus of his conceptions about knowledge

Theaet Very well do so if you will

Soc Then now Theaetetus take another view of the subject you answered that knowledge is perception?

Theaet I did

Soc And if any one were to ask you With what does a man see black and white colours? and with what does he hear high and low sounds?—you would say if I am not mistaken With the eyes and with the ears

Theaet I should

Soc The free use of words and phrases rather than minute precision is generally characteristic of a liberal education and the opposite is pedantic but sometimes precision is necessary and I believe that the answer which you have just given is open to the charge of incorrectness for which is more correct to say that we see or hear with the eyes and with the ears or through the eyes and through the ears

Theaet I should say through Socrates rather than with

Soc Yes my boy for no one can suppose that in each of us as in a sort of Trojan horse there are perched a number of unconnected senses which do not all meet in some one nature the mind or whatever we please to call it of which they are the instruments and with which through them we perceive objects of sense

Theaet I agree with you in that opinion

Soc The reason why I am thus precise is, because I want to know whether when we perceive black and white through the eyes and again, other qualities through other organs, we do not perceive them with one and the same part of ourselves and if you were asked you might refer all such perceptions to the body Perha s however I had better allow you to answer for yourself and not interfere Tell me then are not the organs through which you perceive warm and hard and light and sweet organs of the body?

Theaet Of the body certainly

[185] Soc And you would admit that what you perceive through one faculty you cannot perceive through another the objects of hearing for example cannot be perceived through s ght, or the objects of sight through hearing?

Theaet Of course not

Soc If you have any thought about both of them this common perception cannot come to you either through the one or the other organ?

Theaet It cannot

Soc How about sounds and colours in the first place you would admit that they both exist?

Theaet Yes.

Soc And that either of them is different from the other and the same w th itself?

Theaet Certainly

Soc And that both are two and each of them one?

Theaet Yes

Soc You can further observe whether they are like or unlike one another?

Theaet I dare say

Soc But through what do you perceive all this about them? for neither through hearing n r yet through seeing can you apprehend that which they have in common Let me g ve you an illustration of the point at issue —If there we e any meaning in asking whether sounds and colours are saline or not, you would be able to tell me what faculty would consider the question It would not be sight or hearing but some other

Th aet Certainly the faculty of taste

Soc Very good and now tell me what is the po er wh h d scerns, not only in sensible objects but in all things, un versal notions such as those wh ch are called being and not being and those others about wh ch we were just asking—what organs will you assign for the per c pti n f these notions?

Th a t You are th nking of being and not being liken ss and unlikeness sameness and d ffere ce and also f un ty and other numbers which are appl ed to objects of sense and you mean to ask through what bodily organ the soul perceives odd and even numbers and other arithmetical conceptions

Soc You follow me excellently Theaetetus that is precisely what I am asking

Theaet Indeed Socrates, I cannot answer my only notion is that these, unlike objects of sense, have no separate organ but that the mind by a power of her own contemplates the universals in all things

Soc You are a beauty Theaetetus and not ugly as Theodorus was saying for he who utters the beautiful is himself beautiful and good And besides being beautiful you have done me a kindness in releasing me from a very long discussion if you are clear that the soul views some things by herself and others through the bodily organs For that was my own opinion, and I wanted you to agree with me.

Theaet I am quite clear

[186] Soc And to which class would you refer being or essence for this, of all our notions, is the most universal?

Theaet I should say to that class which the soul aspires to know of herself

Soc And would you say this also of like and unlike same and other?

Theaet Yes

Soc And would you say the same of the noble and base and of good and evil?

Theaet These I conceive to be notions which are essentially relative and which the soul also perceives by comparing in herself things past and present with the future

Soc And does she not perceive the hardness of that which is hard by the touch and the softness of that which is soft equally by the touch?

Theaet Yes

Soc But their essence and what they are and their oppos tion to one another and the essential nature of this opposition the soul herself endeavours to decide for us by the review and comparison of them?

Theaet Certainly

Soc The simple sensations which reach the soul through the body are given at birth to men and animals by nature but the r reflections on the being and use of them are slo ly and hardly gained if they are ever gained by education and long experience

Thea t Assuredly

Soc And can a man attain truth who fails of attaining being?

Theaet Impossible.

Soc And can he who misses the truth of any thing have a knowledge of that thing?

Theaet He cannot.

Soc Then knowledge does not consist in impressions of sense but in reasoning about them, in that only and not in the mere impression truth and being can be attained?

Theaet Clearly

Soc And would you call the two processes by the same name when there is so great a difference between them?

Theaet That would certainly not be right

Soc And what name would you give to seeing hearing smelling being cold and being hot?

Theaet I should call all of them perceiving—what other name could be given to them?

Soc Perception would be the collective name of them?

Theaet Certainly

Soc Which as we say has no part in the attainment of truth any more than of being?

Theaet Certainly not

Soc And therefore not in science or knowledge?

Theaet No

Soc Then perception Theaetetus can never be the same as knowledge or science?

Theaet Clearly not Socrates and knowledge has now been most distinctly proved to be different from perception

[187] Soc But the original aim of our discussion was to find out rather what knowledge is than what it is not at the same time we have made some progress for we no longer seek for knowledge in perception at all but in that other process however called in which the mind is alone and engaged with being

Theaet You mean Socrates if I am not mistaken, what is called thinking or opining

Soc You conceive truly And now my friend please to begin again at this point and having wiped out of your memory all that has preceded see if you have arrived at any clearer view and once more say what is knowledge

Theaet I cannot say Socrates that all opinion is knowledge, because there may be a false opinion but I will venture to assert that knowledge is true opinion let this then be my reply and if this is hereafter disproved I must try to find another

Soc That is the way in which you ought to answer Theaetetus and not in your former hesitating strain for if we are bold we shall gain one of two advantages either we shall find what we seek, or we shall be less likely to think that we know what we do not know—in either case we shall be richly rewarded And now, what are you saying?—Are there two sorts of opinion one true and the other false and do you define knowledge to be the true

Theaet Yes according to my present view

Soc Is it still worth our while to resume the discussion touching opinion?

Theaet To what are you alluding?

Soc There is a point which often troubles me and is a great perplexity to me both in regard to myself and others I cannot make out the nature or origin of the mental experience to which I refer

Theaet Pray what is it?

Soc How there can be false opinion—that difficulty still troubles the eye of my mind and I am uncertain whether I shall leave the question or begin over again in a new way

Theaet Begin again Socrates—at least if you think that there is the slightest necessity for doing so Were not you and Theodorus just now remarking very truly that in discussions of this kind we may take our own time?

Soc You are quite right and perhaps there will be no harm in retracing our steps and beginning again Better a little which is well done than a great deal imperfectly

Theaet Certainly

Soc Well and what is the difficulty? Do we not speak of false opinion and say that one man holds a false and another a true opinion as though there were some natural distinction between them?

Theaet We certainly say so

[188] Soc All things and everything are either known or not known I leave out of view the intermediate conceptions of learning and forgetting because they have nothing to do with our present question

Theaet There can be no doubt Socrates if you exclude these that there is no other alternative but knowing or not knowing a thing

Soc That point being now determined must we not say that he who has an opinion must have an opinion about something which he knows or does not know?

Theaet He must

Soc He who knows cannot but know and he who does not know cannot know?

Theaet Of course

Soc What shall we say then? When a man has a false opinion does he think that which he knows to be some other thing which he knows and knowing both is he at the same time ignorant of both?

Theaet That Socrates is impossible

Soc But perhaps he thinks of something which he does not know as some other thing which he does not know for example, he knows neither Theaetetus nor Socrates, and yet he fancies that Theaetetus is Socrates, or Socrates Theaetetus?

Theaet. How can he?

Soc But surely he cannot suppose what he knows to be what he does not know or what he does not know to be what he knows?

Theaet That would be monstrous

Soc Where then is false opinion? For if all things are either known or unknown, there can be no opinion which is not comprehended under this alternative, and so false opinion is excluded

Theaet Most true

Soc Suppose that we remove the question out of the sphere of knowing or not knowing into that of being and not being

Theaet What do you mean?

Soc May we not suspect the simple truth to be that he who thinks about anything that which is not, will necessarily think what is false whatever in other respects may be the state of his mind?

Theaet That, again, is not unlikely Socrates

Soc Then suppose some one to say to us Theaetetus —Is it possible for any man to think that which is not, either as a self-existent substance or as a predicate of something else? And suppose that we answer Yes, he can, when he thinks what is not true —That will be our answer?

Theaet Yes

Soc But is there any parallel to this?

Theaet What do you mean?

Soc Can a man see something and yet see nothing?

Theaet Impossible

Soc But if he sees any one thing he sees something that exists Do you suppose that what is one is ever to be found among non-existing things?

Theaet I do not

Soc He then who sees some one thing sees something which is?

Theaet Clearly

[189] Soc And he who hears anything hears some one thing and hears that which is?

Theaet Yes.

Soc And he who touches anything touches something which is one and therefore is?

Theaet That again is true

Soc And does not he who thinks think some one thing?

Theaet Certainly

Soc And does not he who thinks some one thing think something which is?

Theaet I agree

Soc Then he who thinks of that which is not thinks of nothing?

Theaet Clearly

Soc And he who thinks of nothing does not think at all?

Theaet Obviously

Soc Then no one can think that which is not, either as a self-existent substance or as a predicate of something else?

Theaet Clearly not

Soc Then to think falsely is different from thinking that which is not?

Theaet It would seem so

Soc Then false opinion has no existence in us either in the sphere of being or of knowledge?

Theaet Certainly not

Soc But may not the following be the description of what we express by this name?

Theaet What?

Soc May we not suppose that false opinion or thought is a sort of heterodoxy a person may make an exchange in his mind and say that one real object is another real object. For thus he always thinks that which is but he puts one thing in place of another and missing the aim of his thoughts he may be truly said to have false opinion.

Theaet Now you appear to me to have spoken the exact truth when a man puts the base in the place of the noble, or the noble in the place of the base, then he has truly false opinion

Soc I see Theaetetus that your fear has disappeared and that you are beginning to despise me

Theaet What makes you say so?

Soc You think, if I am not mistaken that your truly false is safe from censure and that I shall never ask whether there can be a swift which is slow or a heavy which is light or any other self-contradictory thing which works, not according to its own nature but according to that of its opposite But I will not insist upon this for I do not wish needlessly to discourage you And so you are satisfied that false opinion is heterodoxy or the thought of something else?

Theaet I am

Soc It is possible then upon your view for the mind to conceive of one thing as another?

Theaet True

Soc But must not the mind or thinking power which misplaces them have a conception either of both objects or of one of them?

Theaet Certainly

Soc Either together or in succession?

Theaet Very good

Soc And do you mean by conceiving the same which I mean?

Theaet What is that?

Soc I mean the conversation which the soul holds with herself in considering of anything [190] I speak of what I scarcely understand but the soul when thinking appears to me to be just talking—asking questions of herself and answering them affirming and denying And when she has arrived at a decision either gradually or by a sudden impulse and has at last agreed and does not doubt this is called her opinion I say then that to form an opinion is to speak and opinion is a word spoken —I mean to oneself and in silence not aloud or to another What think you?

Theaet I agree

Soc Then when any one thinks of one thing as another he is saying to himself that one thing is another?

Theaet Yes

Soc But do you ever remember saying to yourself that the noble is certainly base or the unjust just or best of all—have you ever attempted to convince yourself that one thing is another? Nay not even in sleep did you ever venture to say to yourself that odd is even or anything of the kind?

Theaet Never

Soc And do you suppose that any other man either in his senses or out of them ever seriously tried to persuade himself that an ox is a horse or that two are one?

Theaet Certainly not

Soc But if thinking is talking to oneself no one speaking and thinking of two objects and apprehending them both in his soul will say and think that the one is the other of them and I must add that even you lover of dispute as you are had better let the word other alone [i e not insist that one and other are the same] I mean to say that no one thinks the noble to be base or anything of the kind

Theaet I will give up the word other Socrates and I agree to what you say

Soc If a man has both of them in his thoughts he cannot think that the one of them is the other?

Both words in Greek are called er po cf Parmenides 147 Euthydemus 301

Theaet True

Soc Neither, if he has one of them only in his mind and not the other, can he think that one is the other?

Theaet True for we should have to suppose that he apprehends that which is not in his thoughts at all

Soc Then no one who has either both or only one of the two objects in his mind can think that the one is the other And therefore he who maintains that false opinion is heterodoxy is talking nonsense for neither in this any more than in the previous way can false opinion exist in us

Theaet No

Soc But if Theaetetus this is not admitted we shall be driven into many absurdities.

Theaet What are they?

Soc I will not tell you until I have endeavoured to consider the matter from every point of view [191] For I should be ashamed of us if we were driven in our perplexity to admit the absurd consequences of which I speak But if we find the solution and get away from them we may regard them only as the difficulties of others and the ridicule will not attach to us On the other hand if we utterly fail I suppose that we must be humble, and allow the argument to trample us under foot, as the sea sick passenger is trampled upon by the sailor and to do anything to us Listen then while I tell you how I hope to find a way out of our difficulty

Theaet Let me hear

Soc I think that we were wrong in denying that a man could think what he knew to be what he did not know and that there is a way in which such a deception is possible

Theaet You mean to say as I suspected at the time that I may know Socrates and at a distance see some one who is unknown to me and whom I mistake for him—then the deception will occur?

Soc But has not that position been relinquished by us because involving the absurdity that we should know and not know the things which we know?

Theaet True

Soc Let us make the assertion in another form which may or may not have a favourable issue but as we are in a great strait, every argument should be turned over and tested Tell me then whether I am right in saying that you may learn a thing which at one time you did not know?

Theaet Certainly you may

Soc. And another and another?

Theaet. Yes.

Soc. I would have you imagine, then, that there exists in the mind of man a block of wax, which is of different sizes in different men; harder, moister, and having more or less of purity in one than another, and in some of an intermediate quality.

Theaet. I see.

Soc. Let us say that this tablet is a gift of Memory, the mother of the Muses; and that when we wish to remember anything which we have seen, or heard, or thought in our own minds, we hold the wax to the perceptions and thoughts, and in that material receive the impression of them as from the seal of a ring; and that we remember and know what is imprinted as long as the image lasts; but when the image is effaced, or cannot be taken, then we forget and do not know.

Theaet. Very good.

Soc. Now, when a person has this knowledge, and is considering something which he sees or hears, may not false opinion arise in the following manner?

Theaet. In what manner?

Soc. When he thinks what he knows, sometimes to be what he knows, and sometimes to be what he does not know. We were wrong before in denying the possibility of this.

Theaet. And how would you amend the former statement?

[192] Soc. I should begin by making a list of the impossible cases which must be excluded. (1) No one can think one thing to be another when he does not perceive either of them, but has the memorial or seal of both of them in his mind; nor can any mistaking of one thing for another occur, when he only knows one, and does not know, and has no impression of the other; nor can he think that one thing which he does not know is another thing which he does not know, or that what he does not know is what he knows; nor (2) that one thing which he perceives is another thing which he perceives, or that something which he perceives is something which he does not perceive; or that something which he does not perceive is something else which he does not perceive; or that something which he does not perceive is something which he perceives; nor again (3) can he think that something which he knows and perceives, and of which he has the impression coinciding with sense, is something else which he knows and perceives, and of which he has the impression coinciding with sense;—this last case, if possible, is still more inconceivable than the others; nor (4) can he think that something which he knows and perceives, and of which he has the memorial coinciding with sense, is something else which he knows; nor so long as these agree, can he think that a thing which he knows and perceives is another thing which he perceives; or that a thing which he does not know and does not perceive, is the same as another thing which he does not know and does not perceive;—nor again, can he suppose that a thing which he does not know and does not perceive is the same as another thing which he does not know; or that a thing which he does not know and does not perceive is another thing which he does not perceive:—All these utterly and absolutely exclude the possibility of false opinion. The only cases, if any, which remain, are the following.

Theaet. What are they? If you tell me, I may perhaps understand you better; but at present I am unable to follow you.

Soc. A person may think that some things which he knows, or which he perceives and does not know, are some other things which he knows and perceives; or that some things which he knows and perceives, are other things which he knows and perceives.

Theaet. I understand you less than ever now.

Soc. Hear me once more, then:—I, knowing Theodorus, and remembering in my own mind what sort of person he is, and also what sort of person Theaetetus is, at one time see them, and at another time do not see them, and sometimes I touch them, and at another time not, or at one time I may hear them or perceive them in some other way, and at another time not perceive them, but still I remember them, and know them in my own mind.

Theaet. Very true.

Soc. Then, first of all, I want you to understand that a man may or may not perceive sensibly that which he knows.

Theaet. True.

Soc. And that which he does not know will sometimes not be perceived by him and sometimes will be perceived and only perceived?

Theaet. That is also true.

[193] Soc. See whether you can follow me better now: Socrates can recognize Theodorus and Theaetetus, but he sees neither of them, nor does he perceive them in any other way; he cannot then by any possibility imagine in his own mind that Theaetetus is Theodorus. Am I not right?

Theaet. You are quite right.

Soc Then that was the first case of which I spoke

Theaet Yes

Soc The second case was that I knowing one of you and not knowing the other and perceiving neither, can never think him whom I know to be him whom I do not know

Theaet True

Soc In the third case, not knowing and not perceiving either of you, I cannot think that one of you whom I do not know is the other whom I do not know I need not again go over the catalogue of excluded cases, in which I cannot form a false opinion about you and Theodorus either when I know both or when I am in ignorance of both or when I know one and not the other And the same of perceiving do you understand me?

Theaet I do

Soc The only possibility of erroneous opinion is when knowing you and Theodorus and having on the waxen block the impression of both of you given as by a seal but seeing you imperfectly and at a distance I try to assign the right impression of memory to the right visual impression and to fit this into its own print if I succeed, recognition will take place but if I fail and transpose them putting the foot into the wrong shoe—that is to say putting the vision of either of you on to the wrong impression or if my mind like the sight in a mirror which is transferred from right to left err by reason of some similar affection then heterodoxy and false opinion ensues

Theaet Yes Socrates you have described the nature of opinion with wonderful exactness

Soc Or again when I know both of you and perceive as well as know one of you but not the other and my knowledge of him does not accord with perception—that was the case put by me just now which you did not understand

Theaet No, I did not

Soc I meant to say that when a person knows and perceives one of you and his knowledge coincides with his perception he will never think him to be some other person whom he knows and perceives and the knowledge of whom coincides with his perception—for that also was a case supposed

Theaet True

Soc But there was an omission of the further case, in which as we now say [194] false opinion may arise when knowing both and seeing or having some other sensible perception of both I fail in holding the seal over against the corresponding sensation like a bad archer I miss and fall wide of the mark—and this is called falsehood

Theaet Yes it is rightly so called

Soc When therefore perception is present to one of the seals or impressions but not to the other and the mind fits the seal of the absent perception on the one which is present in any case of this sort the mind is deceived in a word if our view is sound there can be no error or deception about things which a man does not know and has never perceived but only in things which are known and perceived in these alone opinion turns and twists about and becomes alternately true and false—true when the seals and impressions of sense meet straight and opposite—false when they go awry and crooked

Theaet And is not that Socrates nobly said?

Soc Nobly! yes but wait a little and hear the explanation and then you will say so with more reason for to think truly is noble and to be deceived is base.

Theaet Undoubtedly

Soc And the origin of truth and error is as follows—When the wax in the soul of any one is deep and abundant and smooth and perfectly tempered then the impressions which pass through the senses and sink into the heart of the soul as Homer says in a parable meaning to indicate the likeness of the soul to wax (κῆρ κηρος) these I say being pure and clear and having a sufficient depth of wax, are also lasting and minds such as these easily learn and easily retain and are not liable to confusion but have true thoughts for they have plenty of room and having clear impressions of things as we term them quickly distribute them into their proper places on the block And such men are called wise Do you agree?

Theaet Entirely

Soc But when the heart of any one is shaggy—a quality which the all wise poet commends or muddy and of impure wax or very soft or very hard then there is a corresponding defect in the mind—the soft are good at learning but apt to forget and the hard are the reverse the shaggy and rugged and gritty or those who have an admixture of earth or dung in their composition [195] have the impressions indistinct as also the hard for there is no depth in them and the soft too are indistinct for their impressions are easily confused and effaced Yet greater is the indistinctness when they are all jostled together in a little soul which has no room These are the natures which have false opinion for when they see or hear or think of anything they are slow in assigning the right objects to the right impressions—in their stupidity they confuse them and are apt to see and hear and think amiss—and such men are sa d to be deceived in their knov ledge of objects, and ignorant.

Theaet No man Socrates can say anything truer than that.

Soc Then now we may admit the existence of false opinion in us?

Theaet Certainly

Soc And of true opinion also?

Theaet Yes

Soc We have at length satisfactorily proven that beyond a doubt there are these two sorts of opinion?

Theaet Undoubtedly

Soc Alas, Theaetetus vhat a tiresome crea tu e is a man ho is fond of talking!

Theaet What makes you say so?

Soc Because I am disheartened at my own stup dity and tiresome garrulity for what other term will describe the hab t of a man who is always arguing on all s des of a question whose dulness cannot be convinced and who will never leave off?

Theaet But what puts you out of heart?

Soc I am not only out of heart but in posi tive despair for I do not know what to an wer if any one were to ask me —O Socrates, ha e you ndeed disco ered that false opinion arises e ther in the comparison of perceptions with one another nor yet in thought but in the uni n of thought and perception? Yes, I shall y with the complacence of one v ho thinks that he has made a noble discovery

Th a t I see no reason why we should be hamed of our demonstrati n Socrates

Soc He ill say You mean to argue that the man whom we only think of and do not see cann t be confused w th the horse which we do t see or touch but only think of and d n t per e e? That I belie e to be my mean ing I shall r ply

Th aet Qu te ght

Soc Well then he w ll say according to th t argument the number eleven which s nly thought, can ne er be mistaken f r tv elve, v hich s only thought How would you answer him?

Th a t I should say that a mistake may very l kely arise between the le en or tv elve hich seen or handled but that no similar mistake can arise between the eleven and twelve which are in the mind

Soc Well but do you think that no one ever put before his ov n mind five and seven [196] —I do not mean five or seven men or horses, but five or seven in the abstract, which as we say are recorded on the waxen block, and in which false opinion is held to be impossible — did no man ever ask himself how many these numbers make when added together and an swer that they are eleven while another thinks that they are twelve, or would all agree in thinking and saying that they are twelve?

Theaet Certainly not many would think that they are eleven and in the higher num bers the chance of error is greater still for I assume you to be speaking of numbers in gen eral

Soc Exactly and I want you to consider whether this does not imply that the twelve in the waxen block are supposed to be eleven?

Theaet Yes that seems to be the case

Soc Then do we not come back to the old difficulty? For he who makes such a mistake does think one thing which he knows to be another thing which he knows but this as we said was impossible and afforded an irresisti ble proof of the non-existence of false opinion because otherwise the same person would in evitably know and not know the same thing at the same time

Theaet Most true

Soc Then false opinion cannot be explained as a confusion of thought and sense for in that case we could not have been mistaken about pure conceptions of thought and thus we are obliged to say either that false opinion does not exist or that a man may not know that which he knows —which alternati e do you prefer?

Theaet It is hard to determine Socrates

Soc And yet the argument will scarcely ad m t of both But as we are at our wits end suppose that we do a shameless thing?

Theaet What is it?

Soc Let us attempt to explain the verb to know

Theaet And why should that be shameless?

Soc You seem not to be aware that the whole of our discussion from the very beginning has been a search after knowledge, of which we are assumed not to know the nature

Thea t Nay but I am well aware

Soc And is it not shameless when we do not know what knowledge is to be explaining the verb to know ? The truth s Theaetetus that v e have long been infected with logical impur ity Thousands of times have we repeated the words we know and "do not know" and we have or have not science or knowledge, as if we could understand what we are saying to one another so long as we remain ignorant about knowledge and at this moment we are using the words we understand we are ignorant as though we could still employ them when deprived of knowledge or science

Theaet But if you avoid these expressions Socrates how will you ever argue at all?

[197] Soc I could not being the man I am The case would be different if I were a true hero of dialectic and O that such an one were present! for he would have told us to avoid the use of these terms at the same time he would not have spared in you and me the faults which I have noted But seeing that we are no great wits shall I venture to say what knowing is? for I think that the attempt may be worth making

Theaet Then by all means venture and no one shall find fault with you for using the forbidden terms

Soc You have heard the common explanation of the verb to know ?

Theaet I think so but I do not remember it at the moment

Soc They explain the word to know as meaning to have knowledge

Theaet True

Soc I should like to make a slight change and say to possess knowledge

Theaet How do the two expressions differ?

Soc Perhaps there may be no difference but still I should like you to hear my view that you may help me to test it

Theaet I will if I can

Soc I should distinguish having from possessing for example a man may buy and keep under his control a garment which he does not wear and then we should say not that he has but that he possesses the garment

Theaet It would be the correct expression

Soc Well may not a man possess and yet not have knowledge in the sense of which I am speaking? As you may suppose a man to have caught wild birds—doves or any other birds—and to be keeping them in an aviary which he has constructed at home we might say of him in one sense that he always has them because he possesses them might we not?

Theaet Yes

Soc And yet in anoth r sense he has none of them but they are in his power and he has got them under his hand in an enclosure of his own and can take and have them whenever he likes —he can catch any which he likes and let the bird go again, and he may do so as often as he pleases

Theaet True

Soc Once more then as in what preceded we made a sort of waxen figment in the mind, so let us now suppose that in the mind of each man there is an aviary of all sorts of birds—some flocking together apart from the rest others in small groups others solitary flying anywhere and everywhere

Theaet Let us imagine such an aviary—and what is to follow?

Soc We may suppose that the birds are kinds of knowledge and that when we were children this receptacle was empty whenever a man has gotten and detained in the enclosure a kind of knowledge he may be said to have learned or discovered the thing which is the subject of the knowledge and this is to know

Theaet Granted

[198] Soc And further when any one wishes to catch any of these knowledges or sciences and having taken to hold it and again to let them go how will he express himself?—will he describe the catching of them and the original possession in the same words? I will make my meaning clearer by an example —You admit that there is an art of arithmetic?

Theaet To be sure

Soc Conceive this under the form of a hunt after the science of odd and even in general

Theaet I follow

Soc Having the use of the art the arithmetician if I am not mistaken has the conceptions of number under his hand and can transmit them to another

Theaet Yes

Soc And when transmitting them he may be said to teach them and when receiving to learn them and when having them in possession in the aforesaid aviary he may be said to know them

Theaet Exactly

Soc Attend to what follows must not the perfect arithmetician know all numbers for he has the science of all numbers in his mind?

Theaet True

Soc And he can reckon abstract numbers in his head or things about him which are numerable?

Theaet Of course he can

Soc And to reckon is simply to consider how much such and such a number amounts to?

Theaet Very true

Soc And so he appears to be searching into something which he knows as if he did not know it, for we have already admitted that he knows all numbers —you have heard these perplexing questions raised?

Theaet I have

Soc May we not pursue the image of the doves, and say that the chase after knowledge is of two kinds? one kind is prior to possession and for the sake of possession and the other for the sake of taking and holding in the hands that which is possessed already And thus when a man has learned and known something long ago, he may resume and get hold of the knowledge which he has long possessed but has not at hand in his mind

Theaet True

Soc That was my reason for asking how we ought to speak when an arithmetician sets about numbering or a grammarian about reading? Shall we say that although he knows he comes back to himself to learn what he already knows?

Theaet It would be too absurd Socrates

Soc Shall we say then that he is going to read or number what he does not know [199] although we have admitted that he knows all letters and all numbers?

Theaet That again would be an absurdity

Soc Then shall we say that about names we care nothing?—any one may twist and turn the words knowing and learning in any way which he likes but since we have determined that the possession of knowledge is not the having or using it we do assert that a man cannot not possess that which he possesses and therefore in no case can man not know that which he knows but he may get a false opinion about it for he may have the knowledge not of this particular thing but of some other —when the various numbers and forms of knowledge are flying about in the aviary and wishing to capture a certain sort of knowledge out of the general store, he takes the wrong one by mistake that is to say when he thought eleven to be twelve, he got hold of the ring dove which he had in his mind when he wanted the pigeon

Theaet A very rational explanation

Soc But when he catches the one which he wants, then he is not deceived and has an opinion of what is and thus false and true opinion may exist, and the difficulties which were previously raised disappear I dare say that you agree with me, do you not?

Theaet Yes.

Soc And so we are rid of the difficulty of a man's not knowing what he knows for we are not driven to the inference that he does not possess what he possesses, whether he be or be not deceived And yet I fear that a greater difficulty is looking in at the window

Theaet What is it?

Soc How can the exchange of one knowledge for another ever become false opinion?

Theaet What do you mean?

Soc In the first place how can a man who has the knowledge of anything be ignorant of that which he knows not by reason of ignorance but by reason of his own knowledge? And again is it not an extreme absurdity that he should suppose another thing to be this, and this to be another thing —that, having knowledge present with him in his mind he should still know nothing and be ignorant of all things?—you might as well argue that ignorance may make a man know and blindness make him see, as that knowledge can make him ignorant.

Theaet Perhaps, Socrates, we may have been wrong in making only forms of knowledge our birds whereas there ought to have been forms of ignorance as well flying about together in the mind and then he who sought to take one of them might sometimes catch a form of knowledge and sometimes a form of ignorance and thus he would have a false opinion from ignorance but a true one from knowledge about the same thing

Soc I cannot help praising you Theaetetus, and yet I must beg you to reconsider your words [200] Let us grant what you say—then according to you he who takes ignorance will have a false opinion—am I right?

Theaet Yes

Soc He will certainly not think that he has a false opinion?

Theaet Of course not.

Soc He will think that his opinion is true, and he will fancy that he knows the things about which he has been deceived?

Theaet Certainly

Soc Then he will think that he has captured knowledge and not ignorance?

Theaet Clearly

Soc And thus, after going a long way round we are once more face to face with our original difficulty The hero of dialectic will retort upon us — O my excellent friends, he will say laughing if a man knows the form of ignorance and the form of knowledge can he think that one of them which he knows is the other which he knows? or if he knows neither of them can he think that the one which he knows not is another which he knows not? or, if he knows one and not the other can he think the one which he knows to be the one which he does not know? or the one which he does not know to be the one which he knows? or will you tell me that there are other forms of knowledge which distinguish the right and wrong birds and which the owner keeps in some other aviaries or graven on waxen blocks according to your foolish images and which he may be said to know while he possesses them even though he have them not at hand in his mind? And thus in a perpetual circle you will be compelled to go round and round and you will make no progress What are we to say in reply Theaetetus?

Theaet Indeed Socrates I do not know what we are to say

Soc Are not his reproaches just, and does not the argument truly show that we are wrong in seeking for false opinion until we know what knowledge is, that must be first ascertained then, the nature of false opinion?

Theaet I cannot but agree with you Socrates so far as we have yet gone

Soc Then once more what shall we say that knowledge is?—for we are not going to lose heart as yet

Theaet Certainly I shall not lose heart if you do not

Soc What definition will be most consistent with our former views?

Theaet I cannot think of any but our old one Socrates

Soc What was it?

Theaet Knowledge was said by us to be true opinion and true opinion is surely unerring and the results which follow from it are all noble and good

Soc He who led the way into the river, Theaetetus said The experiment will show [201] and perhaps if we go forward in the search we may stumble upon the thing which we are looking for but if we stay where we are nothing will come to light

Theaet Very true let us go forward and try

Soc The trail soon comes to an end for a whole profession is against us

Theaet How is that and what profession do you mean?

Soc The profession of the great wise ones who are called orators and lawyers for these persuade men by their art and make them think whatever they like but they do not teach them Do you imagine that there are any teachers in the world so clever as to be able to convince others of the truth about acts of robbery or violence of which they were not eye witnesses while a little water is flowing in the clepsydra?

Theaet Certainly not they can only persuade them

Soc And would you not say that persuading them is making them have an opinion?

Theaet To be sure

Soc When therefore, judges are justly persuaded about matters which you can know only by seeing them and not in any other way and when thus judging of them from report they attain a true opinion about them they judge without knowledge and yet are rightly persuaded if they have judged well

Theaet Certainly

Soc And yet O my friend if true opinion in law courts and knowledge are the same the perfect judge could not have judged rightly without knowledge and therefore I must infer that they are not the same

Theaet That is a distinction Socrates which I have heard made by some one else but I had forgotten it He said that true opinion combined with reason was knowledge but that the opinion which had no reason was out of the sphere of knowledge and that things of which there is no rational account are not knowable—such was the singular expression which he used—and that things which have a reason or explanation are knowable

Soc Excellent but then how did he distinguish between things which are and are not knowable"? I wish that you would repeat to me what he said and then I shall know whether you and I have heard the same tale

Theaet I do not know whether I can recall it but if another person would tell me I think that I could follow him

Soc Let me give you then a dream in return for a dream —Methought that I too had a dream and I heard in my dream that the primeval letters or elements out of which you and I and all other things are compounded have no reason or explanation you can only name them [202] but no predicate can be either affirmed or denied of them for in the one case existence in the other non-existence is already implied neither of which must be added if you mean to speak of this or that thing by itself alone It should not be called itself or that or each or alone or this or the like for these go about everywhere and are applied to all things, but are distinct from them whereas, if the first elements could be described and had a defini tion of their own, they would be spoken of apart from all else. But none of these primeval elements can be defined they can only be named, for they have nothing but a name, and the things which are compounded of them, as they are complex, are expressed by a combination of names, for the combination of names is the essence of a definition. Thus, then, the elements or letters are only objects of perception, and cannot be defined or known but the syllables or combinations of them are known and expressed, and are apprehended by true opinion. When, therefore, any one forms the true opinion of anything without rational explanation, you may say that his mind is truly exercised, but has no knowledge for he who cannot give and receive a reason for a thing, has no knowledge of that thing but when he adds rational explanation, then, he is perfected in knowledge and may be all that I have been denying of him. Was that the form in which the dream appeared to you?

Theaet. Precisely

Soc And you allow and maintain that true opinion, combined with definition or rational explanation, is knowledge?

Theaet. Exactly

Soc Then may we assume, Theaetetus, that to-day and in this casual manner we have found a truth which in former times many wise men have grown old and have not found

Theaet. At any rate, Socrates, I am satisfied with the present statement.

Soc Which is probably correct—for how can there be knowledge apart from definition and true opinion And yet there is one point in what has been said which does not quite satisfy me.

Theaet. What was it?

Soc What might seem to be the most ingenious notion of all —That the elements or letters are unknown, but the combination or syllables known.

Theaet And was that wrong?

Soc We shall soon know for we have as hostages the instances which the author of the argument himself used

Theaet What hostages

Soc The letters, which are the elements and the syllables, which are the combinations,—he reasoned, did he not, from the letters of the alphabet

[203] Theaet. Yes, he did.

Soc Let us take them and put them to the test, or rather test ourselves.—What was the way in which we learned letters? and, first of all, are we right in saying that syllables have a definition, but that letters have no definition?

Theaet I think so

Soc I think so too for suppose that some one asks you to spell the first syllable of my name —Theaetetus, he says, what is SO?

Theaet I should reply S and O

Soc That is the definition which you would give of the syllable?

Theaet. I should.

Soc I wish that you would give me a similar definition of the S

Theaet But how can any one, Socrates, tell the elements of an element? I can only reply that S is a consonant, a mere noise, as of the tongue hissing B, and most other letters, again, are neither vowel sounds nor noises. Thus letters may be most truly said to be undefined for even the most distinct of them, which are the seven vowels, have a sound only but no definition at all.

Soc Then, I suppose, my friend that we have been so far right in our idea about knowledge?

Theaet Yes I think that we have.

Soc Well, but have we been right in maintaining that the syllables can be known, but not the letters?

Theaet. I think so

Soc And do we mean by a syllable two letters, or if there are more, all of them, or a single idea which arises out of the combination of them?

Theaet. I should say that we mean all the letters.

Soc Take the case of the two letters S and O which form the first syllable of my own name must not he who knows the syllable, know both of them

Theaet Certainly

Soc He knows, that is, the S and O?

Theaet. Yes.

Soc But can he be ignorant of either singly and yet know both together?

Theaet Such a supposition, Socrates, is monstrous and unmeaning

Soc But if he cannot know both without knowing each, then if he is ever to know the syllable, he must know the letters first and thus the fine theory has again taken wings and departed.

Theaet. Yes, with wonderful celerity

Soc Yes, we did not keep watch properly Perhaps we ought to have maintained that a syllable is not the letters, but rather one single idea framed out of them having a separate form distinct from them

Theaet Very true and a more likely notion than the other

Soc Take care let us not be cowards and betray a great and imposing theory

[204] Theaet No indeed

Soc Let us assume then as we now say that the syllable is a simple form arising out of the several combinations of harmonious elements —of letters or of any other elements

Theaet Very good

Soc And it must have no parts

Theaet Why?

Soc Because that which has parts must be a whole of all the parts Or would you say that a whole although formed out of the parts is a single notion different from all the parts?

Theaet I should

Soc And would you say that all and the whole are the same or different?

Theaet I am not certain but as you like me to answer at once I shall hazard the reply that they are different

Soc I approve of your readiness Theaetetus but I must take time to think whether I equally approve of your answer

Theaet Yes the answer is the point

Soc According to this new view the whole is supposed to differ from all?

Theaet Yes

Soc Well but is there any difference between all [in the plural] and the all [in the singular]? Take the case of number —When we say one two three four five six or when we say twice three or three times two or four and two or three and two and one are we speaking of the same or of different numbers?

Theaet Of the same

Soc That is of six?

Theaet Yes

Soc And in each form of expression we spoke of all the six?

Theaet True

Soc Again in speaking of all [in the plural] is there not one thing which we express?

Theaet Of course there is

Soc And that is six?

Theaet Yes

Soc Then in predicating the word all of things measured by number we predicate at the same time a singular and a plural?

Theaet Clearly we do

Soc Again the number of the acre and the acre are the same are they not?

Theaet Yes

Soc And the number of the stadium in lik manner is the stadium?

Theaet Yes

Soc And the army is the number of th army and in all similar cases the entire num ber of anything is the entire thing?

Theaet True

Soc And the number of each is the parts o each?

Theaet Exactly

Soc Then as many things as have parts ar made up of parts?

Theaet Clearly

Soc But all the parts are admitted to be th all if the entire number is the all?

Theaet True

Soc Then the whole is not made up of parts, for it would be the all if consisting of all the parts?

Theaet That is the inference

Soc But is a part a part of anything but the whole?

Theaet Yes of the all

[205] Soc You make a valiant defence Theaetetus And yet is not the all that of which nothing is wanting?

Theaet Certainly

Soc And is not a whole likewise that from which nothing is absent? but that from which anything is absent is neither a whole nor all — if wanting in anything both equally lose their entirety of nature

Theaet I now think that there is no difference between a whole and all

Soc But were we not saying that when a thing has parts all the parts will be a whole and all?

Theaet Certainly

Soc Then as I was saying before must not the alternative be that either the syllable is not the letters and then the letters are not parts of the syllable or that the syllable will be the same with the letters and will therefore be equally known with them?

Theaet You are right

Soc And in order to avoid this we suppose it to be different from them?

Theaet Yes

Soc But if letters are not parts of syllables can you tell me of any other parts of syllables, which are not letters?

Theaet No indeed Socrates for if I admit the existence of parts in a syllable it would be ridiculous in me to give up letters and seek for other parts

Soc Quite true Theaetetus, and therefore according to our present view a syllable must surely be some indivisible form?

Theaet True.

Soc But do you remember my friend that only a little while ago we admitted and approved the statement, that of the first elements out of which all other things are compounded there could be no definition, because each of them when taken by itself is uncompounded nor can one rightly attribute to them the words "being or this, because they are alien and inappropriate words, and for this reason the letters or elements were indefinable and unknown?

Theaet. I remember

Soc And is not this also the reason why they are simple and indivisible? I can see no other

Theaet No other reason can be given.

Soc Then is not the syllable in the same case as the elements or letters if it has no parts and is one form?

Theaet To be sure.

Soc If, then a syllable is a whole, and has many parts or letters, the letters as well as the syllable must be intelligible and expressible, since all the parts are acknowledged to be the same as the whole?

Theaet True.

Soc But if it be one and indivisible, then the syllables and the letters are alike undefined and unknown, and for the same reason?

Theaet I cannot deny that

Soc We cannot, therefore agree in the opinion of him who says that the syllable can be known and expressed, [206] but not the letters.

Theaet Certainly not if we may trust the argument.

Soc Well but will you not be equally inclined to disagree with him when you remember your own experience in learning to read?

Theaet What experience?

Soc Why that in learning you were kept trying to distinguish the separate letters both by the eye and by the ear in order that, when you heard them spoken or saw them written, you might not be confused by their position.

Theaet. Very true.

Soc And is the education of the harp-player complete unless he can tell what string answers to a particular note the notes, as every one would allow are the elements or letters of music?

Theaet. Exactly

Soc Then if we argue from the letters and syllables which we know to other simples and compounds, we shall say that the letters or simple elements as a class are much more certainly known than the syllables and much more indispensable to a perfect knowledge of any subject and if some one says that the syllable is known and the letter unknown, we shall consider that either intentionally or unintentionally he is talking nonsense?

Theaet Exactly

Soc And there might be given other proofs of this belief, if I am not mistaken But do not let us in looking for them lose sight of the question before us, which is the meaning of the statement that right opinion with rational definition or explanation is the most perfect form of knowledge

Theaet We must not

Soc Well and what is the meaning of the term "explanation ? I think that we have a choice of three meanings.

Theaet What are they?

Soc In the first place, the meaning may be, manifesting one's thought by the voice with verbs and nouns, imaging an opinion in the stream which flows from the lips, as in a mirror or water Does not explanation appear to be of this nature?

Theaet Certainly he who so manifests his thought, is said to explain himself

Soc And every one who is not born deaf or dumb is able sooner or later to manifest what he thinks of anything and if so all those who have a right opinion about anything will also have right explanation nor will right opinion be anywhere found to exist apart from knowledge

Theaet True.

Soc Let us not therefore, hastily charge him who gave this account of knowledge with uttering an unmeaning word for perhaps he only intended to say that when a person was asked what was the nature of anything [207] he should be able to answer his questioner by giving the elements of the thing

Theaet As for example, Socrates ?

Soc As, for example, when Hesiod says that a waggon is made up of a hundred planks Now neither you nor I could describe all of them individually but if any one asked what is a waggon, we should be content to answer that a waggon consists of wheels axle, body rims, yoke

Theaet Certainly

Soc And our opponent will probably laugh at us just as he would if we professed to be grammarians and to give a grammatical ac count of the name of Theaetetus, and yet could only tell the syllables and not the letters of your name—that would be true opinion, and not knowledge; for knowledge, as has been already remarked, is not attained until, combined with true opinion, there is an enumeration of the elements out of which anything is composed.

Theaet. Yes.

Soc. In the same general way, we might also have true opinion about a waggon; but he who can describe its essence by an enumeration of the hundred planks, adds rational explanation to true opinion, and instead of opinion has art and knowledge of the nature of a waggon, in that he attains to the whole through the elements.

Theaet. And do you not agree in that view, Socrates?

Soc. If you do, my friend; but I want to know first, whether you admit the resolution of all things into their elements to be a rational explanation of them, and the consideration of them in syllables or larger combinations of them to be irrational—is this your view?

Theaet. Precisely.

Soc. Well, and do you conceive that a man has knowledge of any element who at one time affirms and at another time denies that element of something, or thinks that the same thing is composed of different elements at different times?

Theaet. Assuredly not.

Soc. And do you not remember that in your case and in that of others this often occurred in the process of learning to read?

Theaet. You mean that I mistook the letters and misspelt the syllables?

Soc. Yes.

Theaet. To be sure; I perfectly remember, and I am very far from supposing that they who are in this condition have knowledge.

Soc. When a person at the time of learning writes the name of Theaetetus, [208] and thinks that he ought to write and does write Th and e; but, again, meaning to write the name of Theodorus, thinks that he ought to write and does write T and e—can we suppose that he knows the first syllables of your two names?

Theaet. We have already admitted that such a one has not yet attained knowledge.

Soc. And in like manner be may enumerate without knowing them the second and third and fourth syllables of your name?

Theaet. He may.

Soc. And in that case, when he knows the order of the letters and can write them out correctly, he has right opinion?

Theaet. Clearly.

Soc. But although we admit that he has right opinion, he will still be without knowledge?

Theaet. Yes.

Soc. And yet he will have explanations, as well as right opinion, for he knew the order of the letters when he wrote; and this we admit to be explanation.

Theaet. True.

Soc. Then, my friend, there is such a thing as right opinion united with definition or explanation, which does not as yet attain to the exactness of knowledge.

Theaet. It would seem so.

Soc. And what we fancied to be a perfect definition of knowledge is a dream only. But perhaps we had better not say so as yet, for were there not three explanations of knowledge, one of which must, as we said, be adopted by him who maintains knowledge to be true opinion combined with rational explanation? And very likely there may be found some one who will not prefer this but the third.

Theaet. You are quite right; there is still one remaining. The first was the image or expression of the mind in speech; the second, which has just been mentioned, is a way of reaching the whole by an enumeration of the elements. But what is the third definition?

Soc. There is, further, the popular notion of telling the mark or sign of difference which distinguishes the thing in question from all others.

Theaet. Can you give me any example of such a definition?

Soc. As, for example, in the case of the sun, I think that you would be contented with the statement that the sun is the brightest of the heavenly bodies which revolve about the earth.

Theaet. Certainly.

Soc. Understand why:—the reason is, as I was just now saying, that if you get at the difference and distinguishing characteristic of each thing, then, as many persons affirm, you will get at the definition or explanation of it; but while you lay hold only of the common and not of the characteristic notion, you will only have the definition of those things to which this common quality belongs.

Theaet. I understand you, and your account of definition is in my judgment correct.

Soc. But he, who having right opinion about anything, can find out the difference which tinguishes it from other things will know that of which before he had only an opinion

Theaet Yes that is what we are maintaining

Soc Nevertheless, Theaetetus on a nearer view I find myself quite disappointed the picture, which at a distance was not so bad has now become altogether unintelligible

Theaet What do you mean?

[209] Soc I will endeavour to explain I will suppose myself to have true opinion of you, and if to this I add your definition then I have knowledge but if not, opinion only

Theaet Yes.

Soc The definition was assumed to be the interpretation of your difference

Theaet True

Soc But when I had only opinion, I had no conception of your distinguishing characteristics

Theaet I suppose not

Soc Then I must have conceived of some general or common nature which no more belonged to you than to another

Theaet True

Soc Tell me, now—How in that case could I have formed a judgment of you any more than of any one else? Suppose that I imagine Theaetetus to be a man who has nose eyes and mouth and every other member complete how would that enable me to distinguish Theaetetus from Theodorus, or from some outer barbarian?

Theaet How could it?

Soc Or if I had further conceived of you, not only as having nose and eyes but as having a snub nose and prominent eyes should I have any more notion of you than of myself and others who resemble me?

Theaet. Certainly not.

Soc Surely I can have no conception of Theaetetus until your snub-nosedness has left an impression on my mind different from the snub-nosedness of all others whom I have ever seen and until your other peculiarities have a like distinctness and so when I meet you tomorrow the right opinion will be re-called?

Theaet Most true

Soc Then right opinion implies the perception of differences?

Theaet Clearly

Soc What then shall we say of adding reason or explanation to right opinion? It the meaning is, that we should form an opinion of the way in which something differs from another thing the proposal is ridiculous

Theaet How so?

Soc We are supposed to acquire a right opinion of the differences which distinguish one thing from another when we have already a right opinion of them and so we go round and round —the revolution of the scytal or pestle, or any other rotatory machine in the same circles, is as nothing compared with such a requirement and we may be truly described as the blind directing the blind for to add those things which we already have, in order that we may learn what we already think, is like a soul utterly benighted

Theaet Tell me what were you going to say just now when you asked the question?

Soc If my boy the argument in speaking of adding the definition had used the word to know and not merely have an opinion" of the difference, this which is the most promising of all the definitions of knowledge would have come to a pretty end for to know is surely to acquire knowledge

[210] Theaet True.

Soc And so when the question is asked, What is knowledge? this fair argument will answer Right opinion with knowledge — knowledge, that is of difference for this, as the said argument maintains is adding the definition

Theaet That seems to be true

Soc But how utterly foolish when we are asking what is knowledge, that the reply should only be, right opinion with knowledge of difference or of anything! And so Theaetetus, knowledge is neither sensation nor true opinion nor yet definition and explanation accompanying and added to true opinion?

Theaet I suppose not.

Soc And are you still in labour and travail my dear friend or have you brought all that you have to say about knowledge to the birth?

Theaet I am sure Socrates that you have elicited from me a good deal more than ever was in me

Soc And does not my art show that you have brought forth wind and that the offspring of your brain are not worth bringing up?

Theaet Very true

Soc But if Theaetetus you should ever conceive afresh you will be all the better for the present investigation and if not you will be soberer and humbler and gentler to other men and will be too modest to fancy that you know what you do not know These are the limits of my art I can no further go nor do I know aught of the things which great and famous

SOPHIST

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE: THEODORUS; THEAETETUS; SOCRATES; An ELEATIC STRANGER, whom Theodorus and Theaetetus bring with them; The younger SOCRATES, who is a silent auditor

[216] Theodorus. HERE we are, Socrates, true to our agreement of yesterday; and we bring with us a stranger from Elea, who is a disciple of Parmenides and Zeno, and a true philosopher.

Socrates. Is he not rather a god, Theodorus, who comes to us in the disguise of a stranger? For Homer says that all the gods, and especially the god of strangers, are companions of the meek and just, and visit the good and evil among men. And may not your companion be one of those higher powers, a cross-examining deity, who has come to spy out our weakness in argument, and to cross-examine us?

Theod. Nay, Socrates, he is not one of the disputatious sort—he is too good for that. And, in my opinion, he is not a god at all; but divine he certainly is, for this is a title which I should give to all philosophers.

Soc. Capital, my friend! and I may add that they are almost as hard to be discerned as the gods. For the true philosophers, and such as are not merely made up for the occasion, appear in various forms unrecognized by the ignorance of men, and they "hover about cities," as Homer declares, looking from above upon human life; and some think nothing of them, and others can never think enough; and sometimes they appear as statesmen, and sometimes as sophists; and then, again, to many they seem to be no better than madmen. I should like to ask our Eleatic friend, if he would tell us, [217] what is thought about them in Italy, and to whom the terms are applied.

Theod. What terms?

Soc. Sophist, statesman, philosopher.

Theod. What is your difficulty about them, and what made you ask?

Soc. I want to know whether by his countrymen they are regarded as one or two; or do they, as the names are three, distinguish also three kinds, and assign one to each name?

Theod. I dare say that the Stranger will not object to discuss the question. What do you say, Stranger?

Stranger. I am far from objecting, Theodorus, nor have I any difficulty in replying that by us they are regarded as three. But to define precisely the nature of each of them is by no means a slight or easy task.

Theod. You have happened to light, Socrates, almost on the very question which we were asking our friend before we came hither, and he excused himself to us, as he does now to you; although he admitted that the matter had been fully discussed, and that he remembered the answer.

Soc. Then do not, Stranger, deny us the first favour which we ask of you: I am sure that you will not, and therefore I shall only beg of you to say whether you like and are accustomed to make a long oration on a subject which you want to explain to another, or to proceed by the method of question and answer. I remember hearing a very noble discussion in which Parmenides employed the latter of the two methods, when I was a young man, and he was far advanced in years.[1]

Str. I prefer to talk with another when he responds pleasantly, and is light in hand; if not, I would rather have my own say.

Str And the acquisitive may be subdivided into two parts there is exchange, which is voluntary and is effected by gifts hire, purchase and the other part of acquisitive, which takes by force of word or deed may be termed conquest?

Theaet That is implied in what has been said.

Str And may not conquest be again subdivided?

Theaet How?

Str Open force may be called fighting and secret force may have the general name of hunting?

Theaet Yes

Str And there is no reason why the art of hunting should not be further divided Theaet How would you make the division?

Str Into the hunting of living and of lifeless prey

Theaet Yes if both kinds exist

[220] Str Of course they exist but the hunting after lifeless things having no special name, except some sorts of diving and other small matters may be omitted the hunting after living things may be called animal hunting

Theaet Yes

Str And animal hunting may be truly said to have two divisions, land animal hunting which has many kinds and names, and water animal hunting or the hunting after animals who swim?

Theaet True

Str And of swimming animals, one class lives on the wing and the other in the water?

Theaet Certainly

Str Fowling is the general term under which the hunting of all birds is included

Theaet True

Str The hunting of animals who live in the water has the general name of fishing

Theaet Yes

Str And this sort of hunting may be further divided also into two principal kinds?

Theaet What are they?

Str There is one kind which takes them in nets another which takes them by a blow

Theaet What do you mean, and how do you distinguish them?

Str As to the first kind—all that surrounds and encloses anything to prevent egress, may be rightly called an enclosure.

Theaet Very true

Str For which reason twig baskets, casting nets, nooses, creels and the like may all be termed enclosures?

Theaet True.

Str And therefore this first kind of capture may be called by us capture with enclosures, or something of that sort?

Theaet Yes

Str The other kind which is practised by a blow with hooks and three pronged spears when summed up under one name may be called striking, unless you, Theaetetus can find some better name?

Theaet Never mind the name—what you suggest will do very well

Str There is one mode of striking which is done at night, and by the light of a fire, and is by the hunters themselves called firing or spearing by firelight.

Theaet True

Str And the fishing by day is called by the general name of barbing because the spears, too are barbed at the point.

Theaet Yes that is the term

Str Of this barb-fishing that which strikes the fish who is below from above is called spearing, because this is the way in which the three pronged spears are mostly used

Theaet Yes, it is often called so

Str Then now there is only one kind remaining

Theaet What is that?

Str When a hook is used, and the fish is not struck in any chance part of his body as he is with the spear but only about the head and mouth, [221] and is then drawn out from below upwards with reeds and rods—What is the right name of that mode of fishing Theaetetus?

Theaet I suspect that we have now discovered the object of our search

Str Then now you and I have come to an understanding not only about the name of the angler's art, but about the definition of the thing itself One half of all art was acquisitive —half of the acquisitive art was conquest or taking by force half of this was hunting and half of hunting was hunting animals half of this was hunting water animals—of this again the under half was fishing half of fishing was striking a part of striking was fishing with a barb and one half of this again being the kind which strikes with a hook and draws the fish from below upwards, is the art which we have been seeking and which from the nature of the operation is denoted angling or drawing up (ἀσπαλιευτική ἀνασπᾶσθαι)

Theaet The result has been quite satisfactorily brought out.

Soc Any one of the present company will re spond kindly to you and you can choose whom you like of them I should recommend you to take a young person—Theaetetus for example —unless you have a preference for some one else

Str I feel ashamed Socrates being a new comer into your society instead of talking a lit tle and hearing others talk to be spinning out a long soliloquy or address as if I wanted to show off For the true answer will certainly be a very long one a great deal longer than might be expected from such a short and simple ques- tion At the same time I fear that I may seem rude and ungracious if I refuse your courteous request [218] especially after what you have said For I certainly cannot object to your pro- posal that Theaetetus should respond having already conversed with him myself and being recommended by you to take him

Theaetetus But are you sure Stranger that this will be quite so acceptable to the rest of the company as Socrates imagines?

Str You hear them applauding Theaetetus after that there is nothing more to be said Well then I am to argue with you and if you tire of the argument, you may complain of your friends and not of me

Theaet I do not think that I shall tire and if I do I shall get my friend here young Socrates, the namesake of the elder Socrates to help he is about my own age and my partner at the gymnasium and is constantly accustomed to work with me

Str Very good you can decide about that for yourself as we proceed Meanwhile you and I will begin together and enquire into the nature of the Sophist first of the three I should like you to make out what he is and bring him to light in a discussion for at present we are only agreed about the name but of the thing to which we both apply the name possibly you have one notion and I another whereas we ought always to come to an understanding about the thing itself in terms of a definition and not merely about the name minus the defi nition Now the tribe of Sophists which we are investigating is not easily caught or defined and the world has long ago agreed that if great subjects are to be adequately treated they must be studied in the lesser and easier instances of them before we proceed to the greatest of all And as I know that the tribe of Sophists is troublesome and hard to be caught I should recommend that we practise beforehand the method which is to be applied to him on some simple and smaller thing unless you can sug gest a better way

Theaet Indeed I cannot

Str Then suppose that we work out some lesser example which will be a pattern of the greater?

Theaet Good

Str What is there which is well known and not great and is yet as susceptible of definition as any larger thing? Shall I say an angler? He is familiar to all of us and not a very interest ing or important person

Theaet He is not

[219] Str Yet I suspect that he will furnish us with the sort of definition and line of en quiry which we want

Theaet Very good

Str Let us begin by asking whether he is a man having art or not having art but some other power

Theaet He is clearly a man of art

Str And of arts there are two kinds?

Theaet What are they?

Str There is agriculture and the tending of mortal creatures and the art of constructing or moulding vessels and there is the art of imi a tion—all these may be appropriately called by a single name

Theaet What do you mean? And what is the name?

Str He who brings into existence something that did not exist before is said to be a produc er and that which is brought into existence is said to be produ ed

Theaet True

Str And all the arts which were just now mentioned are characterized by this power of producing?

Theaet They are

Str Then let us sum them up under the name of productive or creative art

Theaet Very good

Str Next follows the whole class of learning and cognition then comes trade fighting hunt ing And since none of these produces anything but is only engaged in conquering by word or deed or in preventing others from conquering things which exist and have been already pro- duced—in each and all of the e branches there appears to be an art which may be called acquis itive

Theaet Yes that is the proper name

Str Seeing then that all arts are either a quisitive or creative in which class shall we place the art of the angler?

Theaet Clearly in the acquisitive class men of wealth and rank—such is the conclu sion

Theaet Just so

Str Let us take another branch of his gene alogy for he is a professor of a great and many sided art and if we look back at what has pre ceded we see that he presents another aspect, besides that of which we are speaking

Theaet In what respect?

Str There were two sorts of acquisitive art the one concerned with hunting the other with exchange

Theaet There were

Str And of the art of exchange there are two divisions, the one of giving and the other of selling

Theaet. Let us assume that.

Str Next, we will suppose the art of selling to be divided into two parts.

Theaet How?

Str There is one part which is distinguished as the sale of a man's own productions another which is the exchange of the works of others.

Theaet Certainly

Str And is not that part of exchange which takes place in the city being about half of the whole, termed retailing?

Theaet. Yes.

Str And that which exchanges the goods of one city for those of another by selling and buying is the exchange of the merchant?

Theaet To be sure

Str And you are aware that this exchange of the merchant is of two kinds it is partly con cerned with food for the use of the body and partly with the food of the soul which is bartered and received in exchange for money

Theaet What do you mean?

Str You want to know what is the meaning of food for the soul the other kind you surely understand

Theaet Yes.

Str Take music in general and painting and marionette playing and many other things, [224] which are purchased in one city and carried away and sold in another—wares of the soul which are hawked about either for the sake of instruction or amusement —may not he who takes them about and sells them be quite as truly called a merchant as he who sells meats and drink?

Theaet To be sure he may

Str And would you not call by the same name him who buys up knowledge and goes about from city to city exchanging his wares for money?

Theaet Certainly I should

Str Of this merchandise of the soul may not one part be fairly termed the art of display? And there is another part which is certainly not less ridiculous but being a trade in learning must be called by some name germane to the matter?

Theaet Certainly

Str The latter should have two names,—one descriptive of the sale of the knowledge of vir tue, and the other of the sale of other kinds of knowledge.

Theaet Of course.

Str The name of art seller corresponds well enough to the latter but you must try and tell me the name of the other

Theaet He must be the Sophist, whom we are seeking no other name can possibly be right.

Str No other and so this trader in virtue again turns out to be our friend the Sophist, whose art may now be traced from the art of acquisition through exchange, trade, merchan dise, to a merchandise of the soul which is con cerned with speech and the knowledge of vir tue

Theaet Quite true.

Str And there may be a third reappearance of him —for he may have settled down in a city and may fabricate as well as buy these same wares intending to live by selling them, and he would still be called a Sophist?

Theaet Certainly

Str Then that part of acquisitive art which exchanges, and of exchange which either sells a man's own productions or retails those of oth ers, as the case may be, and in either way sells the knowledge of virtue, you would again term Sophistry?

Theaet I must, if I am to keep pace with the argument.

Str Let us consider once more whether there may not be yet another aspect of sophistry

Theaet What is it?

[225] Str In the acquisitive there was a sub division of the combative or fighting art.

Theaet There was

Str Perhaps we had better divide it.

Theaet What shall be the divisions?

Str There shall be one division of the com petitive, and another of the pugnacious

Theaet Very good

Str That part of the pugnacious which is a contest of bodily strength may be properly called by some such name as violent.

Theaet True.

Str And now following this pattern let us endeavour to find out what a Sophist is

Theaet By all means

Str The first question about the angler was whether he was a skilled artist or unskilled?

Theaet True

Str And shall we call our new friend unskilled, or a thorough master of his craft?

Theaet Certainly not unskilled, for his name as indeed you imply must surely express his nature

Str Then he must be supposed to have some art

Theaet What art?

Str By heaven they are cousins! it never occurred to us

Theaet Who are cousins?

Str The angler and the Sophist

Theaet In what way are they related?

Str They both appear to me to be hunters

Theaet How the Sophist? Of the other we have spoken

Str You remember our division of hunting into hunting after swimming animals and land animals

Theaet Yes

Str And you remember that we subdivided the swimming and left the land animals saying that there were many kinds of them?

[222] Theaet Certainly

Str Thus far then the Sophist and the angler starting from the art of acquiring take the same road?

Theaet So it would appear

Str Their paths diverge when they reach the art of animal hunting the one going to the sea shore and to the rivers and to the lakes and angling for the animals which are in them

Theaet Very true

Str While the other goes to land and water of another sort—rivers of wealth and broad meadow lands of generous youth and he also is intending to take the animals which are in them

Theaet What do you mean?

Str Of hunting on land there are two principal divisions

Theaet What are they?

Str One is the hunting of tame and the other of wild animals

Theaet But are tame animals ever hunted?

Str Yes if you include man under tame animals But if you like you may say that there are no tame animals or that if there are man is not among them or you may say that man is a tame animal but is not hunted—you shall decide which of these alternatives you prefer

Theaet I should say Stranger, that man is a tame animal and I admit that he is hunted.

Str Then let us divide the hunting of tame animals into two parts

Theaet How shall we make the division?

Str Let us define piracy man stealing tyranny the whole military art by one name as hunting with violence

Theaet Very good

Str But the art of the lawyer of the popular orator and the art of conversation may be called in one word the art of persuasion

Theaet True

Str And of persuasion there may be said to be two kinds?

Theaet What are they?

Str One is private and the other public

Theaet Yes each of them forms a class

Str And of private hunting one sort receives hire and the other brings gifts

Theaet I do not understand you

Str You seem never to have observed the manner in which lovers hunt

Theaet To what do you refer?

Str I mean that they lavish gifts on those whom they hunt in addition to other inducements

Theaet Most true

Str Let us admit this then to be the amatory art

Theaet Certainly

Str But that sort of hireling whose conversation is pleasing and who baits his hook only with pleasure and exacts nothing but his maintenance in return we should all if I am not mistaken describe as possessing flattery or an art of making things pleasant [223]

Theaet Certainly

Str And that sort which professes to form acquaintances only for the sake of virtue and demands a reward in the shape of money may be fairly called by another name?

Theaet To be sure

Str And what is the name? Will you tell me?

Theaet It is obvious enough for I believe that we have discovered the Sophist which is as I conceive, the proper name for the class described

Str Then now Theaetetus his art may be traced as a branch of the appropriative acquisitive family—which hunts animals —living—land—tame animals which hunts man —privately—for hire —taking money in exchange—having the semblance of education and this is termed Sophistry and is a hunt after young the purification of inanimate substances—to which the arts of fulling and of furbishing in general attend in a number of minute particulars, having a variety of names which are thought ridiculous.

Theaet. Very true.

Str. There can be no doubt that they are thought ridiculous, Theaetetus; but then the dialectical art never considers whether the benefit to be derived from the purge is greater or less than that to be derived from the sponge, and has not more interest in the one than in the other; her endeavour is to know what is and is not kindred in all arts, with a view to the acquisition of intelligence; and having this in view, she honours them all alike, and when she makes comparisons, she counts one of them not a whit more ridiculous than another; nor does she esteem him who adduces as his example of hunting, the general's art, at all more decorous than another who cites that of the vermin-destroyer, but only as the greater pretender of the two. And as to your question concerning the name which was to comprehend all these arts of purification, whether of animate or inanimate bodies, the art of dialectic is in no wise particular about fine words, if she may be only allowed to have a general name for all other purifications, binding them up together and separating them off from the purification of the soul or intellect. For this is the purification at which she wants to arrive, and this we should understand to be her aim.

Theaet. Yes, I understand; and I agree that there are two sorts of purification, and that one of them is concerned with the soul, and that there is another which is concerned with the body.

Str. Excellent; and now listen to what I am going to say, and try to divide further the first of the two.

Theaet. Whatever line of division you suggest, I will endeavour to assist you.

Str. Do we admit that virtue is distinct from vice in the soul?

Theaet. Certainly.

Str. And purification was to leave the good and to cast out whatever is bad?

Theaet. True.

Str. Then any taking away of evil from the soul may be properly called purification?

Theaet. Yes.

Str. And in the soul there are two kinds of

Theaet. What are they?

[228] Str. The one may be compared to disease in the body, the other to deformity.

Theaet. I do not understand.

Str. Perhaps you have never reflected that disease and discord are the same.

Theaet. To this, again, I know not what I should reply.

Str. Do you not conceive discord to be a dissolution of kindred elements, originating in some disagreement?

Theaet. Just that.

Str. And is deformity anything but the want of measure, which is always unsightly?

Theaet. Exactly.

Str. And do we not see that opinion is opposed to desire, pleasure to anger, reason to pain, and that all these elements are opposed to one another in the souls of bad men?

Theaet. Certainly.

Str. And yet they must all be akin?

Theaet. Of course.

Str. Then we shall be right in calling vice a discord and disease of the soul?

Theaet. Most true.

Str. And when things having motion, and aiming at an appointed mark, continually miss their aim and glance aside, shall we say that this is the effect of symmetry among them, or of the want of symmetry?

Theaet. Clearly of the want of symmetry.

Str. But surely we know that no soul is voluntarily ignorant of anything?

Theaet. Certainly not.

Str. And what is ignorance but the aberration of a mind which is bent on truth, and in which the process of understanding is perverted?

Theaet. True.

Str. Then we are to regard an unintelligent soul as deformed and devoid of symmetry?

Theaet. Very true.

Str. Then there are these two kinds of evil in the soul—the one which is generally called vice, and is obviously a disease of the soul.

Theaet. Yes.

Str. And there is the other, which they call ignorance, and which, because existing only in the soul, they will not allow to be vice.

Theaet. I certainly admit what I at first disputed—that there are two kinds of vice in the soul, and that we ought to consider cowardice, intemperance, and injustice to be all alike forms of disease in the soul, and ignorance, of which there are all sorts of varieties, to be deformity.

Str. And in the case of the body are there not two arts which have to do with the two bodily states?

Theaet. What are they?

Str And when the war is one of words it may be termed controversy?

Theaet Yes

Str And controversy may be of two kinds

Theaet What are they?

Str When long speeches are answered by long speeches and there is public discussion about the just and unjust that is forensic controversy

Theaet Yes

Str And there is a private sort of controversy which is cut up into questions and answers, and this is commonly called disputation?

Theaet Yes that is the name

Str And of disputation that sort which is only a discussion about contracts and is carried on at random and without rules of art is recognized by the reasoning faculty to be a distinct class but has hitherto had no distinctive name, and does not deserve to receive one from us

Theaet No for the different sorts of it are too minute and heterogeneous

Str But that which proceeds by rules of art to dispute about justice and injustice in their own nature and about things in general we have been accustomed to call argumentation (Eristic)?

Theaet Certainly

Str And of argumentation one sort wastes money and the other makes money

Theaet Very true

Str Suppose we try and give to each of these two classes a name

Theaet Let us do so

Str I should say that the habit which leads a man to neglect his own affairs for the pleasure of conversation of which the style is far from being agreeable to the majority of his hearers may be fairly termed loquacity such is my opinion

Theaet That is the common name for it

Str But now who the other is who makes money out of private disputation it is your turn to say

Theaet There is only one true answer he is the wonderful Sophist of whom we are in pursuit and who reappears again for the fourth time

[226] Str Yes and with a fresh pedigree for he is the money making species of the Eristic disputatious controversial pugnacious combative acquisitive family as the argument has already proven

Theaet Certainly

Str How true was the observation that he was a many sided animal and not to be caught with one hand as they say!

Theaet Then you must catch him with two

Str Yes we must if we can And therefore let us try another track in our pursuit of him You are aware that there are certain menial occupations which have names among servants?

Theaet Yes there are many such which of them do you mean?

Str I mean such as sifting straining winnowing threshing

Theaet Certainly

Str And besides these there are a great many more such as carding spinning adjusting the warp and the woof and thousands of similar expressions are used in the arts

Theaet Of what are they to be patterns, and what are we going to do with them all?

Str I think that in all of these there is implied a notion of division

Theaet Yes

Str Then if as I was saying there is one art which includes all of them ought not that art to have one name?

Theaet And what is the name of the art?

Str The art of discerning or discriminating

Theaet Very good

Str Think whether you cannot divide this

Theaet I should have to think a long while

Str In all the previously named processes either like has been separated from like or the better from the worse

Theaet I see now what you mean

Str There is no name for the first kind of separation of the second which throws away the worse and preserves the better I do know a name

Theaet What is it?

Str Every discernment or discrimination of that kind as I have observed is called a purification

Theaet Yes that is the usual expression

Str And any one may see that purification is of two kinds

Theaet Perhaps so if he were allowed time to think but I do not see at this moment

Str There are many purifications of bodies which may with propriety be comprehended under a single name

Theaet What are they and what is their name?

[227] Str There is the purification of living bodies in their inward and in their outward parts of which the former is duly effected by medicine and gymnastic, the latter by the not very dignified art of the bath man and there is

Str Lest we should ass gn to them too high a prerogative.

Theaet Yet the Sophist has a certain likeness to our minister of purification.

Str Yes, the same sort of likeness which a wolf, who is the fiercest of animals, has to a dog who is the gentlest. But he who would not be found tripping ought to be very careful in this matter of comparisons for they are most slippery things. Nevertheless let us assume that the Sophists are the men I say this provisional ly for I think that the line which divides them will be marked enough if proper care is taken Theaet Likely enough.

Str Let us grant, then, that from the discerning art comes purification, and from purification let there be separated off a part wh ch is concerned with the soul of this mental purification instruction is a portion, and of instruction education, and of education, that refutation of va n conceit which has been disco ered in the present argument and let this be called by you and me the nobly-descended art of Sophistry

Theaet Very well and yet, considering the number of forms in which he has presented himself, I begin to doubt how I can with any truth or confidence describe the real nature of the Sophist.

Str You naturally feel perplexed and yet I think that he must be still more perplexed in his attempt to escape us, for as the proverb says, when every way is blocked there is no escape now then is the time of all others to set upon him.

Theaet True

Str First let us wait a moment and recover breath, and while we are resting we may reckon up in how many forms he has appeared. In the first place, he was disco ered to be a paid hunter after wealth and youth.

Theaet Yes.

Str In the second place, he was a merchant in the goods of the soul.

Theaet Certainly

St In the third place he has turned out to be a etailer of the same sort of wares

Th aet Yes and n the fourth pla e, he himself manufactured the learned wares which he sold

Str Quite right I will try and remember th fifth myself He belonged to the fighting class, and was further d stingu shed as a hero of debate, who p ofessed the eristic art

Theaet. True

Str The sixth po nt was doubtful and yet we at last agreed that he was a purger of souls, who cleared away notions obstructive to knowledge.

Theaet Very true.

[232] Str Do you not see that when the professor of any art has one name and many kinds of knowledge, there must be something wrong? The multiplicity of names which is applied to him shows that the common principle to which all these branches of knowledge are tending is not understood

Theaet I should imagine this to be the case

Str At any rate we will understand him and no indolence shall prevent us. Let us begin again, then and re-examine some of our statements concerning the Sophist there was one thing which appeared to me especially characteristic of him.

Theaet To what are you referring?

Str We were saying of him if I am not mistaken, that he was a disputer?

Theaet We were.

Str And does he not also teach others the art of disputation?

Theaet Certainly he does

Str And about what does he profess that he teaches men to dispute? To begin at the beginning—Does he make them able to dispute about di ine things, which are invisible to men in general?

Theaet At any rate he is said to do so

Str And what do you say of the visible things in heaven and earth and the like?

Theaet Certainly he disputes, and teaches to dispute about them

Str Then again, in private conversation when any uni ersal assertion is made about generation and essence, we kno that such persons are tremendous argufiers, and are able to impart their own skill to others.

Theaet Undoubtedly

Str And do they not profess to make men able to dispute about law and about politics in general?

Th aet Why no one would have anything to say to them, if they did not make these profess ons

Str In all and every art, what the craftsman ought to say in answer to any question is written down in a popular form and he who likes may learn

Theaet I suppose that you are referring to the precepts of Protagoras about wrestling and the other arts?

Str Yes, my friend and about a good many other things In a word, is not the art of d sputation a power of d sputing about all things?

Th aet Certainly there does not seem to be

Str There is gymnastic, which has to do with deformity and medicine which has to do with disease

Theaet True

[229] Str And where there is insolence and injustice and cowardice is not chastisement the art which is most required?

Theaet That certainly appears to be the opinion of mankind

Str Again of the various kinds of ignorance, may not instruction be rightly said to be the remedy?

Theaet True

Str And of the art of instruction shall we say that there is one or many kinds? At any rate there are two principal ones Think

Theaet I will

Str I believe that I can see how we shall soonest arrive at the answer to this question

Theaet How?

Str If we can discover a line which divides ignorance into two halves For a division of ignorance into two parts will certainly imply that the art of instruction is also twofold answering to the two divisions of ignorance

Theaet Well and do you see what you are looking for?

Str I do seem to myself to see one very large and bad sort of ignorance which is quite separate and may be weighed in the scale against all other sorts of ignorance put together

Theaet What is it?

Str When a person supposes that he knows and does not know this appears to be the great source of all the errors of the intellect

Theaet True

Str And this if I am not mistaken is the kind of ignorance which specially earns the title of stupidity

Theaet True

Str What name then shall be given to the sort of instruction which gets rid of this?

Theaet The instruction which you mean Stranger is I should imagine not the teaching of handicraft arts but what, thanks to us has been termed education in this part of the world

Str Yes Theaetetus and by nearly all Hellenes But we have still to consider whether education admits of any further division

Theaet We have

Str I think that there is a point at which such a division is possible

Theaet Where?

Str Of education one method appears to be rougher and another smoother

Theaet How are we to distinguish the two?

Str There is the time honoured mode which our fathers commonly practised towards their sons and which is still adopted by many—either of roughly reproving their errors [230] or of gently advising them which varieties may be correctly included under the general term of admonition

Theaet True

Str But whereas some appear to have arrived at the conclusion that all ignorance is involuntary and that no one who thinks himself wise is willing to learn any of those things in which he is conscious of his own cleverness and that the admonitory sort of instruction gives much trouble and does little good—

Theaet There they are quite right

Str Accordingly they set to work to eradicate the spirit of conceit in another way

Theaet In what way?

Str They cross examine a man s words when he thinks that he is saying something and is really saying nothing and easily convict him of inconsistencies in his opinions these they then collect by the dialectical process, and placing them side by side show that they contradict one another about the same things in relation to the same things and in the same respect He seeing this is angry with himself and grows gentle towards others and thus is entirely delivered from great prejudices and harsh notions in a way which is most amusing to the hearer and produces the most lasting good effect on the person who is the subject of the operation. For as the physician considers that the body will receive no benefit from taking food until the internal obstacles have been removed so the purifier of the soul is conscious that his patient will receive no benefit from the application of knowledge until he is refuted and from refutation learns modesty he must be purged of his prejudices first and made to think that he knows only what he knows and no more

Theaet That is certainly the best and wisest state of mind

Str For all these reasons Theaetetus we must admit that refutation is the greatest and chiefest of purifications and he who has not been refuted though he be the Great King himself is in an awful state of impurity he is uninstructed and deformed in those things in which he who would be truly blessed ought to be fairest and purest

Theaet Very true

Str And who are the ministers of this art? I am afraid to say the Sophists [231]

Theaet Why?

Theaet That is my view as far as I can judge although at my age, I may be one of those who see things at a distance only

Str And the wish of all of us, who are your friends is and always will be to bring you as near to the truth as we can without the sad [235] reality And now I should like you to tell me, whether the Sophist is not visibly a magician and imitator of true being or are we still disposed to think that he may have a true knowledge of the various matters about which he disputes?

Theaet But how can he Stranger? Is there any doubt, after what has been said that he is to be located in one of the divisions of children at play?

Str Then we must place him in the class of magicians and mimics

Theaet Certainly we must.

Str And now our business is not to let the animal out, for we have got him in a sort of dialectical net, and there is one thing which he decidedly will not escape

Theaet What is that?

Str The inference that he is a juggler

Theaet Precisely my own opinion of him.

Str Then clearly we ought as soon as possible to divide the image making art, and go down into the net, and if the Sophist does not run away from us to seize him according to orders and deliver him over to reason, who is the lord of the hunt, and proclaim the capture of him and if he creeps into the recesses of the imitative art, and secretes himself in one of them to divide again and follow him up until in some sub-section of imitation he is caught For our method of tackling each and all is one which neither he nor any other creature will ever escape in triumph

Theaet Well said and let us do as you propose

Str Well, then, pursuing the same analytic method as before, I think that I can discern two divisions of the imitative art, but I am not as yet able to see in which of them the desired form is to be found

Theaet Will you tell me first what are the two divisions of which you are speaking?

Str One is the art of likeness making —generally a likeness of anything is made by producing a copy which is executed according to the proportions of the original similar in length and breadth and depth each thing receiving also its appropriate colour

Theaet Is not this always the aim of imitation?

Str Not always in works either of sculpture or of painting which are of any magnitude [236] there is a certain degree of deception for if artists were to give the true proportions of their fair works the upper part, which is farther off would appear to be out of proportion in comparison with the lower which is nearer and so they give up the truth in their images and make only the proportions which appear to be beautiful disregarding the real ones

Theaet Quite true

Str And that which being other is also like, may we not fairly call a likeness or image?

Theaet Yes

Str And may we not, as I did just now call that part of the imitative art which is concerned with making such images the art of likeness-making?

Theaet Let that be the name.

Str And what shall we call those resemblances of the beautiful which appear such owing to the unfavourable position of the spectator whereas if a person had the power of getting a correct view of works of such magnitude they would appear not even like that to which they profess to be like? May we not call these appearances since they appear only and are not really like?

Theaet Certainly

Str There is a great deal of this kind of thing in painting and in all imitation

Theaet Of course

Str And may we not fairly call the sort of art, which produces an appearance and not an image, phantastic art?

Theaet Most fairly

Str These then are the two kinds of image making—the art of making likenesses and phantastic or the art of making appearances?

Theaet True

Str I was doubtful before in which of them I should place the Sophist nor am I even now able to see clearly verily he is a wonderful and inscrutable creature And now in the cleverest manner he has got into an impossible place.

Theaet Yes, he has

Str Do you speak advisedly or are you carried away at the moment by the habit of assenting into giving a hasty answer?

Theaet May I ask to what you are referring?

Str My dear friend we are engaged in a very difficult speculation—there can be no doubt of that for how a thing can appear and seem and not be, or how a man can say a thing which is not true, [237] has always been and still remains a very perplexing question Can any one much which is left out

Str But oh! my dear youth, do you suppose this possible? for perhaps your young eyes may see things which to our duller sight do not appear

[233] Theaet To what are you alluding? I do not think that I understand your present question

Str I ask whether anybody can understand all things

Theaet Happy would mankind be if such a thing were possible!

Str But how can any one who is ignorant dispute in a rational manner against him who knows?

Theaet He cannot

Str Then why has the sophistical art such a mysterious power?

Theaet To what do you refer?

Str How do the Sophists make young men believe in their supreme and universal wisdom? For if they neither disputed nor were thought to dispute rightly or being thought to do so were deemed no wiser for their controversial skill, then to quote your own observation no one would give them money or be willing to learn their art.

Theaet They certainly would not

Str But they are willing

Theaet Yes they are

Str Yes and the reason as I should imagine is that they are supposed to have knowledge of those things about which they dispute?

Theaet Certainly

Str And they dispute about all things?

Theaet True

Str And therefore to their disciples they appear to be all wise?

Theaet Certainly

Str But they are not for that was shown to be impossible

Theaet Impossible of course

Str Then the Sophist has been shown to have a sort of conjectural or apparent knowledge only of all things which is not the truth?

Theaet Exactly no better description of him could be given

Str Let us now take an illustration which will still more clearly explain his nature

Theaet What is it?

Str I will tell you and you shall answer me giving your very closest attention Suppose that a person were to profess not that he could speak or dispute, but that he knew how to make and do all things by a single art

Theaet All things?

Str I see that you do not understand the first word that I utter for you do not understand the meaning of all

Theaet No I do not

Str Under all things I include you and me, and also animals and trees

Theaet What do you mean

Str Suppose a person to say that he will make you and me and all creatures

[234] Theaet What would he mean by making ? He cannot be a husbandman —for you said that he is a maker of animals

Str Yes and I say that he is also the maker of the sea and the earth and the heavens, and the gods and of all other things and further that he can make them in no time, and sell them for a few pence

Theaet That must be a jest

Str And when a man says that he knows all things and can teach them to another at a small cost and in a short time is not that a jest?

Theaet Certainly

Str And is there any more artistic or graceful form of jest than imitation?

Theaet Certainly not and imitation is a very comprehensive term which includes under one class the most diverse sorts of things

Str We know of course that he who professes by one art to make all things is really a painter and by the painter s art makes resemblances of real things which have the same name with them and he can deceive the less intelligent sort of young children to whom he shows his pictures at a distance into the belief that he has the absolute power of making whatever he likes

Theaet Certainly

Str And may there not be supposed to be an imitative art of reasoning? Is it not possible to enchant the hearts of young men by words poured through their ears when they are still at a distance from the truth of facts by exhibiting to them fictitious arguments and making them think that they are true, and that the speaker is the wisest of men in all things?

Theaet Yes why should there not be another such art?

Str But as time goes on and their hearers advance in years and come into closer contact with realities and have learnt by sad experience to see and feel the truth of things are not the greater part of them compelled to change many opinions which they formerly entertained so that the great appears small to them and the easy difficult and all their dreamy speculations are overturned by the facts of life?

Theaet. What do you mean? Speak more clearly.

Str. Do not expect clearness from me. For I, who maintain that not-being has no part either in the one or many, just now spoke and am still speaking of not-being as one; for I say "not-being." Do you understand?

Theaet. Yes.

Str. And a little while ago I said that not-being is unutterable, unspeakable, indescribable: do you follow?

Theaet. I do after a fashion.

Str. When I introduced the word "is," did I not contradict what I said before?

[239] Theaet. Clearly.

Str. And in using the singular verb, did I not speak of not-being as one?

Theaet. Yes.

Str. And when I spoke of not-being as indescribable and unspeakable and unutterable, in using each of these words in the singular, did I not refer to not-being as one?

Theaet. Certainly.

Str. And yet we say that, strictly speaking, it should not be defined as one or many, and should not even be called "it," for the use of the word "it" would imply a form of unity.

Theaet. Quite true.

Str. How, then, can any one put any faith in me? For now, as always, I am unequal to the refutation of not-being. And therefore, as I was saying, do not look to me for the right way of speaking about not-being; but come, let us try the experiment with you.

Theaet. What do you mean?

Str. Make a noble effort, as becomes youth, and endeavour with all your might to speak of not-being in a right manner, without introducing into it either existence or unity or plurality.

Theaet. It would be a strange boldness in me which would attempt the task when I see you thus discomfited.

Str. Say no more of ourselves; but until we find some one or other who can speak of not-being without number, we must acknowledge that the Sophist is a clever rogue who will not be got out of his hole.

Theaet. Most true.

Str. And if we say to him that he professes an art of making appearances, he will grapple with us and retort our argument upon ourselves; and when we call him an image-maker he will say, "Pray what do you mean at all by an image?"—and I should like to know, Theaetetus, how we can possibly answer the younker's question?

Theaet. We shall doubtless tell him of the images which are reflected in water or in mirrors; also of sculptures, pictures, and other duplicates.

Str. I see, Theaetetus, that you have never made the acquaintance of the Sophist.

Theaet. Why do you think so?

Str. He will make believe to have his eyes shut, or to have none.

Theaet. What do you mean?

Str. When you tell him of something existing in a mirror, or in sculpture, [240] and address him as though he had eyes, he will laugh you to scorn, and will pretend that he knows nothing of mirrors and streams, or of sight at all; he will say that he is asking about an idea.

Theaet. What can he mean?

Str. The common notion pervading all these objects, which you speak of as many, and yet call by the single name of image, as though it were the unity under which they were all included. How will you maintain your ground against him?

Theaet. How, Stranger, can I describe an image except as something fashioned in the likeness of the true?

Str. And do you mean this something to be some other true thing, or what do you mean?

Theaet. Certainly not another true thing, but only a resemblance.

Str. And you mean by true that which really is?

Theaet. Yes.

Str. And the not true is that which is the opposite of the true?

Theaet. Exactly.

Str. A resemblance, then, is not really real, if, as you say, not true?

Theaet. Nay, but it is in a certain sense.

Str. You mean to say, not in a true sense?

Theaet. Yes; it is in reality only an image.

Str. Then what we call an image is in reality really unreal.

Theaet. In what a strange complication of being and not-being we are involved!

Str. Strange! I should think so. See how, by his reciprocation of opposites, the many-headed Sophist has compelled us, quite against our will, to admit the existence of not-being.

Theaet. Yes, indeed, I see.

Str. The difficulty is how to define his art without falling into a contradiction.

Theaet. How do you mean? And where does the danger lie?

Str. When we say that he deceives us with an illusion, and that his art is illusory, do we mean say or think that falsehood really exists and avoid being caught in a contradiction? Indeed, Theaetetus the task is a difficult one

Theaet Why?

Str He who says that falsehood exists has the audacity to assert the being of not being for this is implied in the possibility of falsehood But my boy in the days when I was a boy the great Parmenides protested against this doctrine and to the end of his life he continued to inculcate the same lesson—always repeating both in verse and out of verse

Keep your mind from this way of enquiry for never will you show that not being is

Such is his testimony which is confirmed by the very expression when sifted a little Would you object to begin with the consideration of the words themselves?

Theaet Never mind about me I am only desirous that you should carry on the argument in the best way and that you should take me with you

Str Very good and now say do we venture to utter the forbidden word not being ?

Theaet Certainly we do

Str Let us be serious then and consider the question neither in strife nor play suppose that one of the hearers of Parmenides was asked To what is the term not being to be applied? —do you know what sort of object he would single out in reply and what answer he would make to the enquirer?

Theaet That is a difficult question and one not to be answered at all by a person like myself

Str There is at any rate no difficulty in seeing that the predicate not being is not applicable to any being

Theaet None certainly

Str And if not to being then not to something

Theaet Of course not

Str It is also plain that in speaking of something we speak of being for to speak of an abstract something naked and isolated from all being is impossible

Theaet Impossible

Str You mean by assenting to imply that he who says something must say some one thing?

Theaet Yes

Str Some in the singular (τι) you would say is the sign of one some in the dual (τινε) of two some in the plural (τινες) of many?

Theaet Exactly

Str Then he who says not something must say absolutely nothing

Theaet Most assuredly

Str And as we cannot admit that a man speaks and says nothing, he who says not being does not speak at all

Theaet The difficulty of the argument can no further go

[238] Str Not yet my friend is the time for such a word for there still remains of all perplexities the first and greatest touching the very foundation of the matter

Theaet What do you mean? Do not be afraid to speak

Str To that which is, may be attributed some other thing which is?

Theaet Certainly

Str But can anything which is be attributed to that which is not?

Theaet Impossible

Str And all number is to be reckoned among things which are?

Theaet Yes surely number if anything has a real existence

Str Then we must not attempt to attribute to not being number either in the singular or plural?

Theaet The argument implies that we should be wrong in doing so

Str But how can a man either express in words or even conceive in thought things which are not or a thing which is not without number?

Theaet How indeed?

Str When we speak of things which are not, are we not attributing plurality to not being?

Theaet Certainly

Str But on the other hand when we say what is not do we not attribute unity?

Theaet Manifestly

Str Nevertheless we maintain that you may not and ought not to attribute being to not being?

Theaet Most true

Str Do you see then that not being in itself can neither be spoken uttered, or thought, but that it is unthinkable unutterable, unspeakable indescribable?

Theaet Quite true

Str But if so I was wrong in telling you just now that the difficulty which was coming is the greatest of all

Theaet What! is there a greater still behind?

Str Well I am surprised after what has been said already that you do not see the difficulty in which he who would refute the notion of not being is involved For he is compelled to contradict himself as soon as he makes the attempt.

ed as self-evident, lest we may have fallen into some confusion and be too ready to assent to one another fancying that we are quite clear about them.

Theaet Say more distinctly what you mean

Str I think that Parmenides and all who ever yet undertook to determine the number and nature of existences talked to us in rather a light and easy strain

Theaet How?

Str As if we had been children to whom they repeated each his own mythus or story —one said that there were three principles and that at one time there was war between certain of them and then again there was peace, and they were married and begat children and brought them up and another spoke of two principles —a moist and a dry or a hot and a cold and made them marry and cohabit The Eleatics howe er in our part of the world, say that all things are many in name, but in nature one this is their mythus, which goes back to Xenophanes, and is e en older Then there are Ionian, and in more recent times Sicilian muses, who have arri ed at the conclusion that to unite the two principles is safer and to say that being is one and many and that these are held together by enmity and friendship ever parting e er meeting as the severer Muses assert, while the gentler ones do not insist on the perpetual strife and peace, [243] but admit a relaxation and alternation of them peace and un ty some times prevailing under the sway of Aphrodite, and then again plurality and war by reason of a princ ple of strife Whether any of them spoke the truth in all th s is hard to determine be s des, antiqu ty and famous men should have re erence and not be liable to accusations so serious Yet one thing may be said of them without offence—

The t What thing?

Str That they ent on their several ays disda ning to not ce p opl l ke oursel es they d d ot care hether they took us with them or left us behind them

Theaet Ho do y u mean?

St I mean t say th t hen they talk of one, tw   more elem nt   h h are or ha e become or re becom g or again of heat mingling th cold sum ng i some other part of the r w k separatio and mixt es,—tell me, The etet s do you und r tand what they mean by these e press o ? When I a a younger man I used to fancy that I understood quite well what ant by the term not being wh ch is present subject of dispute and now you see in what a fix we are about it.

Theaet I see

Str And very likely we have been getting into the same perplexity about being and yet may fancy that when anybody utters the word we understand him quite easily although we do not know about not being But we may be equally ignorant of both

Theaet I dare say

Str And the same may be said of all the terms just mentioned

Theaet True

Str The consideration of most of them may be deferred but we had better now discuss the chief captain and leader of them

Theaet Of what are you speaking? You clearly think that we must first investigate what people mean by the word being

Str You follow close at my heels, Theaetetus For the right method I conceive will be to call into our presence the dualistic philosophers and to interrogate them Come, we will say "Ye, who affirm that hot and cold or any other two principles are the universe, what is this term which you apply to both of them and what do you mean when you say that both and each of them are? How are we to understand the word are? Upon your view are we to suppose that there is a third principle over and above the other two—three in all and not two? For clearly you cannot say that one of the two principles is being and yet attribute being equally to both of them for if you did whichever of the two is identified with being will comprehend the other and so they will be one and not two

Th aet Very true

Str But perhaps you mean to g ve the name of "being to both of them together?

Theaet Quite likely

[244] Str "Then friends," we shall reply to them the answer is plainly that the two will still be resol ed into one.

Theaet Most true

Str "Since then e are in a difficulty please to tell us what you mean hen you speak of being for there can be no doubt that you al w ys f om the first understood your own meaning whereas e once th ught that we understood you but now we are in a great strait Please to begin by explaining this matter to us, and let us no longer fancy that we understand you when we entirely m understand you" There will be no impropriety in our demanding an answer to th s question either of the dualists or of the pluralists?

that our soul is led by his art to think falsely or what do we mean?

Theaet There is nothing else to be said

Str Again false opinion is that form of opinion which thinks the opposite of the truth —You would assent?

Theaet Certainly

Str You mean to say that false opinion thinks what is not?

Theaet Of course

Str Does false opinion think that things which are not are not, or that in a certain sense they are?

Theaet Things that are not must be imagined to exist in a certain sense, if any degree of falsehood is to be possible

Str And does not false opinion also think that things which most certainly exist do not exist at all?

Theaet Yes

Str And here, again, is falsehood?

Theaet Falsehood—yes

Str And in like manner a false proposition will be deemed to be one which asserts the non existence of things which are and the existence of things which are not

Theaet There is no other way in which a false proposition can arise

[241] Str There is not but the Sophist will deny these statements And indeed how can any rational man assent to them when the very expressions which we have just used were before acknowledged by us to be unutterable unspeakable indescribable, unthinkable? Do you see his point Theaetetus?

Theaet Of course he will say that we are contradicting ourselves when we hazard the assertion that falsehood exists in opinion and in words for in maintaining this we are compelled over and over again to assert being of not being which we admitted just now to be an utter impossibility

Str How well you remember! And now it is high time to hold a consultation as to what we ought to do about the Sophist for if we persist in looking for him in the class of false workers and magicians you see that the handles for objection and the difficulties which will arise are very numerous and obvious

Theaet They are indeed

Str We have gone through but a very small portion of them, and they are really infinite

Theaet If that is the case we cannot possibly catch the Sophist

Str Shall we then be so faint hearted as to give him up?

Theaet Certainly not I should say if we can get the slightest hold upon him

Str Will you then forgive me and as your words imply not be altogether displeased if I flinch a little from the grasp of such a sturdy argument?

Theaet To be sure I will

Str I have a yet more urgent request to make,

Theaet Which is—?

Str That you will promise not to regard me as a parricide

Theaet And why?

Str Because in self defence, I must test the philosophy of my father Parmenides and try to prove by main force that in a certain sense not being is, and that being on the other hand is not

Theaet Some attempt of the kind is clearly needed

Str Yes a blind man, as they say might see that and unless these questions are decided in one way or another no one when he speaks of false words or false opinion or idols or images or imitations or appearances or about the arts which are concerned with them can avoid falling into ridiculous contradictions

Theaet Most true

[242] Str And therefore I must venture to lay hands on my father s argument for if I am to be over scrupulous I shall have to give the matter up

Theaet Nothing in the world should ever induce us to do so

Str I have a third little request which I wish to make

Theaet What is it?

Str You heard me say what I have always felt and still feel—that I have no heart for this argument?

Theaet I did

Str I tremble at the thought of what I have said and expect that you will deem me mad when you hear of my sudden changes and shiftings let me therefore observe that I am examining the question entirely out of regard for you

Theaet There is no reason for you to fear that I shall impute any impropriety to you if you attempt this refutation and proof take heart therefore, and proceed

Str And where shall I begin the perilous enterprise? I think that the road which I must take is—

Theaet Which?—Let me hear

Str I think that we had better first of all consider the points which at present are regard

Str. We are far from having exhausted the more exact thinkers who treat of being and not-being. But let us be content to leave them, [246] and proceed to view those who speak less precisely; and we shall find as the result of all, that the nature of being is quite as difficult to comprehend as that of not-being.

Theaet. Then now we will go to the others.

Str. There appears to be a sort of war of Giants and Gods going on amongst them; they are fighting with one another about the nature of essence.

Theaet. How is that?

Str. Some of them are dragging down all things from heaven and from the unseen to earth, and they literally grasp in their hands rocks and oaks; of these they lay hold, and obstinately maintain, that the things only which can be touched or handled have being or essence, because they define being and body as one, and if any one else says that what is not a body exists they altogether despise him, and will hear of nothing but body.

Theaet. I have often met with such men, and terrible fellows they are.

Str. And that is the reason why their opponents cautiously defend themselves from above, out of an unseen world, mightily contending that true essence consists of certain intelligible and incorporeal ideas; the bodies of the materialists, which by them are maintained to be the very truth, they break up into little bits by their arguments, and affirm them to be, not essence, but generation and motion. Between the two armies, Theaetetus, there is always an endless conflict raging concerning these matters.

Theaet. True.

Str. Let us ask each party in turn, to give an account of that which they call essence.

Theaet. How shall we get it out of them?

Str. With those who make being to consist in ideas, there will be less difficulty, for they are civil people enough; but there will be very great difficulty, or rather an absolute impossibility, in getting an opinion out of those who drag everything down to matter. Shall I tell you what we must do?

Theaet. What?

Str. Let us, if we can, really improve them; but if this is not possible, let us imagine them to be better than they are, and more willing to answer in accordance with the rules of argument, and then their opinion will be more worth having; for that which better men acknowledge has more weight than that which is acknowledged by inferior men. Moreover we are no respecters of persons, but seekers after truth.

Theaet. Very good.

Str. Then now, on the supposition that they are improved, let us ask them to state their views, and do you interpret them.

Theaet. Agreed.

Str. Let them say whether they would admit that there is such a thing as a mortal animal.

Theaet. Of course they would.

Str. And do they not acknowledge this to be a body having a soul?

Theaet. Certainly they do.

Str. Meaning to say the soul is something which exists?

[247] Theaet. True.

Str. And do they not say that one soul is just, and another unjust, and that one soul is wise, and another foolish?

Theaet. Certainly.

Str. And that the just and wise soul becomes just and wise by the possession of justice and wisdom, and the opposite under opposite circumstances?

Theaet. Yes, they do.

Str. But surely that which may be present or may be absent will be admitted by them to exist?

Theaet. Certainly.

Str. And, allowing that justice, wisdom, the other virtues, and their opposites exist, as well as a soul in which they inhere, do they affirm any of them to be visible and tangible, or are they all invisible?

Theaet. They would say that hardly any of them are visible.

Str. And would they say that they are corporeal?

Theaet. They would distinguish: the soul would be said by them to have a body; but as to the other qualities of justice, wisdom, and the like, about which you asked, they would not venture either to deny their existence, or to maintain that they were all corporeal.

Str. Verily, Theaetetus, I perceive a great improvement in them; the real aborigines, children of the dragon's teeth, would have been deterred by no shame at all, but would have obstinately asserted that nothing is which they are not able to squeeze in their hands.

Theaet. That is pretty much their notion.

Str. Let us push the question; for if they will admit that any, even the smallest particle of being, is incorporeal, it is enough; they must then say what that nature is which is common to both the corporeal and incorporeal, and which they have in their mind's eye when they say of both

Theaet Certainly not

Str And what about the assertors of the one ness of the all—must we not endeavour to as certain from them what they mean by being ?

Theaet By all means

Str Then let them answer this question One you say alone is? Yes they will reply

Theaet True

Str And there is something which you call being ?

Theaet Yes

Str And is being the same as one and do you apply two names to the same thing?

Theaet What will be their answer Stranger?

Str It is clear Theaetetus that he who as serts the unity of being will find a difficulty in answering this or any other question

Theaet Why so?

Str To admit of two names and to affirm that there is nothing but unity is surely ridicu lous?

Theaet Certainly

Str And equally irrational to admit that a name is anything?

Theaet How so?

Str To distinguish the name from the thing implies duality

Theaet Yes

Str And yet he who identifies the name with the thing will be compelled to say that it is the name of nothing or if he says that it is the name of something even then the name will only be the name of a name and of nothing else

Theaet True

Str And the one will turn out to be only one of one and being absolute unity will represent a mere name

Theaet Certainly

Str And would they say that the whole is other than the one that is or the same with it?

Theaet To be sure they would and they ac tually say so

Str If being is a whole as Parmenides sings,—

Every way like unto the fullness of a well rounded sphere
Evenly balanced from the centre on every side
And must needs be neither greater nor less in any way
Neither on this side nor on that—then being has a centre and extremes and hav ing these must also have parts

Theaet True

[245] Str Yet that which has parts may have the attribute of unity in all the parts and in this way being all and a whole may be one?

Theaet Certainly

Str But that of which this is the condition cannot be absolute unity?

Theaet Why not?

Str Because, according to right reason that which is truly one must be affirmed to be ab solutely indivisible

Theaet Certainly

Str But this indivisible if made up of many parts will contradict reason

Theaet I understand

Str Shall we say that being is one and a whole because it has the attribute of unity? Or shall we say that being is not a whole at all?

Theaet That is a hard alternative to offer

Str Most true for being having in a certain sense the attribute of one, is yet proved not to be the same as one and the all is therefore more than one

Theaet Yes

Str And yet if being be not a whole through having the attribute of unity and there be such a thing as an absolute whole being lacks some thing of its own nature?

Theaet Certainly

Str Upon this view again being having a defect of being will become not being?

Theaet True

Str And again the all becomes more than one for being and the whole will each have their separate nature

Theaet Yes

Str But if the whole does not exist at all all the previous difficulties remain the same and there will be the further difficulty that besides having no being being can never have come into being

Theaet Why so?

Str Because that which comes into being al ways comes into being as a whole so that he who does not give whole a place among beings cannot speak either of essence or generation as existing

Theaet Yes that certainly appears to be true

Str Again how can that which is not a whole have any quantity? For that which is of a certain quantity must necessarily be the whole of that quantity

Theaet Exactly

Str And there will be innumerable other points each of them causing infinite trouble to him who says that being is either one or two

Theaet The difficulties which are dawning upon us prove this for one objection connects with another and they are always involving what has preceded in a greater and worse per plexity and mode and subject could ever exist without a principle of rest?

Theaet. Certainly not.

Str. Can you see how without them mind could exist, or come into existence anywhere?

Theaet. No.

Str. And surely contend we must in every possible way against him who would annihilate knowledge and reason and mind, and yet ventures to speak confidently about anything.

Theaet. Yes, with all our might.

Str. Then the philosopher, who has the truest reverence for these qualities, cannot possibly accept the notion of those who say that the whole is at rest, either as unity or in many forms: and he will be utterly deaf to those who assert universal motion. As children say entreatingly "Give us both," so he will include both the moveable and immoveable in his definition of being and all.

Theaet. Most true.

Str. And now, do we seem to have gained a fair notion of being?

Theaet. Yes truly.

Str. Alas, Theaetetus, methinks that we are now only beginning to see the real difficulty of the enquiry into the nature of it.

Theaet. What do you mean?

Str. O my friend, do you not see that nothing can exceed our ignorance, and yet we fancy that we are saying something good?

Theaet. I certainly thought that we were; and I do not at all understand how we never found out our desperate case.

[250] Str. Reflect: after having made these admissions, may we not be justly asked the same questions which we ourselves were asking of those who said that all was hot and cold?

Theaet. What were they? Will you recall them to my mind?

Str. To be sure I will, and I will remind you of them, by putting the same questions to you which I did to them, and then we shall get on.

Theaet. True.

Str. Would you not say that rest and motion are in the most entire opposition to one another?

Theaet. Of course.

Str. And yet you would say that both and either of them equally are?

Theaet. I should.

Str. And when you admit that both or either of them are, do you mean to say that both or either of them are in motion?

Theaet. Certainly not.

Str. Or do you wish to imply that they are both at rest, when you say that they are?

Theaet. Of course not.

Str. Then you conceive of being as some third and distinct nature, under which rest and motion are alike included; and, observing that they both participate in being, you declare that they are.

Theaet. Truly we seem to have an intimation that being is some third thing, when we say that rest and motion are.

Str. Then being is not the combination of rest and motion, but something different from them.

Theaet. So it would appear.

Str. Being, then, according to its own nature, is neither in motion nor at rest.

Theaet. That is very much the truth.

Str. Where, then, is a man to look for help who would have any clear or fixed notion of being in his mind?

Theaet. Where, indeed?

Str. I scarcely think that he can look anywhere; for that which is not in motion must be at rest, and again, that which is not at rest must be in motion; but being is placed outside of both these classes. Is this possible?

Theaet. Utterly impossible.

Str. Here, then, is another thing which we ought to bear in mind.

Theaet. What?

Str. When we were asked to what we were to assign the appellation of not-being, we were in the greatest difficulty:—do you remember?

Theaet. To be sure.

Str. And are we not now in as great a difficulty about being?

Theaet. I should say, Stranger, that we are in one which is, if possible, even greater.

Str. Then let us acknowledge the difficulty; and as being and not-being are involved in the same perplexity, there is hope that when the one appears more or less distinctly, [251] the other will equally appear; and if we are able to see neither, there may still be a chance of steering our way in between them, without any great discredit.

Theaet. Very good.

Str. Let us enquire, then, how we come to predicate many names of the same thing.

Theaet. Give an example.

Str. I mean that we speak of man, for example, under many names—that we attribute to him colours and forms and magnitudes and virtues and vices, in all of which instances and in ten thousand others we not only speak of him as a man, but also as good, and having numberless other attributes, and in the same way any of them that they are Perhaps they may be in a difficulty, and if this is the case there is a possibility that they may accept a notion of ours respecting the nature of being having nothing of their own to offer

Theaet What is the notion? Tell me, and we shall soon see

Str My notion would be that anything which possesses any sort of power to affect another or to be affected by another if only for a single moment however trifling the cause and however slight the effect has real existence and I hold that the definition of being is simply power

Theaet They accept your suggestion having nothing better of their own to offer

Str Very good perhaps we as well as they may one day change our minds [248] but for the present, this may be regarded as the understanding which is established with them

Theaet Agreed

Str Let us now go to the friends of ideas of their opinions too you shall be the interpreter

Theaet I will

Str To them we say—You would distinguish essence from generation?

Theaet Yes they reply

Str And you would allow that we participate in generation with the body and through perception but we participate with the soul through thought in true essence and essence you would affirm to be always the same and immutable whereas generation or becoming varies?

Theaet Yes that is what we should affirm

Str Well fair sirs we say to them what is this participation which you assert of both? Do you agree with our recent definition?

Theaet What definition?

Str We said that being was an active or passive energy, arising out of a certain power which proceeds from elements meeting with one another Perhaps your ears Theaetetus may fail to catch their answer which I recognize because I have been accustomed to hear it

Theaet And what is their answer?

Str They deny the truth of what we were just now saying to the aborigines about existence

Theaet What was that?

Str Any power of doing or suffering in a degree however slight was held by us to be a sufficient definition of being?

Theaet True

Str They deny this and say that the power of doing or suffering is confined to becoming and that neither power is applicable to being

Theaet And is there not some truth in what they say?

Str Yes but our reply will be that we want to ascertain from them more distinctly whether they further admit that the soul knows and that being or essence is known

Theaet There can be no doubt that they say so

Str And is knowing and being known doing or suffering or both or is the one doing and the other suffering or has neither any share in either?

Theaet Clearly neither has any share in either for if they say anything else, they will contradict themselves

Str I understand but they will allow that if to know is active, then, of course, to be known is passive And on this view being in so far as it is known, is acted upon by knowledge and is therefore in motion for that which is in a state of rest cannot be acted upon, as we affirm

[249] Str And O heavens can we ever be made to believe that motion and life and soul and mind are not present with perfect being? Can we imagine that being is devoid of life and mind and exists in awful unmeaningness an everlasting fixture?

Theaet That would be a dreadful thing to admit Stranger

Str But shall we say that being has mind and not life?

Theaet How is that possible?

Str Or shall we say that both inhere in perfect being but that it has no soul which contains them?

Theaet And in what other way can it contain them?

Str Or that being has mind and life and soul but although endowed with soul remains absolutely unmoved?

Theaet All three suppositions appear to me to be irrational

Str Under being then, we must include motion and that which is moved

Theaet Certainly

Str Then Theaetetus our inference is, that if there is no motion neither is there any mind anywhere or about anything or belonging to any one

Theaet Quite true.

Str And yet this equally follows if we grant that all things are in motion—upon this view too mind has no existence

Theaet How so?

Str Do you think that sameness of condition

and mode and subject could ever exist without a principle of rest?

Theaet. Certainly not.

Str. Can you see how without them mind could exist, or come into existence anywhere?

Theaet. No.

Str. And surely contend we must in every possible way against him who would annihilate knowledge and reason and mind, and yet ventures to speak confidently about anything.

Theaet. Yes, with all our might.

Str My notion would be that anything which possesses any sort of power to affect another or to be affected by another if only for a single moment however trifling the cause and however slight the effect has real existence and I hold that the definition of being is simply power

Theaet They accept your suggestion having nothing better of their own to offer

Str Very good perhaps we as well as they may one day change our minds [248] but for the present, this may be regarded as the understanding which is established with them

Theaet Agreed

Str Let us now go to the friends of ideas of their opinions too you shall be the interpreter

Theaet I will

Str To them we say—You would distinguish essence from generation?

Theaet Yes they reply

Str And you would allow that we participate in generation with the body and through perception but we participate with the soul through thought in true essence and essence you would affirm to be always the same and immutable, whereas generation or becoming varies?

Theaet Yes that is what we should affirm

Str Well fair sirs we say to them what is this participation which you assert of both? Do you agree with our recent definition?

Theaet What definition?

Str We said that being was an active or passive energy arising out of a certain power which proceeds from elements meeting with one another Perhaps your ears Theaetetus may fail to catch their answer which I recognize because I have been accustomed to hear it

Theaet And what is their answer?

Str They deny the truth of what we were just now saying to the aborigines about existence

Theaet What was that?

Str Any power of doing or suffering in a degree however slight was held by us to be a sufficient definition of being?

Theaet True

Str They deny this and say that the power of doing or suffering is confined to becoming and that neither power is applicable to being

Theaet And is there not some truth in what they say?

Str Yes but our reply will be that we want to ascertain from them more distinctly whether they further admit that the soul knows and that being or essence is known

Theaet There can be no doubt that they say so

Str And is knowing and being known doing or suffering or both or is the one doing and the other suffering or has neither any share in either?

Theaet Clearly neither has any share in either for if they say anything else they will contradict themselves

Str I understand but they will allow that if to know is active then of course, to be known is passive And on this view being in so far as it is known is acted upon by knowledge, and is therefore in motion for that which is in a state of rest cannot be acted upon as we affirm

[249] Str And O heavens can we ever be made to believe that motion and life and soul and mind are not present with perfect being? Can we imagine that being is devoid of life and mind and exists in awful unmeaningness an everlasting fixture?

Theaet That would be a dreadful thing to admit Stranger

Str But shall we say that being has mind and not life?

Theaet How is that possible?

Str Or shall we say that both inhere in perfect being but that it has no soul which contains them?

Theaet And in what other way can it contain them?

Str Or that being has mind and life and soul but although endowed with soul remains absolutely unmoved?

Theaet All three suppositions appear to me to be irrational

Str Under being then we must include motion and that which is moved

Theaet Certainly

Str Then Theaetetus our inference is, that if there is no motion neither is there any mind anywhere or about anything or belonging to any one

Theaet Quite true

Str And yet this equally follows if we grant that all things are in motion—upon this view too mind has no existence

Theaet How so?

Str Do you think that sameness of condition

Theaet. True.

Str. But does every one know what letters will mix with what? Or is art required in order to do so?

Theaet. Art is required.

Str. What art?

Theaet. The art of grammar.

Str. And is not this also true of sounds high and low?—Is not he who has the art to know what sounds mingle, a musician, and he who is ignorant, not a musician?

Theaet. Yes.

Str. And we shall find this to be generally true of art or the absence of art.

Theaet. Of course.

Str. And as classes are admitted by us in like manner to be some of them capable and others incapable of intermixture, must not he who would rightly show what kinds will unite and what will not, proceed by the help of science in the path of argument? And will he not ask if the connecting links are universal, and so capable of intermixture with all things; and again, in divisions, whether there are not other universal classes, which make them possible?

Theaet. To be sure he will require science, and, if I am not mistaken, the very greatest of all sciences.

Str. How are we to call it? By Zeus, have we not lighted unwittingly upon our free and noble science, and in looking for the Sophist have we not entertained the philosopher unawares?

Theaet. What do you mean?

Str. Should we not say that the division according to classes, which neither makes the same other, nor makes other the same, is the business of the dialectical science?

Theaet. That is what we should say.

Str. Then, surely, he who can divide rightly is able to see clearly one form pervading a scattered multitude, and many different forms contained under one higher form; and again, one form knit together into a single whole and pervading many such wholes, and many forms, existing only in separation and isolation. This is the knowledge of classes which determines where they can have communion with one another and where not.

Theaet. Quite true.

Str. And the art of dialectic would be attributed by you only to the philosopher pure and true?

Theaet. Who but he can be worthy?

Str. In this region we shall always discover the philosopher, if we look for him; like the Sophist [254] he is not easily discovered, but for a different reason.

Theaet. For what reason?

Str. Because the Sophist runs away into the darkness of not-being, in which he has learned by habit to feel about, and cannot be discovered because of the darkness of the place. Is not that true?

Theaet. It seems to be so.

Str. And the philosopher, always holding converse through reason with the idea of being, is also dark from excess of light; for the souls of the many have no eye which can endure the vision of the divine.

Theaet. Yes; that seems to be quite as true as the other.

Str. Well, the philosopher may hereafter be more fully considered by us, if we are disposed; but the Sophist must clearly not be allowed to escape until we have had a good look at him.

Theaet. Very good.

Str. Since, then, we are agreed that some classes have a communion with one another, and others not, and some have communion with a few and others with many, and that there is no reason why some should not have universal communion with all, let us now pursue the enquiry, as the argument suggests, not in relation to all ideas, lest the multitude of them should confuse us, but let us select a few of those which are reckoned to be the principal ones, and consider their several natures and their capacity of communion with one another, in order that if we are not able to apprehend with perfect clearness the notions of being and not-being, we may at least not fall short in the consideration of them, so far as they come within the scope of the present enquiry, if peradventure we may be allowed to assert the reality of not-being, and yet escape unscathed.

Theaet. We must do so.

Str. The most important of all the genera are those which we were just now mentioning—being and rest and motion.

Theaet. Yes, by far.

Str. And two of these are, as we affirm, incapable of communion with one another.

Theaet. Quite incapable.

Str. Whereas being surely has communion with both of them, for both of them are?

Theaet. Of course.

Str. That makes up three of them.

Theaet. To be sure.

Str. And each of them is other than the remaining two, but the same with itself.

Theaet. True.

thing else which we originally supposed to be one is described by us as many and under many names

Theaet That is true.

Str And thus we provide a rich feast for tyros whether young or old for there is nothing easier than to argue that the one cannot be many or the many one and great is their delight in denying that a man is good, for man they insist is man and good is good I dare say that you have met with persons who take an interest in such matters—they are often elderly men, whose meagre sense is thrown into amazement by these discoveries of theirs which they believe to be the height of wisdom

Theaet Certainly I have

Str Then not to exclude any one who has ever speculated at all upon the nature of being let us put our questions to them as well as to our former friends

Theaet What questions?

Str Shall we refuse to attribute being to motion and rest, or anything to anything and assume that they do not mingle and are incapable of participating in one another? Or shall we gather all into one class of things communicable with one another? Or are some things communicable and others not?—Which of these alternatives, Theaetetus will they prefer?

Theaet I have nothing to answer on their behalf Suppose that you take all these hypotheses in turn and see what are the consequences which follow from each of them

Str Very good and first let us assume them to say that nothing is capable of participating in anything else in any respect [252] in that case rest and motion cannot participate in being at all

Theaet They cannot

Str But would either of them be if not participating in being?

Theaet No

Str Then by this admission everything is instantly overturned as well the doctrine of universal motion as of universal rest, and also the doctrine of those who distribute being into immutable and everlasting kinds for all these add on a notion of being some affirming that things are truly in motion, and others that they are truly at rest

Theaet Just so

Str Again those who would at one time compound and at another resolve all things, whether making them into one and out of one creating infinity or dividing them into finite elements and forming compounds out of these whether they suppose the processes of creation to be successive or continuous would be talking nonsense in all this if there were no admixture.

Theaet True

Str Most ridiculous of all will the men themselves be who want to carry out the argument and yet forbid us to call anything because participating in some affection from another by the name of that other

Theaet Why so?

Str Why because they are compelled to use the words to be apart from others in itself and ten thousand more which they cannot give up but must make the connecting links of discourse and therefore they do not require to be refuted by others but their enemy as the saying is inhabits the same house with them they are always carrying about with them an adversary, like the wonderful ventriloquist Eurycles who out of their own bellies audibly contradicts them

Theaet Precisely so a very true and exact illustration

Str And now if we suppose that all things have the power of communion with one another—what will follow?

Theaet Even I can solve that riddle

Str How?

Theaet Why because motion itself would be at rest and rest again in motion if they could be attributed to one another

Str But this is utterly impossible

Theaet Of course

Str Then only the third hypothesis remains.

Theaet True

Str For surely either all things have communion with all or nothing with any other thing or some things communicate with some things and others not

Theaet Certainly

Str And two out of these three suppositions have been found to be impossible

Theaet Yes

Str Every one then who desires to answer truly will adopt the third and remaining hypothesis of the communion of some with some.

Theaet Quite true

[253] Str This communion of some with some may be illustrated by the case of letters for some letters do not fit each other while others do

Theaet Of course.

Str And the vowels especially are a sort of bond which pervades all the other letters so that without a vowel one consonant cannot be joined to another

Str Then, according to this view, motion is other and also not other?

Theaet. True.

Str What is the next step? Shall we say that motion is other than the three and not other than the fourth—for we agreed that there are five classes about and in the sphere of which we proposed to make enquiry?

Theaet Surely we cannot admit that the number is less than it appeared to be just now.

Str Then we may without fear contend that motion is other than being?

Theaet. Without the least fear.

Str The plain result is that motion, since it partakes of being, really is and also is not?

Theaet Nothing can be plainer.

Str Then not-being necessarily exists in the case of motion and of every class; for the nature of the other entering into them all, makes each of them other than being, and so non-existent; and therefore of all of them, in like manner, we may truly say that they are not; and again, inasmuch as they partake of being, that they are and are existent.

Theaet So we may assume.

Str Every class, then, has plurality of being and infinity of not-being.

[257] Theaet So we must infer.

Str And being itself may be said to be other than the other kinds.

Theaet Certainly.

Str Then we may infer that being is not, in respect of as many other things as there are; for not-being these, it is itself one, and is not the other things, which are infinite in number.

Theaet That is not far from the truth.

Str And we must not quarrel with this result, since it is of the nature of classes to have communion with one another; and if any one denies our present statement [viz., that being is not, etc.], let him first argue with our former conclusion [i.e., respecting the communion of ideas], and then he may proceed to argue with what follows.

Theaet Nothing can be fairer.

Str Let me ask you to consider a further question.

Theaet What question?

Str When we speak of not-being, we speak, I suppose, not of something opposed to being, but only different.

Theaet What do you mean?

Str When we speak of something as not great, does the expression seem to you to imply what is little any more than what is equal?

Theaet Certainly not.

Str The negative particles, οὐ and μή, when prefixed to words, do not imply opposition, but only difference from the words, or more correctly from the things represented by the words, which follow them.

Theaet Quite true.

Str There is another point to be considered, if you do not object.

Theaet What is it?

Str The nature of the other appears to me to be divided into fractions like knowledge.

Theaet How so?

Str Knowledge, like the other, is one; and yet the various parts of knowledge have each of them their own particular name, and hence there are many arts and kinds of knowledge.

Theaet Quite true.

Str And is not the case the same with the parts of the other, which is also one?

Theaet Very likely; but will you tell me how?

Str There is some part of the other which is opposed to the beautiful?

Theaet There is.

Str Shall we say that this has or has not a name?

Theaet It has; for whatever we call not-beautiful is other than the beautiful, not than something else.

Str And now tell me another thing.

Theaet What?

Str Is the not-beautiful anything but this—an existence parted off from a certain kind of existence, and again from another point of view opposed to an existing something?

Theaet True.

Str Then the not-beautiful turns out to be the opposition of being to being?

Theaet Very true.

Str But upon this view, is the beautiful a more real and the not-beautiful a less real existence?

Theaet Not at all.

[258] Str And the not-great may be said to exist, equally with the great?

Theaet Yes.

Str And, in the same way, the just must be placed in the same category with the not-just—the one cannot be said to have any more existence than the other.

Theaet True.

Str The same may be said of other things; seeing that the nature of the other has a real existence, the parts of this nature must equally be supposed to exist.

Theaet Of course.

Str Then, as would appear, the opposition of Str But then what is the meaning of these two words, same and other? Are they two new kinds other than the three and yet always of necessity intermingling with them and are we to have five kinds instead of three or when we speak of the same and other [255] are we unconsciously speaking of one of the three first kinds?

Theaet Very likely we are

Str But, surely motion and rest are neither the other nor the same

Theaet How is that?

Str Whatever we attribute to motion and rest in common cannot be either of them

Theaet Why not?

Str Because motion would be at rest and rest in motion for either of them being predicated of both will compel the other to change into the opposite of its own nature because partaking of its opposite

Theaet Quite true

Str Yet they surely both partake of the same and of the other?

Theaet Yes

Str Then we must not assert that motion any more than rest is either the same or the other

Theaet No we must not

Str But are we to conceive that being and the same are identical?

Theaet Possibly

Str But if they are identical then again in saying that motion and rest have being we should also be saying that they are the same

Theaet Which surely cannot be

Str Then being and the same cannot be one

Theaet Scarcely

Str Then we may suppose the same to be a fourth class which is now to be added to the three others

Theaet Quite true

Str And shall we call the other a fifth class? Or should we consider being and other to be two names of the same class?

Theaet Very likely

Str But you would agree if I am not mistaken that existences are relative as well as absolute?

Theaet Certainly

Str And the other is always relative to other?

Theaet True

Str But this would not be the case unless being and the other entirely differed for if the other like being were absolute as well as relative then there would have been a kind of other which was not other than other And now we find that what is other must of necessity be what it is in relation to some other

Theaet That is the true state of the case

Str Then we must admit the other as the fifth of our selected classes

Theaet Yes

Str And the fifth class pervades all classes, for they all differ from one another not by reason of their own nature but because they partake of the idea of the other

Theaet Quite true.

Str Then let us now put the case with reference to each of the five

Theaet How?

Str First there is motion which we affirm to be absolutely other than rest what else can we say?

Theaet It is so

Str And therefore is not rest

Theaet Certainly not

Str And yet is because partaking of being

[256] Theaet True

Str Again motion is other than the same?

Theaet Just so

Str And is therefore not the same.

Theaet It is not

Str Yet surely motion is the same, because all things partake of the same

Theaet Very true

Str Then we must admit and not object to say, that motion is the same and is not the same, for we do not apply the terms same and not the same in the same sense but we call it the same in relation to itself because partaking of the same and not the same because having communion with the other it is thereby severed from the same and has become not that but other and is therefore rightly spoken of as not the same

Theaet To be sure

Str And if absolute motion in any point of view partook of rest there would be no absurdity in calling motion stationary

Theaet Quite right —that is on the supposition that some classes mingle with one another and others not

Str That such a communion of kinds is according to nature we had already proved before we arrived at this part of our discussion

Theaet Certainly

Str Let us proceed then May we not say that motion is other than the other having been also proved by us to be other than the same and other than rest?

Theaet That is certain

Cf. supra 252

Theaet Why so?

Str Why that we might be able to assert discourse to be a kind of being, for if we could not the worst of all consequences would follow we should have no philosophy Moreover the necessity for determining the nature of discourse presses upon us at this moment if utterly deprived of it, we could no more hold discourse and deprived of it we should be if we admitted that there was no admixture of natures at all

Theaet Very true But I do not understand why at this moment we must determine the nature of discourse.

Str Perhaps you will see more clearly by the help of the following explanation

Theaet What explanation?

Str Not being has been acknowledged by us to be one among many classes diffused over all bein

Theaet True

Str And thence arises the question whether not-being mingles with opinion and language.

Theaet How so?

Str If not-being has no part in the proposition, then all things must be true but if not being has a part, then false opinion and false speech are possible for to think or to say what is not—is falsehood which thus arises in the region of thought and in speech

Theaet That is quite true

Str And where there is falsehood surely there must be deceit

Theaet Yes.

Str And if there is deceit, then all things must be full of idols and images and fancies

Theaet To be sure

Str Into that region the Sophist, as we said, made his escape and when he had got there denied the very possibility of falsehood no one, he argued either conceived or uttered falsehood inasmuch as not being did not in any way partake of being

Str And now not being has been shown to partake of being and therefore he will not continue fighting in this direction but he will probably say that some ideas partake of not being and some not, and that language and opinion are of the non partaking class and he will still fight to the death against the existence of the image making and phantastic art, in which we have placed him, because, as he will say opinion and language do not partake of not-being and unless this participation exists, there can be no such thing as falsehood And, with the view of meeting this evasion we must begin by enquiring into the nature of language opinion and imagination in order that when we find them we may find also that they have communion with not being [261] and having made out the connection of them, may thus prove that falsehood exists and therein we will imprison the Sophist if he deserves it, or if not, we will let him go again and look for him in another class

Theaet Certainly Stranger there appears to be truth in what was said about the Sophist at first that he was of a class not easily caught for he seems to have abundance of defences, which he throws up, and which must every one of them be stormed before we can reach the man himself And even now we have with difficulty got through his first defence, which is the not being of not being and lo! here is another for we have still to show that falsehood exists in the sphere of language and opinion and there will be another and another line of defence without end

Str Any one Theaetetus, who is able to advance even a little ought to be of good cheer for what would he who is dispirited at a little progress do if he were making none at all or even undergoing a repulse? Such a faint heart as the proverb says, will never take a city but now that we have succeeded thus far the citadel is ours, and what remains is easier

Theaet Very true.

Str Then as I was saying let us first of all obtain a conception of language and opinion in order that we may have clearer grounds for determining whether not-being has any concern with them, or whether they are both always true, and neither of them ever false.

Theaet True.

Str Then now let us speak of names, as before we were speaking of ideas and letters for that is the direction in which the answer may be expected

Theaet And what is the question at issue about names?

Str The question at issue is whether all names may be connected with one another or none, or only some of them

Theaet Clearly the last is true.

Str I understand you to say that words which have a meaning when in sequence may be connected but that words which have no meaning when in sequence cannot be connected?

Theaet What are you saying?

Str What I thought that you intended when you gave your assent for there are two sorts of a part of the other and of a part of being to one another is if I may venture to say so as truly essence as being itself and implies not the opposite of being but only what is other than being

Theaet Beyond question

Str What then shall we call it?

Theae Clearly not being and this is the very nature for which the Sophist compelled us to search

Str And has not this as you were saying as real an existence as any other class? May I not say with confidence that not being has an assured existence and a nature of its own? Just as the great was found to be great and the beautiful beautiful and the not great not great and the not beautiful not beautiful in the same manner not being has been found to be and is not being and is to be reckoned one among the many classes of being Do you Theaetetus still feel any doubt of this?

Theaet None whatever

Str Do you observe that our scepticism has carried us beyond the range of Parmenides prohibition?

Theaet In what?

Str We have advanced to a further point and shown him more than he forbad us to investigate

Theaet How is that?

Str Why because he says—

Not being never is and do thou keep thy thoughts from this way of enquiry

Theaet Yes he says so

Str Whereas we have not only proved that things which are not are but we have shown what form of being not being is for we have shown that the nature of the other is and is distributed over all things in their relations to one another and whatever part of the other is contrasted with being this is precisely what we have ventured to call not being

Theaet And surely Stranger we were quite right

Str Let not any one say then that while affirming the opposition of not being to being we still assert the being of not being for as to whether there is an opposite of being to that enquiry we have long said good bye—it may or may not be [259] and may or may not be capable of definition But as touching our present account of not being let a man either convince us of error, or so long as he cannot, he too must say, as we are saying that there is a communion of classes and that being and difference or other traverse all things and mutually interpenetrate so that the other partakes of being and by reason of this participation is and yet is not that of which it partakes, but other and being other than being it is clearly a necessity that not being should be And again being through partaking of the other becomes a class other than the remaining classes and being other than all of them is not each one of them and is not all the rest, so that undoubtedly there are thousands upon thousands of cases in which being is not and all other things whether regarded individually or collectively in many respects are and in many respects are not

Theaet True

Str And he who is sceptical of this contradiction must think how he can find something better to say or if he sees a puzzle and his pleasure is to drag words this way and that, the argument will prove to him that he is not making a worthy use of his faculties for there is no charm in such puzzles and there is no difficulty in detecting them but we can tell him of something else the pursuit of which is noble and also difficult

Theaet What is it?

Str A thing of which I have already spoken —letting alone these puzzles as involving no difficulty he should be able to follow and criticize in detail every argument and when a man says that the same is in a manner other or that other is the same to understand and refute him from his own point of view and in the same respect in which he asserts either of these affections But to show that somehow and in some sense the same is other or the other same or the great small or the like unlike and to delight in always bringing forward such contradictions is no real refutation but is clearly the new born babe of some one who is only beginning to approach the problem of being

Theaet To be sure

Str For certainly my friend the attempt to separate all existences from one another is a barbarism and utterly unworthy of an educated or philosophical mind

Theaet Why so?

Str The attempt at universal separation is the final annihilation of all reasoning [260] for only by the union of conceptions with on another do we attain to discourse of reason

Theaet True

Str And observe that we were only just in time in making a resistance to such separatists, and compelling them to admit that one thing mingles with another

Theaet Unquestionably

Str And it would be no sentence at all if there were no subject for as we proved, a sentence which has no subject is impossible

Theaet Quite true.

Str When other then, is asserted of you as the same, and not-being as being such a combination of nouns and verbs is really and truly false discourse.

Theaet Most true.

Str And therefore thought, opinion, and imagination are now proved to exist in our minds both as true and false.

Theaet How so?

Str You will know better if you first gain a knowledge of what they are, and in what they severally differ from one another

Theaet Give me the knowledge which you would wish me to gain

Str Are not thought and speech the same, with this exception, that what is called thought is the unuttered conversation of the soul with herself?

Theaet Quite true

Str But the stream of thought which flows through the lips and is audible is called speech?

Theaet True.

Str And we know that there exists n speech

Theaet What exists?

Str Affirmation.

[264] Theaet Yes, we know it.

Str When the affirmation or denial takes place in silence and in the mind only ha e you any other name by which to call it but opinion?

Th aet There can be no other name.

Str And when opinion is presented, not simply but in som e form of sense, would you not call it imaginati n?

Theaet Certainly

Str And see , that langua e is true and false, and that th ught s the conversation of the soul with herself, and opinion is the end of thinkin , and imagination or phantasy is the union of sense and op nion the inference is that some of them, since they are akin to language, should ha e an element of falsehood as well as of truth

Th aet Certainly

St Do you perce then, that false op nion and speech ha e been discovered sooner than we pected —For just now e seemed to be undertakin task whi h would ne er be ac omplished

Theaet I perce e

Str Then let u not be discouraged about the future but no having made this discovery let us go back to our previous classification

Theaet What classification?

Str We divided image making into two sorts the one likeness-making, the other imaginative or phantastic.

Theaet True

Str And we said that we were uncertain in which we should place the Sophist

Theaet We did say so

Str And our heads began to go round more and more when it was asserted that there is no such thin as an image or idol or appearance because in no manner or time or place can there ever be su h a th n as falsehood

Theaet True.

Str And now since there has been sho n to be false speech and false opin on, there may be imitations of real existences, and out of this condition of the m nd an art of deception may arise.

Theaet Quite possible

Str And we have already admitted in hat preceded that the Sophist was lurkin in one of the divisions of the likeness-makin art?

The et Yes

Str Let us, then, renew the attempt, and in dividing any class, always take the part to the right, holding fast to that which holds the Sophist, until we have stripped him of all his common properties. [265] and reached his difference or peculiar Then e may exhibit him in his true nature, first to ourselves and then to kindred dialectical spirits.

Theaet Very good

Str You may remember that all art was originally di ided by us into creati e and acquisi i e.

Th aet Yes.

St And the Sophist was flittin before us in the acquisiti e class, in the subdivisions of hunting contests, merchandise and th like

Theaet Very true

Str But now that th imitative art has enclosed him, it is clear that we must begin by di idin the art of creation for imitation is a kind of creation—of images however as we affirm, and not of real things

Theaet Quite true

Str In the first place, there are two kinds of creation

Theaet What are they?

Str One of them is human and the other di ine.

The et I do not follow

Str Every power as you may remember our intimation of being which are given by the voice

Theaet What are they?

Str One of them is called nouns and the other verbs

Theaet Describe them

[262] Str That which denotes action we call a verb

Theaet True

Str And the other which is an articulate mark set on those who do the actions we call a noun

Theaet Quite true

Str A succession of nouns only is not a sentence any more than of verbs without nouns

Theaet I do not understand you

Str I see that when you gave your assent you had something else in your mind But what I intended to say was that a mere succession of nouns or of verbs is not discourse

Theaet What do you mean?

Str I mean that words like walks runs sleeps or any other words which denote action however many of them you string together do not make discourse

Theaet How can they?

Str Or again when you say lion, stag horse" or any other words which denote agents —neither in this way of stringing words together do you attain to discourse for there is no expression of action or inaction or of the existence of existence or non-existence indicated by the sounds until verbs are mingled with nouns then the words fit and the smallest combination of them forms language and is the simplest and least form of discourse

Theaet Again I ask What do you mean?

Str When any one says A man learns should you not call this the simplest and least of sentences?

Theaet Yes

Str Yes for he now arrives at the point of giving an intimation about something which is or is becoming or has become or will be And he not only names but he does something by connecting verbs with nouns and therefore we say that he discourses and to this connection of words we give the name of discourse

Theaet True

Str And as there are some things which fit one another and other things which do not fit so there are some vocal signs which do and others which do not combine and form discourse

Theaet Quite true

Str There is another small matter

Theaet What is it?

Str A sentence must and cannot help having a subject

Theaet True

Str And must be of a certain quality

Theaet Certainly

Str And now let us mind what we are about.

Theaet We must do so

Str I will repeat a sentence to you in which a thing and an action are combined by the help of a noun and a verb and you shall tell me of whom the sentence speaks

Theaet I will to the best of my power

[263] Str Theaetetus sits —not a very long sentence

Theaet Not very

Str Of whom does the sentence speak and who is the subject? that is what you have to tell

Theaet Of me I am the subject

Str Or this sentence again—

Theaet What sentence?

Str Theaetetus with whom I am now speaking is flying

Theaet That also is a sentence which will be admitted by every one to speak of me and to apply to me

Str We agreed that every sentence must necessarily have a certain quality

Theaet Yes

Str And what is the quality of each of these two sentences?

Theaet The one as I imagine is false and the other true

Str The true says what is true about you?

Theaet Yes

Str And the false says what is other than true?

Theaet Yes

Str And therefore speaks of things which are not as if they were?

Theaet True

Str And says that things are real of you which are not for as we were saying in regard to each thing or person there is much that is and much that is not

Theaet Quite true

Str The second of the two sentences which related to you was first of all an example of the shortest form consistent with our definition

Theaet Yes this was implied in our recent admission

Str And in the second place, it related to a subject?

Theaet Yes

Str Who must be you and can be nobody else?

Theaet. Yes.

Str. Let this, then, be named the art of mimicry, and this the province assigned to it; as for the other division, we are weary and will give that up, leaving to some one else the duty of making the class and giving it a suitable name.

Theaet. Let us do as you say—assign a sphere to the one and leave the other.

Str. There is a further distinction, Theaetetus, which is worthy of our consideration, and for a reason which I will tell you.

Theaet. Let me hear.

Str. There are some who imitate, knowing what they imitate, and some who do not know. And what line of distinction can there possibly be greater than that which divides ignorance from knowledge?

Theaet. There can be no greater.

Str. Was not the sort of imitation of which we spoke just now the imitation of those who know? For he who would imitate you would surely know you and your figure?

Theaet. Naturally.

Str. And what would you say of the figure or form of justice or of virtue in general? Are we not well aware that many, having no knowledge of either, but only a sort of opinion, do their best to show that this opinion is really entertained by them, by expressing it, as far as they can, in word and deed?

Theaet. Yes, that is very common.

Str. And do they always fail in their attempt to be thought just, when they are not? Or is not the very opposite true?

Theaet. The very opposite.

Str. Such a one, then, should be described as an imitator—to be distinguished from the other, as he who is ignorant is distinguished from him who knows.

Theaet. True.

Str. Can we find a suitable name for each of them? This is clearly not an easy task; for among the ancients there was some confusion of ideas, which prevented them from attempting to divide genera into species; wherefore there is no great abundance of names. Yet, for the sake of distinctness, I will make bold to call the imitation which coexists with opinion, the imitation of appearance—that which coexists with science, scientific or learned imitation.

Theaet. Granted.

Str. The former is our present concern, for the Sophist was classed with imitators indeed, but not among those who have knowledge.

Theaet. Very true.

Str. Let us, then, examine our imitator of appearance, and see whether he is sound, like a piece of iron, or whether there is still some crack in him.

Theaet. Let us examine him.

Str. Indeed there is a very considerable crack; for if you look, you find that one of the two classes of imitators is a simple creature, [268] who thinks that he knows that which he only fancies; the other sort has knocked about among arguments, until he suspects and fears that he is ignorant of that which to the many he pretends to know.

Theaet. There are certainly the two kinds which you describe.

Str. Shall we regard one as the simple imitator—the other as the dissembling or ironical imitator?

Theaet. Very good.

Str. And shall we further speak of this latter class as having one or two divisions?

Theaet. Answer yourself.

Str. Upon consideration, then, there appear to me to be two; there is the dissembler, who harangues a multitude in public in a long speech, and the dissembler, who in private and in short speeches compels the person who is conversing with him to contradict himself.

Theaet. What you say is most true.

Str. And who is the maker of the longer speeches? Is he the statesman or the popular orator?

Theaet. The latter.

Str. And what shall we call the other? Is he the philosopher or the Sophist?

Theaet. The philosopher he cannot be, for upon our view he is ignorant; but since he is an imitator of the wise he will have a name which is formed by an adaptation of the word σοφός. What shall we name him? I am pretty sure that I cannot be mistaken in terming him the true and very Sophist.

Str. Shall we bind up his name as we did before, making a chain from one end of his genealogy to the other?

Theaet. By all means.

Str. He, then, who traces the pedigree of his art as follows—who, belonging to the conscious or dissembling section of the art of causing self-contradiction, is an imitator of appearance, and is separated from the class of phantastic which is a branch of image-making into that further division of creation, the juggling of words, a creation human, and not divine—any one who affirms the real Sophist to be of this blood and lineage will say the very truth.

Theaet. Undoubtedly.

saying originally, which causes things to exist not previously existing was defined by us as creative

Theaet I remember

Str Looking now, at the world and all the animals and plants at things which grow upon the earth from seeds and roots as well as at inanimate substances which are formed within the earth fusile or non fusile shall we say that they come into existence—not having existed previously—by the creation of God or shall we agree with vulgar opinion about them?

Theaet What is it?

Str The opinion that nature brings them into being from some spontaneous and unintelligent cause Or shall we say that they are created by a divine reason and a knowledge which comes from God?

Theaet I dare say that owing to my youth I may often waver in my view but now when I look at you and see that you incline to refer them to God I defer to your authority

Str Nobly said Theaetetus and if I thought that you were one of those who would hereafter change your mind I would have gently argued with you and forced you to assent but as I perceive that you will come of yourself and without any argument of mine, to that belief which as you say attracts you I will not forestall the work of time Let me suppose then that things which are said to be made by nature are the work of divine art and that things which are made by man out of these are work of human art And so there are two kinds of making and production the one human and the other divine

Str Then now subdivide each of the two sections which we have already

Theaet How do you mean?

[266] Str I mean to say that you should make a vertical division of production or invention as you have already made a lateral one

Theaet I have done so

Str Then now there are in all four parts or segments—two of them have reference to us and are human and two of them have reference to the gods and are divine

Theaet True

Str And again in the division which was supposed to be made in the other way one part in each subdivision is the making of the things themselves but the two remaining parts may be called the making of likenesses and so the productive art is again divided into two parts

Theaet Tell me the divisions once more.

Str I suppose that we and the other animals, and the elements out of which things are made —fire water and the like—are known by us to be each and all the creation and work of God

Theaet True

Str And there are images of them, which are not them but which correspond to them and these are also the creation of a wonderful skill

Theaet What are they?

Str The appearances which spring up of themselves in sleep or by day such as a shadow when darkness arises in a fire or the reflection which is produced when the light in bright and smooth objects meets on their surface with an external light and creates a perception the opposite of our ordinary sight

Theaet Yes and the images as well as the creation are equally the work of a divine hand

Str And what shall we say of human art? Do we not make one house by the art of building and another by the art of drawing which is a sort of dream created by man for those who are awake?

Theaet Quite true

Str And other products of human creation are also twofold and go in pairs there is the thing with which the art of making the thing is concerned and the image with which imitation is concerned

Theaet Now I begin to understand and am ready to acknowledge that there are two kinds of production and each of them twofold in the lateral division there is both a divine and a human production in the vertical there are realities and a creation of a kind of similitudes

Str And let us not forget that of the imitative class the one part was to have been likeness-making and the other phantastic if it could be shown that falsehood is a reality and belongs to the class of real being

Theaet Yes

Str And this appeared to be the case and therefore now without hesitation we shall number the different kinds as two

Theaet True

[267] Str Then now let us again divide the phantastic art.

Theaet Where shall we make the division?

Str There is one kind which is produced by an instrument, and another in which the creator of the appearance is himself the instrument

Theaet What do you mean?

Str When any one makes himself appear like another in his figure or his voice imitation is the name for this part of the phantastic art.

Theaet. Yes.

Str. Let this, then, be named the art of mimicry, and this the province assigned to it; as for the other division, we are weary and will give that up, leaving to some one else the duty of making the class and giving it a suitable name.

Theaet Undoubtedly

STATESMAN

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE Theodorus Socrates The Eleatic Stranger The Younger Socrates

[257] Socrates I owe you many thanks indeed Theodorus for the acquaintance both of Theaetetus and of the Stranger

Theodorus And in a little while Socrates you will owe me three times as many when they have completed for you the delineation of the Statesman and of the Philosopher as well as of the Sophist

Soc Sophist statesman philosopher! O my dear Theodorus do my ears truly witness that this is the estimate formed of them by the great calculator and geometrician?

Theod What do you mean Socrates?

Soc I mean that you rate them all at the same value whereas they are really separated by an interval which no geometrical ratio can express

Theod By Ammon the god of Cyrene Socrates that is a very fair hit and shows that you have not forgotten your geometry I will retaliate on you at some other time but I must now ask the Stranger who will not I hope tire of his goodness to us to proceed either with the Statesman or with the Philosopher whichever he prefers Stranger That is my duty Theodorus having begun I must go on and not leave the work unfinished But what shall be done with Theaetetus?

Theod In what respect?

Str Shall we relieve him and take his companion the Young Socrates instead of him? What do you advise?

Theod Yes give the other a turn, as you propose The young always do better when they have intervals of rest

[258] Soc I think Stranger that both of them may be said to be in some way related to me for the one as you affirm has the cut of my ugly face[1] the other is called by my name And we should always be on the look-out to recognize a kinsman by the style of his conversation I myself was discoursing with Theaetetus yesterday and I have just been listening to his answers my namesake I have not yet examined but I must Another time will do for me to-day let him answer you

Str Very good Young Socrates do you hear what the elder Socrates is proposing?

Young Socrates I do

Str And do you agree to his proposal?

Y Soc Certainly

Str As you do not object still less can I After the Sophist then I think that the Statesman naturally follows next in the order of enquiry And please to say whether he too should be ranked among those who have science

Y Soc Yes

Str Then the sciences must be divided as before?

Y Soc I dare say

Str But yet the division will not be the same?

Y Soc How then?

Str They will be divided at some other point.

Y Soc Yes

Str Where shall we discover the path of the Statesman? We must find and separate off and set our seal upon this and we will set the mark of another class upon all diverging paths Thus the soul will conceive of all kinds of knowledge under two classes.

[1] Cf. Theaetetus 143.

Y Soc To find the path is your business Stranger and not mine.

Str Yes, Socrates, but the discovery when once made, must be yours as well as mine

Y Soc Very good

Str Well, and are not arithmetic and certain other kindred arts, merely abstract knowledge, wholly separated from action?

Y Soc True.

Str But in the art of carpentering and all other handicrafts, the knowledge of the work man is merged in his work he not only knows, but he also makes things which previously did not exist.

Y Soc Certainly

Str Then let us divide sciences in general in to those wh ch are practical and those which are purely intellectual

Y Soc Let us assume these two divisions of science, which is one whole.

Str And are statesman king" master or householder one and the same or is there a science or art answering to each of these names? Or rather allow me to put the matter in another way

[259] Y Soc Let me hear

Str If any one who is in a private station has the skill to advise one of the public physicians, must not he also be called a physician?

Y Soc Yes

Str And if any one who is in a private station is able to ad ise the ruler of a country may not he be said to have the knowledge which the ruler himself ought to have?

Y Soc True

Str But surely the sc ence of a true king is royal sc ence?

Y Soc Yes

St And will not he who possesses this knowledge, whether he happens to be a ruler or a private man when regarded only in reference to his art, be truly called oyal ?

Y Soc He certa nly ought to be

Str And the householder and master are the same?

Y Soc Of course

St Aga n a large household may be compared to a small state —w ll they differ at all as far as government i conce ned?

Y Soc They w ll not

St Then returning to the point wh ch we we e just no v d scussing do we not clearly see that the e is one sc nce of all of them and this science may be called e ther royal or pol t cal or eco om cal we ill not quarrel w th any one abo t the name.

Y Soc Certainly not.

Str This, too is evident that the king cannot do much with his hands or with his whole body towards the maintenan e of his empire compared with what he does by the intelligence and strength of his mind

Y Soc Clearly not

Str Then shall we say that the king has a greater affinity to knowledge than to manual arts and to practical life in general?

Y Soc Certainly he has

Str Then we may put all together as one and the same—statesmanship and the statesman—the kingly science and the king

Y Soc Clearly

Str And now we shall only be proceeding in due order if we go on to divide the sphere of knowledge?

Y Soc Very good

Str Think whether you can find any joint or parting in knowledge

Y Soc Tell me of what sort

Str Such as this You may remember that we made an art of calculation?

Y Soc Yes

Str Which was unmistakeably one of the arts of knowledge?

Y Soc Certainly

Str And to this art of calculation which discerns the differences of numbers shall we assign any other function except to pass judgment on their differences?

Y Soc How could we?

Str You know that the master builder does not work himself but is the ruler of workmen?

Y Soc Yes

Str He contributes knowledge not manual labour?

Y Soc True

[260] Str And may therefore be justly said to share in theoretical science?

Y Soc Quite true.

Str But he ought not, like the calculator to regard his functions as at an end when he has formed a judgment —he must assign to the individual workmen the r appropriate task until they have completed the work

Y Soc True

Str Are not all such sciences no less than arithmetic and the like, subjects of pure knowledge and is not the difference between the two classes that the one sort has the power of judging only and the other of ruling as well?

Y Soc That is evident

Str May we not very properly say that of all knowledge, there are two divisions—one which rules, and the other which judges?

Y Soc I should think so

Str And when men have anything to do in common that they should be of one mind is surely a desirable thing?

Y Soc Very true

Str Then while we are at unity among our selves we need not mind about the fancies of others?

Y Soc Certainly not

Str And now in which of these divisions shall we place the king?—Is he a judge and a kind of spectator? Or shall we assign to him the art of command—for he is a ruler?

Y Soc The latter clearly

Str Then we must see whether there is any mark of division in the art of command too I am inclined to think that there is a distinction similar to that of manufacturer and retail deal er which parts off the king from the herald

Y Soc How is this?

Str Why does not the retailer receive and sell over again the productions of others which have been sold before?

Y Soc Certainly he does

Str And is not the herald under command and does he not receive orders and in his turn give them to others?

Y Soc Very true

Str Then shall we mingle the kingly art in the same class with the art of the herald the interpreter the boatswain the prophet and the numerous kindred arts which exercise com mand or as in the preceding comparison we spoke of manufacturers or sellers for them selves and of retailers —seeing too that the class of supreme rulers or rulers for themselves is almost nameless—shall we make a word fol lowing the same analogy and refer kings to a supreme or ruling for self science leaving the rest to receive a name from some one else? For we are seeking the ruler and our enquiry is not concerned with him who is not a ruler

Y Soc Very good

[261] Str Thus a very fair distinction has been attained between the man who gives his own commands and him who gives another s And now let us see if the supreme power allows of any further division

Y Soc By all means

Str I think that it does and please to assist me in making the division

Y Soc At what point?

Str May not all rulers be supposed to com mand for the sake of producing something?

Y Soc Certainly

Str Nor is there any difficulty in dividing the things produced into two classes

Y Soc How would you divide them?

Str Of the whole class some have life and some are without life

Y Soc True

Str And by the help of this distinction we may make if we please a subdivision of the section of knowledge which commands

Y Soc At what point?

Str One part may be set over the production of lifeless the other of living objects and in this way the whole will be divided

Y Soc Certainly

Str That division then is complete and now we may leave one half and take up the other which may also be divided into two

Y Soc Which of the two halves do you mean?

Str Of course that which exercises command about animals For surely the royal science is not like that of a master workman a science presiding over lifeless objects —the king has a nobler function, which is the management and control of living beings

Y Soc True

Str And the breeding and tending of living beings may be observed to be sometimes a tend ing of the individual in other cases a common care of creatures in flocks?

Y Soc True

Str But the statesman is not a tender of in dividuals—not like the driver or groom of a single ox or horse he is rather to be compared with the keeper of a drove of horses or oxen

Y Soc Yes I see thanks to you

Str Shall we call this art of tending many animals together the art of managing a herd or the art of collective management?

Y Soc No matter —whichever suggests it self to us in the course of conversation

Str Very good Socrates and if you contin ue to be not too particular about names you will be all the richer in wisdom when you are an old man And now as you say leaving the discussion of the name [262]—can you see a way in which a person by showing the art of herding to be of two kinds may cause that which is now sought amongst twice the num ber of things to be then sought amongst half that number?

Y Soc I will try —there appears to me to be one management of men and another of beasts

Str You have certainly divided them in a most straightforward and manly style but you have fallen into an error which hereafter I think that we had better avoid

Y. Soc. What is the error?

Str. I think that we had better not cut off a single small portion which is not a species, from many larger portions; the part should be a species. To separate off at once the subject of investigation, is a most excellent plan, if only the separation be rightly made; and you were under the impression that you were right, because you saw that you would come to man; and this led you to hasten the steps. But you should not chip off too small a piece, my friend; the safer way is to cut through the middle; which is also the more likely way of finding classes. Attention to this principle makes all the difference in a process of enquiry.

Y. Soc. What do you mean, Stranger?

Str. I will endeavour to speak more plainly out of love to your good parts, Socrates; and although I cannot at present entirely explain myself, I will try, as we proceed, to make my meaning a little clearer.

Y. Soc. What was the error of which, as you say, we were guilty in our recent division?

Str. The error was just as if some one who wanted to divide the human race, were to divide them after the fashion which prevails in this part of the world; here they cut off the Hellenes as one species, and all the other species of mankind, which are innumerable, and have no ties or common language, they include under the single name of "barbarians," and because they have one name they are supposed to be of one species also. Or suppose that in dividing numbers you were to cut off ten thousand from all the rest, and make of it one species, comprehending the rest under another separate name, you might say that here too was a single class, because you had given it a single name. Whereas you would make a much better and more equal and logical classification of numbers, if you divided them into odd and even; or of the human species, if you divided them into male and female; and only separated off Lydians or Phrygians, or any other tribe, and arrayed them against the rest of the world, when you could no longer make a division into parts which were also classes. [263]

Y. Soc. Very true; but I wish that this distinction between a part and a class could still be made somewhat plainer.

Str. O Socrates, best of men, you are imposing upon me a very difficult task. We have already digressed further from our original intention than we ought, and you would have us wander still further away. But we must now return to our subject; and hereafter when there is a leisure hour, we will follow up the other track; at the same time, I wish you to guard against imagining that you ever heard me declare—

Y. Soc. What?

Str. That a class and a part are distinct.

Y. Soc. What did I hear then?

Str. That a class is necessarily a part, but there is no similar necessity that a part should be a class; that is the view which I should always wish you to attribute to me, Socrates.

Y. Soc. So be it.

Str. There is another thing which I should like to know.

Y. Soc. What is it?

Str. The point at which we digressed; for, if I am not mistaken, the exact place was at the question, Where you would divide the man agement of herds. To this you appeared rather too ready to answer that there were two species of animals; man being one, and all brutes making up the other.

Y. Soc. True.

Str. I thought that in taking away a part, you imagined that the remainder formed a class, because you were able to call them by the common name of brutes.

Y. Soc. That again is true.

Str. Suppose now, O most courageous of dialecticians, that some wise and understanding creature, such as a crane is reputed to be, were, in imitation of you, to make a similar division, and set up cranes against all other animals to their own special glorification, at the same time jumbling together all the others, including man, under the appellation of brutes,—here would be the sort of error which we must try to avoid.

Y. Soc. How can we be safe?

Str. If we do not divide the whole class of animals, we shall be less likely to fall into that error.

Y. Soc. We had better not take the whole?

Str. Yes, there lay the source of error in our former division.

Y. Soc. How?

Str. You remember how that part of the art of knowledge which was concerned with command, had to do with the rearing of living creatures,—I mean, with animals in herds?

Y. Soc. Yes.

[264] Str. In that case, there was already implied a division of all animals into tame and wild; those whose nature can be tamed are called tame, and those which cannot be tamed are called wild.

Y Soc True

Str And the political science of which we are in search is and ever was concerned with tame animals and is also confined to gregarious animals

Y Soc Yes

Str But then we ought not to divide as we did taking the whole class at once Neither let us be in too great haste to arrive quickly at the political science for this mistake has already brought upon us the misfortune of which the proverb speaks

Y Soc What misfortune?

Str The misfortune of too much haste which is too little speed

Y Soc And all the better Stranger we got what we deserved

Str Very well Let us then begin again and endeavour to divide the collective rearing of animals for probably the completion of the argument will best show what you are so anxious to know Tell me then—

Y Soc What?

Str Have you ever heard as you very likely may—for I do not suppose that you ever actually visited them—of the preserves of fishes in the Nile and in the ponds of the Great King or you may have seen similar preserves in wells at home?

Y Soc Yes to be sure I have seen them and I have often heard the others described

Str And you may have heard also and may have been assured by report although you have not travelled in those regions of nurseries of geese and cranes in the plains of Thessaly?

Y Soc Certainly

Str I asked you because here is a new division of the management of herds into the management of land and of water herds

Y Soc There is

Str And do you agree that we ought to divide the collective rearing of herds into two corresponding parts the one the rearing of water and the other the rearing of land herds?

Y Soc Yes

Str There is surely no need to ask which of these two contains the royal art for it is evident to everybody

Y Soc Certainly

Str Any one can divide the herds which feed on dry land?

Y Soc How would you divide them?

Str I should distinguish between those which fly and those which walk

Y Soc Most true

Str And where shall we look for the political animal? Might not an idiot so to speak, know that he is a pedestrian?

Y Soc Certainly

Str The art of managing the walking animal has to be further divided just as you might halve an even number

Y Soc Clearly

[265] Str Let me note that here appear in view two ways to that part or class which the argument aims at reaching—the one is speedier way which cuts off a small portion and leaves a large the other agrees better with the principle which we were laying down that as far as we can we should divide in the middle but it is longer We can take either of them whichever we please

Y Soc Cannot we have both ways?

Str Together? What a thing to ask! but if you take them in turn you clearly may

Y Soc Then I should like to have them in turn

Str There will be no difficulty as we are near the end if we had been at the beginning or in the middle I should have demurred to your request but now in accordance with your desire let us begin with the longer way while we are fresh we shall get on better And now attend to the division

Y Soc Let me hear

Str The tame walking herding animals are distributed by nature into two classes

Y Soc Upon what principle?

Str The one grows horns and the other is without horns

Y Soc Clearly

Str Suppose that you divide the science which manages pedestrian animals into two corresponding parts and define them for if you try to invent names for them you will find the intricacy too great

Y Soc How must I speak of them then?

Str In this way let the science of managing pedestrian animals be divided into two parts, and one part assigned to the horned herd and the other to the herd that has no horns

Y Soc All that you say has been abundantly proved and may therefore be assumed

Str The king is clearly the shepherd of a polled herd who have no horns

Y Soc That is evident

Str Shall we break up this hornless herd into sections and endeavour to assign to him what is his?

Y Soc By all means

Str Shall we distinguish them by their having or not having cloven feet or by their mix ing or not mixing the breed? You know what I mean

Y Soc What?

Str I mean that horses and asses naturally breed from one another

Y Soc Yes

Str But the remainder of the hornless herd of tame animals will not mix the breed

Y Soc Very true

Str And of which has the Statesman charge,—of the mixed or of the unmixed race?

Y Soc Clearly of the unmixed

Str I suppose that we must divide this again as before

Y Soc We must.

[266] Str Every tame and herding animal has now been split up with the exception of two species for I hardly think that dogs should be reckoned among gregarious animals

Y Soc Certainly not but how shall we divide the two remaining species?

Str There is a measure of difference which may be appropriately employed by you and Theaetetus, who are students of geometry

Y Soc What is that?

Str The diameter and, again the diameter of a diameter

Y Soc What do you mean?

Str How does man walk, but as a diameter whose power is two feet?

Y Soc Just so

Str And the power of the remaining kind being the power of twice two feet may be said to be the diameter of our diameter

Y Soc Certainly and now I think that I pretty nearly understand you

Str In these divisions, Socrates, I descry what would make another famous jest

Y Soc What is it?

Str Human beings have come out in the same class with the freest and airiest of creation and have been running a race with them

Y Soc I remark that very singular coincidence

Str And would you not expect the slowest to arrive last?

Y Soc Indeed I should.

Str And there is a still more ridiculous consequence, that the king is found running about with the herd and in close competition with the bird-catcher who of all mankind is most of an adept at the airy life

Y Soc Certainly

Str Then here, Socrates, is still clearer evidence of the truth of what was said in the enquiry about the Sophist

Y Soc What?

Str That the dialectical method is no respecter of persons, and does not set the great above the small but always arrives in her own way at the truest result

Y Soc Clearly

Str And now I will not wait for you to ask me, but will of my own accord take you by the shorter road to the definition of a king

Y Soc By all means

Str I say that we should have begun at first by dividing land animals into biped and quadruped and since the winged herd and that alone, comes out in the same class with man we should divide bipeds into those which have feathers and those which have not and when they have been divided and the art of the management of mankind is brought to light the time will have come to produce our Statesman and ruler and set him like a charioteer in his place, and hand over to him the reins of state for that too is a vocation which belongs to him

[267] Y Soc Very good you have paid me the debt—I mean that you have completed the argument, and I suppose that you added the digression by way of interest.

Str Then now let us go back to the beginning and join the links which together make the definition of the name of the Statesman's art

Y Soc By all means

Str The science of pure knowledge had as we said originally a part which was the science of rule or command and from this was derived another part, which was called command for self on the analogy of selling for self an important section of this was the management of living animals and this again was further limited to the management of them in herds, and again in herds of pedestrian animals The chief division of the latter was the art of managing pedestrian animals which are without horns this again has a part which can only be comprehended under one term by joining together three names—shepherding pure bred animals The only further subdivision is the art of man herding—this has to do with bipeds, and is what we were seeking after and have now found being at once the royal and political

Y Soc To be sure

Str And do you think Socrates, that we really have done as you say?

Y Soc What?

Cf M 8 ff

Cf. Soph ist 227

Cf. Rep bl c vi 507

Str Do you think I mean that we have really fulfilled our intention?—There has been a sort of discussion and yet the investigation seems to me not to be perfectly worked out this is where the enquiry fails

Y Soc I do not understand

Str I will try to make the thought which is at this moment present in my mind clearer to us both

Y Soc Let me hear

Str There were many arts of shepherding and one of them was the political, which had the charge of one particular herd?

Y Soc Yes

Str And this the argument defined to be the art of rearing not horses or other brutes but the art of rearing man collectively?

Y Soc True

Str Note, however a difference which distinguishes the king from all other shepherds

Y Soc To what do you refer?

Str I want to ask whether any one of the other herdsmen has a rival who professes and claims to share with him in the management of the herd?

Y Soc What do you mean?

Str I mean to say that merchants husband men, providers of food and also training masters and physicians will all contend with the herdsmen of humanity whom we call Statesmen, declaring that they themselves have the care of rearing or managing [268] mankind and that they rear not only the common herd but also the rulers themselves

Y Soc Are they not right in saying so?

Str Very likely they may be and we will consider their claim But we are certain of this —that no one will raise a similar claim as against the herdsman who is allowed on all hands to be the sole and only feeder and physician of his herd he is also their matchmaker and accou cheur no one else knows that department of sci ence And he is their merry maker and musi cian as far as their nature is susceptible of such influences and no one can console and soothe his own herd better than he can either with the natural tones of his voice or with instru ments And the same may be said of tenders of animals in general

Y Soc Very true

Str But if this is as you say can our argu ment about the king be true and unimpeach able? Were we right in selecting him out of ten thousand other claimants to be the shepherd and rearer of the human flock?

Y Soc Surely not

Str Had we not reason just now[1] to apprehend that although we may have described a sort of royal form we have not as yet accurately worked out the true image of the Statesman? and that we cannot reveal him as he truly is in his own nature until we have disengaged and separated him from those who hang about him and claim to share in his prerogatives?

Y Soc Very true

Str And that Socrates is what we must do if we do not mean to bring disgrace upon the argument at its close

Y Soc We must certainly avoid that

Str Then let us make a new beginning and travel by a different road

Y Soc What road?

Str I think that we may have a little amusement there is a famous tale of which a good portion may with advantage be interwoven and then we may resume our series of divisions and proceed in the old path until we arrive at the desired summit Shall we do as I say?

Y Soc By all means

Str Listen, then to a tale which a child would love to hear and you are not too old for childish amusement

Y Soc Let me hear

Str There did really happen and will again happen like many other events of which an cient tradition has preserved the record the portent which is traditionally said to have oc curred in the quarrel of Atreus and Thyestes You have heard no doubt and remember what they say happened at that time?

Y Soc I suppose you to mean the token of the birth of the golden lamb

[269] Str No not that but another part of the story which tells how the sun and the stars once rose in the west and set in the east, and that the god reversed their motion and gave them that which they now have as a testimony to the right of Atreus

Y Soc Yes there is that legend also

Str Again we have been often told of the reign of Cronos

Y Soc Yes very often

Str Did you ever hear that the men of former times were earthborn and not begotten of one another?

Y Soc Yes that is another old tradition

Str All these stories and ten thousand others which are still more wonderful have a com mon origin many of them have been lost in the lapse of ages or are repeated only in a discon nected form but the origin of them is what no one has told, and may as well be told now· for th. tale is suited to throw light on the nature of the king

[1] Cf. 267

Y Soc Very good and I hope that you will give the whole story and leave out nothing

Str Listen, then. There is a time when God himself guides and helps to roll the world in its course and there is a time, on the completion of a certain cycle, when he lets go, and the world being a living creature, and having originally received intelligence from its author and creator turns about and by an inherent necessity revolves in the opposite direction

Y Soc Why is that?

Str Why because only the most divine things of all remain ever unchanged and the same, and body is not included in this class. Heaven and the universe, as we have termed them, although they have been endowed by the Creator with many glories, partake of a bodily nature and therefore cannot be entirely free from perturbation But their motion is, as far as possible, single and in the same place, and of the same kind and is therefore only subject to a reversal, which is the least alteration possible For the lord of all moving things is alone able to move of himself and to think that he moves them at one time in one direction and at an other time in another is blasphemy Hence we must not say that the world is either self moved always, or all made to go round by God in two opposite courses [270] or that two Gods, having opposite purposes, make it move round But as I have already said (and this is the only remaining alternative) the world is guided at one time by an external power which is divine and receives fresh life and immortality from the renewing hand of the Creator and again, when let go, moves spontaneously being set free at such a time as to have, during infinite cycles of years, a reverse movement this is due to its perfect balance, to its vast size, and to the fact that it turns on the smallest pivot

Y Soc Your account of the world seems to be very reasonable indeed

Str Let us now reflect and try to gather from what has been said the nature of the phenomenon which we affirmed to be the cause of all these wonders It is this

Y Soc What?

Str The reversal which takes place from time to time of the motion of the universe.

Y Soc How is that the cause?

Str Of all changes of the heavenly motions, we may consider this to be the greatest and most complete.

Y Soc I should imagine so

Str And it may be supposed to result in the greatest changes to the human beings who are the inhabitants of the world at the time

Y Soc Such changes would naturally occur

Str And animals, as we know survive with difficulty great and serious changes of many different kinds when they come upon them at once

Y Soc Very true.

Str Hence there necessarily occurs a great destruction of them, which extends also to the life of man few survivors of the race are left and those who remain become the subjects of several novel and remarkable phenomena and of one in particular which takes place at the time when the transition is made to the cycle opposite to that in which we are now living

Y Soc What is it?

Str The life of all animals first came to a standstill and the mortal nature ceased to be or look older and was then reversed and grew young and delicate the white locks of the aged darkened again and the cheeks of the bearded man became smooth, and recovered their former bloom the bodies of youths in their prime grew softer and smaller continually by day and night returning and becoming assimilated to the nature of a newly born child in mind as well as body in the succeeding stage they wasted away and wholly disappeared. And the bodies of those who died by violence at that time quickly passed through the like changes and in a few days were no more seen [271] Y Soc Then how Stranger were the animals created in those days and in what way were they begotten of one another?

Str It is evident, Socrates, that there was no such thing in the then order of nature as the procreation of animals from one another the earth-born race, of which we hear in story was the one which existed in those days—they rose again from the ground and of this tradition which is now a-days often unduly discredited our ancestors, who were nearest in point of time to the end of the last period and came into being at the beginning of this, are to us the heralds And mark how consistent the sequel of the tale is after the return of age to youth follows the return of the dead, who are lying in the earth to life simultaneously with the reversal of the world the wheel of their generation has been turned back, and they are put together and rise and live in the opposite order unless God has carried any of them away to some other lot. According to this tradition they of necessity sprang from the earth and have the name of earth born and so the above legend clings to them

Y Soc Certainly that is quite consistent with what has preceded but tell me was the life which you said existed in the reign of Cronos in that cycle of the world or in this? For the change in the course of the stars and the sun must have occurred in both

Str I see that you enter into my meaning — no that blessed and spontaneous life does not belong to the present cycle of the world but to the previous one in which God superintended the whole revolution of the universe and the several parts of the universe were distributed under the rule of certain inferior deities as is the way in some places still There were demi gods who were the shepherds of the various species and herds of animals and each one was in all respects sufficient for those of whom he was the shepherd neither was there any vio lence or devouring of one another or war or quarrel among them and I might tell of ten thousand other blessings which belonged to that dispensation The reason why the life of man was as tradition says spontaneous is as follows In those days God himself was their shepherd, and ruled over them just as man who is by comparison a divine being still rules over the lower animals Under him there were no forms of government or separate possession of women and children [272] for all men rose again from the earth having no memory of the past And although they had nothing of this sort the earth gave them fruits in abundance which grew on trees and shrubs unbidden and were not planted by the hand of man And they dwelt naked and mostly in the open air for the temperature of their seasons was mild and they had no beds but lay on soft couches of grass which grew plentifully out of the earth Such was the life of man in the days of Cronos Socrates the character of our present life which is said to be under Zeus you know from your own experience Can you and will you deter mine which of them you deem the happier?

Y Soc Impossible

Str Then shall I determine for you as well as I can?

Y Soc By all means

Str Suppose that the nurslings of Cronos having this boundless leisure and the power of holding intercourse not only with men but with the brute creation had used all these ad vantages with a view to philosophy conversing with the brutes as well as with one another and learning of every nature which was gifted with any special power and was able to contribute some special experience to the store of wisdom there would be no difficulty in deciding that they would be a thousand times happier than the men of our own day Or again if they had merely eaten and drunk until they were full and told stories to one another and to the ani mals—such stories as are now attributed to them —in this case also as I should imagine the an swer would be easy But until some satisfactory witness can be found of the love of that age for knowledge and discussion, we had better let the matter drop and give the reason why we have unearthed this tale and then we shall be able to get on

In the fulness of time, when the change was to take place and the earth born race had all perished and every soul had completed its proper cycle of births and been sown in the earth her appointed number of times the pilot of the universe let the helm go and retired to his place of view and then Fate and innate de sire reversed the motion of the world Then al so all the inferior deities who share the rule of the supreme power being informed of what was happening let go the parts of the world which were under their control [273] And the world turning round with a sudden shock be ing impelled in an opposite direction from be ginning to end was shaken by a mighty earth quake which wrought a new destruction of all manner of animals Afterwards, when sufficient time had elapsed the tumult and confusion and earthquake ceased and the universal crea ture once more at peace attained to a calm and settled down into his own orderly and accus tomed course having the charge and rule of himself and of all the creatures which are con tained in him and executing as far as he re membered them the instructions of his Father and Creator more precisely at first but after words with less exactness The reason of the falling off was the admixture of matter in him this was inherent in the primal nature which was full of disorder until attaining to the pres ent order From God the constructor the world received all that is good in him but from a pre vious state came elements of evil and unright eousness which thence derived first of all passed into the world and were then transmit ted to the animals While the world was aided by the pilot in nurturing the animals the evil was small and great the good which he pro duced but after the separation when the world was let go at first all proceeded well enough but, as time went on there was more and more forgetting, and the old discord again held sway and burst forth in full glory and at last small was the good, and great was the admixture of evil, and there was a danger of universal ruin to the world and to the things contained in him Wherefore God, the orderer of all in his tender care, seeing that the world was in great straits, and fearing that all might be dissolved in the storm and disappear in infinite chaos, again seated himself at the helm and bringing back the elements which had fallen into dissolution and disorder to the motion which had prevailed under his dispensation, he set them in order and restored them, and made the world imperishable and immortal

And this is the whole tale, of which the first part will suffice to illustrate the nature of the king For when the world turned towards the present cycle of generation, the age of man again stood still, and a change opposite to the previous one was the result. The small creatures which had almost disappeared grew in stature, and the newly born children of the earth became grey and died and sank into the earth again. [274] All things changed imitating and following the condition of the universe, and of necessity agreeing with that in their mode of conception and generation and nurture for no animal was any longer allowed to come into being in the earth through the agency of other creative beings, but as the world was ordained to be the lord of his own progress, in like manner the parts were ordained to grow and generate and give nourishment, as far as they could, of themselves, impelled by a similar movement. And so we have arrived at the real end of this discourse for although there might be much to tell of the lower animals, and of the condition out of which they changed and of the causes of the change, about men there is not much, and that little is more to the purpose. Deprived of the care of God, who had possessed and tended them, they were left helpless and defenceless, and were torn in pieces by the beasts, who were naturally fierce and had now grown wild. And in the first ages they were still without skill or resource the food which once grew spontaneously had failed, and as yet they knew not how to procure it, because they had never felt the pressure of necessity For all these reasons they were in a great strait wherefore also the gifts spoken of in the old tradition were imparted to man by the gods, together with so much teaching and education as was indispensable fire was given to them by Prometheus, the arts by Hephaestus and his fellow worker Athene seeds and plants by others. From these is derived all that has helped to frame human life since the care of the Gods, as I was saying, had now failed men, and they had to order their course of life for themselves, and were their own masters, just like the universal creature whom they imitate and follow ever changing as he changes, and ever living and growing at one time in one manner and at another time in another Enough of the story which may be of use in showing us how greatly we erred in the delineation of the king and the statesman in our previous discourse.

Y Soc What was this great error of which you speak?

Str There were two the first a lesser one, the other was an error on a much larger and grander scale.

Y Soc What do you mean?

[275] Str I mean to say that when we were asked about a king and statesman of the present cycle and generation, we told of a shepherd of a human flock who belonged to the other cycle, and of one who was a god when he ought to have been a man and this was a great error Again, we declared him to be the ruler of the entire State, without explaining how this was not the whole truth, nor very intelligible but still it was true, and therefore the second error was not so great as the first.

Y Soc Very good.

Str Before we can expect to have a perfect description of the statesman we must define the nature of his office

Y Soc Certainly

Str And the myth was introduced in order to show not only that all others are rivals of the true shepherd who is the object of our search, but in order that we might have a clearer view of him who is alone worthy to receive this appellation, because he alone of shepherds and herdsmen, according to the image which we have employed, has the care of human beings.

Y Soc Very true.

Str And I cannot help thinking Socrates, that the form of the divine shepherd is even higher than that of a king whereas the statesmen who are now on earth seem to be much more like their subjects in character and much more nearly to partake of their breeding and education.

Y Soc Certainly

Str Still they must be investigated all the same, to see whether like the divine shepherd they are above their subjects or on a level with them

Y Soc Of course

Str To resume —Do you remember that we spoke of a command for self exercised over animals not singly but collectively which we called the art of rearing a herd?

Y Soc Yes I remember

Str There somewhere lay our error for we never included or mentioned the Statesman and we did not observe that he had no place in our nomenclature

Y Soc How was that?

Str All other herdsmen rear their herds, but this is not a suitable term to apply to the Statesman we should use a name which is common to them all

Y Soc True if there be such a name

Str Why is not care of herds applicable to all? For this implies no feeding or any special duty if we say either tending the herds or managing the herds or having the care of them the same word will include all and then we may wrap up the Statesman with the rest as the argument seems to require [276] Y Soc Quite right but how shall we take the next step in the division?

Str As before we divided the art of rearing herds accordingly as they were land or water herds winged and wingless mixing or not mixing the breed horned and hornless so we may divide by these same differences the tending of herds comprehending in our definition the kingship of to-day and the rule of Cronos

Y Soc That is clear but I still ask what is to follow

Str If the word had been managing herds instead of feeding or rearing them no one would have argued that there was no care of men in the case of the politician although it was justly contended that there was no human art of feeding them which was worthy of the name or at least if there were many a man had a prior and greater right to share in such an art than any king

Y Soc True

Str But no other art or science will have a prior or better right than the royal science to care for human society and to rule over men in general

Y Soc Quite true

Str In the next place Socrates we must surely notice that a great error was committed at the end of our analysis

Y Soc What was it?

Str Why, supposing we were ever so sure that there is such an art as the art of rearing or feeding bipeds there was no reason why we should call this the royal or political art, as though there were no more to be said

Y Soc Certainly not

Str Our first duty as we were saying was to remodel the name so as to have the notion of care rather than of feeding and then to divide, for there may be still considerable divisions

Y Soc How can they be made?

Str First by separating the divine shepherd from the human guardian or manager

Y Soc True

Str And the art of management which is assigned to man would again have to be subdivided

Y Soc On what principle?

Str On the principle of voluntary and com*pulsory*

Y Soc Why?

Str Because if I am not mistaken there has been an error here for our simplicity led us to rank king and tyrant together whereas they are utterly distinct like their modes of government.

Y Soc True

Str Then now as I said let us make the correction and divide human care into two parts on the principle of voluntary and compulsory

Y Soc Certainly

Str And if we call the management of violent rulers tyranny and the voluntary management of herds of voluntary bipeds politics may we *not further assert that he who has this lat*ter art of management is the true king and statesman?

[277] Y Soc I think Stranger that we have now completed the account of the Statesman

Str Would that we had Socrates but I have to satisfy myself as well as you and in my judgment the figure of the king is not yet perfected like statuaries who in their too great haste having overdone the several parts of their work lose time in cutting them down so too we partly out of haste partly out of a magnanimous desire to expose our former error and also because we imagined that a king required grand illustrations have taken up a marvellous lump of fable and have been obliged to use more than was necessary This made us discourse at large and, nevertheless the story never came to an end And our discussion might be compared to a picture of some living being which had been fairly drawn in outline but had not yet attained the life and clearness which is given by the blending of colours Now to intelligent persons a living being had better be delineated by language and discourse than by any painting or work of art to the duller sort by works of art.

Y. Soc. Very true; but what is the imperfection which still remains? I wish that you would tell me.

Str. The higher ideas, my dear friend, can hardly be set forth except through the medium of examples; every man seems to know all things in a dreamy sort of way, and then again to wake up and to know nothing.

Y. Soc. What do you mean?

Str. I fear that I have been unfortunate in raising a question about our experience of knowledge.

Y. Soc. Why so?

Str. Why, because my "example" requires the assistance of another example.

Y. Soc. Proceed; you need not fear that I shall tire.

Str. I will proceed, finding, as I do, such a ready listener in you: when children are beginning to know their letters—

Y. Soc. What are you going to say?

Str. That they distinguish the several letters well enough in very short and easy syllables, [278] and are able to tell them correctly.

Y. Soc. Certainly.

Str. Whereas in other syllables they do not recognize them, and think and speak falsely of them.

Y. Soc. Very true.

Str. Will not the best and easiest way of bringing them to a knowledge of what they do not as yet know be—

Y. Soc. Be what?

Str. To refer them first of all to cases in which they judge correctly about the letters in question, and then to compare these with the cases in which they do not as yet know, and to show them that the letters are the same, and have the same character in both combinations, until all cases in which they are right have been placed side by side with all cases in which they are wrong. In this way they have examples, and are made to learn that each letter in every combination is always the same and not another, and is always called by the same name.

Y. Soc. Certainly.

Str. Are not examples formed in this manner? We take a thing and compare it with another distinct instance of the same thing, of which we have a right conception, and out of the comparison there arises one true notion, which includes both of them.

Y. Soc. Exactly.

Str. Can we wonder, then, that the soul has the same uncertainty about the alphabet of things, and sometimes and in some cases is firmly fixed by the truth in each particular, and then, again, in other cases is altogether at sea; having somehow or other a correct notion of combinations; but when the elements are transferred into the long and difficult language (syllables) of facts, is again ignorant of them?

Y. Soc. There is nothing wonderful in that.

Str. Could any one, my friend, who began with false opinion ever expect to arrive even at a small portion of truth and to attain wisdom?

Y. Soc. Hardly.

Str. Then you and I will not be far wrong in trying to see the nature of example in general in a small and particular instance; afterwards from lesser things we intend to pass to the royal class, which is the highest form of the same nature, and endeavour to discover by rules of art what the management of cities is; and then the dream will become a reality to us.

Y. Soc. Very true.

[279] Str. Then, once more, let us resume the previous argument, and as there were innumerable rivals of the royal race who claim to have the care of states, let us part them all off, and leave him alone; and, as I was saying, a model or example of this process has first to be framed.

Y. Soc. Exactly.

Str. What model is there which is small, and yet has any analogy with the political occupation? Suppose, Socrates, that if we have no other example at hand, we choose weaving, or, more precisely, weaving of wool—this will be quite enough, without taking the whole of weaving, to illustrate our meaning?

Y. Soc. Certainly.

Str. Why should we not apply to weaving the same processes of division and subdivision which we have already applied to other classes; going once more as rapidly as we can through all the steps until we come to that which is needed for our purpose?

Y. Soc. How do you mean?

Str. I shall reply by actually performing the process.

Y. Soc. Very good.

Str. All things which we make or acquire are either creative or preventive; of the preventive class are antidotes, divine and human, and also defences; and defences are either military weapons or protections; and protections are veils, and also shields against heat and cold, and shields against heat and cold are shelters and coverings; and coverings are blankets and garments; and garments are some of them in one piece and others of them are made in several parts and of these latter some are stitched others are fastened and not stitched and of the not stitched some are made of the sinews of plants and some of hair, and of these again some are cemented with water and earth and others are fastened together by themselves And these last defences and coverings which are fastened together by themselves are called clothes and the art which superintends them we may call, from the nature of the operation [280] the art of clothing just as before the art of the Statesman was derived from the State, and may we not say that the art of weaving at least that largest portion of it which was concerned with the making of clothes differs only in name from this art of clothing in the same way that in the previous case the royal science differed from the political?

Y Soc Most true

Str In the next place let us make the reflection that the art of weaving clothes which an incompetent person might fancy to have been sufficiently described has been separated off from several others which are of the same family, but not from the co-operative arts

Y Soc And which are the kindred arts?

Str I see that I have not taken you with me So I think that we had better go backwards starting from the end We just now parted off from the weaving of clothes the making of blankets which differ from each other in that one is put under and the other is put around! and these are what I termed kindred arts

Y Soc I understand

Str And we have subtracted the manufacture of all articles made of flax and cords and all that we just now metaphorically termed the sinews of plants, and we have also separated off the process of felting and the putting together of materials by stitching and sewing of which the most important part is the cobbler s art

Y Soc Precisely

Str Then we separated off the currier s art which prepared coverings in entire pieces and the art of sheltering and subtracted the various arts of making water tight which are employed in building and in general in carpentering and in other crafts and all such arts as furnish impediments to thieving and acts of violence and are concerned with making the lids of boxes and the fixing of doors being divisions of the art of joining and we also cut off the manufacture of arms which is a section of the great and manifold art of making defences and we originally began by parting off the whole of the magic art which is concerned with antidotes, and have left as would appear the very art of which we were in search the art of protection against winter cold which fabricates woollen defences and has the name of weaving

Y Soc Very true

[281] Str Yes my boy but that is not all for the first process to which the material is subjected is the opposite of weaving

Y Soc How so?

Str Weaving is a sort of uniting?

Y Soc Yes

Str But the first process is a separation of the clotted and matted fibres?

Y Soc What do you mean?

Str I mean the work of the carder s art for we cannot say that carding is weaving or that the carder is a weaver

Y Soc Certainly not

Str Again if a person were to say that the art of making the warp and the woof was the art of weaving he would say what was paradoxical and false

Y Soc To be sure

Str Shall we say that the whole art of the fuller or of the mender has nothing to do with the care and treatment of clothes or are we to regard all these as arts of weaving?

Y Soc Certainly not

Str And yet surely all these arts will maintain that they are concerned with the treatment and production of clothes they will dispute the exclusive prerogative of weaving and though assigning a larger sphere to that will still reserve a considerable field for themselves

Y Soc Very true

Str Besides these there are the arts which make tools and instruments of weaving and which will claim at least to be co-operative causes in every work of the weaver

Y Soc Most true

Str Well then suppose that we define weaving or rather that part of it which has been selected by us to be the greatest and noblest of arts which are concerned with woollen garments—shall we be right? Is not the definition although true wanting in clearness and completeness for do not all those other arts require to be first cleared away?

Y Soc True

Str Then the next thing will be to separate them in order that the argument may proceed in a regular manner?

Y Soc By all means

Str Let us consider in the first place th

there are two kinds of arts entering into every thing which we do

Y Soc What are they?

Str The one kind is the conditional or co-operative, the other the principal cause

Y Soc What do you mean?

Str The arts which do not manufacture the actual thing but which furnish the necessary tools for the manufacture without which the several arts could not fulfil their appointed work, are co-operative but those which make the things themselves are causal

Y Soc A very reasonable distinction

Str Thus the arts which make spindles, combs, and other instruments of the production of clothes, may be called co-operative and those which treat and fabricate the things themselves, causal

Y Soc Very true.

[282] Str The arts of washing and mending and the other preparatory arts which belong to the causal class, and form a division of the great art of adornment, may be all comprehended under what we call the fuller's art.

Y Soc Very good

Str Carding and spinning threads and all the parts of the process which are concerned with the actual manufacture of a woollen garment form a single art, which is one of those universally acknowledged—the art of working in wool

Y Soc To be sure

Str Of working in wool again there are two divisions, and both these are parts of two arts at once

Y Soc How is that?

Str Carding and one half of the use of the comb, and the other processes of wool working which separate the composite, may be classed together as belonging both to the art of wool working and also to one of the two great arts which are of universal application—the art of composition and the art of division

Y Soc Yes.

Str To the latter belong carding and the other processes of which I was just now speaking the art of discernment or division in wool and yarn which is effected in one manner with the comb and in another with the hands is variously described under all the names which I just now mentioned

Y Soc Very true

Str Again, let us take some process of wool working which is also a portion of the art of composition and dismissing the elements of division which we found there make two halves one on the principle of composition and the other on the principle of division

Y Soc Let that be done.

Str And once more Socrates, we must divide the part which belongs at once both to wool working and composition if we are ever to discover satisfactorily the aforesaid art of weaving

Y Soc We must

Str Yes, certainly and let us call one part of the art the art of twisting threads, the other the art of combining them

Y Soc Do I understand you in speaking of twisting to be referring to manufacture of the warp?

Str Yes, and of the woof too how if not by twisting is the woof made?

Y Soc There is no other way

Str Then suppose that you define the warp and the woof for I think that the definition will be of use to you

Y Soc How shall I define them?

Str As thus A piece of carded wool which is drawn out lengthwise and breadthwise is said to be pulled out

Y Soc Yes.

Str And the wool thus prepared when twisted by the spindle and made into a firm thread is called the warp and the art which regulates these operations the art of spinning the warp

Y Soc True

Str And the threads which are more loosely spun having a softness proportioned to the intertexture of the warp and to the degree of force used in dressing the cloth—the threads which are thus spun are called the woof [283] and the art which is set over them may be called the art of spinning the woof

Y Soc Very true

Str And, now there can be no mistake about the nature of the part of weaving which we have undertaken to define For when that part of the art of composition which is employed in the working of wool forms a web by the regular intertexture of warp and woof, the entire woven substance is called by us a woollen garment and the art which presides over this is the art of weaving

Y Soc Very true

Str But why did we not say at once that weaving is the art of entwining warp and woof instead of making a long and useless circuit?

Y Soc I thought, Stranger that there was nothing useless in what was said

Str Very likely but you may not always think so my sweet friend and in case any feeling of one piece and others of them are made in several parts and of these latter some are stitched others are fastened and not stitched and of the not stitched some are made of the sinews of plants and some of hair, and of these again some are cemented with water and earth and others are fastened together by themselves And these last defences and coverings which are fastened together by themselves are called clothes and the art which superintends them we may call from the nature of the operation [280] the art of clothing just as before the art of the Statesman was derived from the State and may we not say that the art of weaving at least that largest portion of it which was concerned with the making of clothes differs only in name from this art of clothing in the same way that in the previous case the royal science differed from the political?

Y Soc By all means

Str Let us consider in the first place th

things which come within the province of art do certainly in some sense partake of measure. But these persons, because they are not accustomed to distinguish classes according to real forms, jumble together two widely different things, relation to one another and to a standard, under the idea that they are the same, and also fall into the converse error of dividing other things not according to their real parts. Whereas the right way is, if a man has first seen the unity of things, to go on with the enquiry and not desist until he has found all the differences contained in it which form distinct classes; nor again should he be able to rest contented with the manifold diversities which are seen in a multitude of things until he has comprehended all of them that have any affinity within the bounds of one similarity and embraced them within the reality of a single kind. But we have said enough on this head and also of excess and defect: we have only to bear in mind that two divisions of the art of measurement have been discovered which are concerned with them, and not forget what they are.

Y. Soc. We will not forget.

Str. And now that this discussion is completed, let us go on to consider another question, which concerns not this argument only but the conduct of such arguments in general.

Y. Soc. What is this new question?

Str. Take the case of a child who is engaged in learning his letters: when he is asked what letters make up a word, should we say that the question is intended to improve his grammatical knowledge of that particular word, or of all words?

Y. Soc. Clearly, in order that he may have a better knowledge of all words.

Str. And is our enquiry about the Statesman intended only to improve our knowledge of politics, or our power of reasoning generally?

Y. Soc. Clearly, as in the former example, the purpose is general.

Str. Still less would any rational man seek to analyse the notion of weaving for its own sake. But people seem to forget that some things have sensible images, which are readily known, and can be easily pointed out when any one desires to answer an enquirer without any trouble or argument; [286] whereas the greatest and highest truths have no outward image of themselves visible to man, which he who wishes to satisfy the soul of the enquirer can adapt to the eye of sense,* and therefore we ought to train ourselves to give and accept a rational account of them; for immaterial things, which are the noblest and greatest, are shown only in thought and idea, and in no other way, and all that we are now saying is said for the sake of them. Moreover, there is always less difficulty in fixing the mind on small matters than on great.

Y. Soc. Very good.

Str. Let us call to mind the bearing of all this.

Y. Soc. What is it?

Str. I wanted to get rid of any impression of tediousness which we may have experienced in the discussion about weaving, and the reversal of the universe, and in the discussion concerning the Sophist and the being of not-being. I know that they were felt to be too long, and I reproached myself with this, fearing that they might be not only tedious but irrelevant; and all that I have now said is only designed to prevent the recurrence of any such disagreeables for the future.

Y. Soc. Very good. Will you proceed?

Str. Then I would like to observe that you and I, remembering what has been said, should praise or blame the length or shortness of discussions, not by comparing them with one another, but with what is fitting, having regard to the part of measurement, which, as we said, was to be borne in mind.

Y. Soc. Very true.

Str. And yet, not everything is to be judged even with a view to what is fitting; for we should only want such a length as is suited to give pleasure, if at all, as a secondary matter; and reason tells us, that we should be contented to make the ease or rapidity of an enquiry, not our first, but our second object; the first and highest of all being to assert the great method of division according to species—whether the discourse be shorter or longer is not to the point. No offence should be taken at length, but the longer and shorter are to be employed indifferently, according as either of them is better calculated to sharpen the wits of the auditors. Reason would also say to him who censures the length of discourses on such occasions and cannot away with their circumlocution, that he should not be in such a hurry to have done with them, when he can only complain that they are tedious, [287] but he should prove that if they had been shorter they would have made those who took part in them better dialecticians, and more capable of expressing the truth of things; about any other praise and blame, he need not trouble himself—he should pretend not to hear them. But we have had enough of this, as you will probably agree with me in thinking. Let dissatisfaction should hereafter arise in your mind as it very well may let me lay down a principle which will apply to arguments in general

* Cf. Phaedrus 250.

Y Soc Proceed

Str Let us begin by considering the whole nature of excess and defect and then we shall have a rational ground on which we may praise or blame too much length or too much shortness in discussions of this kind

Y Soc Let us do so

Str The points on which I think that we ought to dwell are the following —

Y Soc What?

Str Length and shortness excess and defect with all of these the art of measurement is conversant

Y Soc Yes

Str And the art of measurement has to be divided into two parts with a view to our present purpose

Y Soc Where would you make the division?

Str As thus I would make two parts one having regard to the relativity of greatness and smallness to each other and there is another, without which the existence of production would be impossible

Y Soc What do you mean?

Str Do you not think that it is only natural for the greater to be called greater with reference to the less alone and the less less with reference to the greater alone?

Y Soc Yes

Str Well but is there not also something exceeding and exceeded by the principle of the mean both in speech and action and is not this a reality and the chief mark of difference between good and bad men?

Y Soc Plainly

Str Then we must suppose that the great and small exist and are discerned in both these ways and not as we were saying before only relatively to one another but there must also be another comparison of them with the mean or ideal standard would you like to hear the reason why?

Y Soc Certainly

[284] Str If we assume the greater to exist only in relation to the less there will never be any comparison of either with the mean

Y Soc True

Str And would not this doctrine be the ruin of all the arts and their creations would not the art of the Statesman and the aforesaid art of weaving disappear? For all these arts are on the watch against excess and defect, not as unrealities but as real evils which occasion a difficulty in action and the excellence of beauty of every work of art is due to this observance of measure

Y Soc Certainly

Str But if the science of the Statesman disappears the search for the royal science will be impossible

Y Soc Very true

Str Well then as in the case of the Sophist we extorted the inference that not being had an existence because here was the point at which the argument eluded our grasp so in this we must endeavour to show that the greater and less are not only to be measured with one another but also have to do with the production of the mean for if this is not admitted neither a statesman nor any other man of action can be an undisputed master of his science

Y Soc Yes we must certainly do again what we did then

Str But this Socrates is a greater work than the other of which we only too well remember the length I think however that we may fairly assume something of this sort—

Y Soc What?

Str That we shall some day require this notion of a mean with a view to the demonstration of absolute truth meanwhile the argument that the very existence of the arts must be held to depend on the possibility of measuring more or less not only with one another but also with a view to the attainment of the mean seems to afford a grand support and satisfactory proof of the doctrine which we are maintaining for if there are arts there is a standard of measure and if there is a standard of measure there are arts but if either is wanting there is neither

Y Soc True and what is the next step?

Str The next step clearly is to divide the art of measurement into two parts as we have said already and to place in the one part all the arts which measure number length depth breadth swiftness with their opposit s and to have another part in which they are measured with the mean and the fit and the opportune and the due, and with all those words in short which denote a mean or standard removed from the extremes

Y Soc Here are two vast divisions embracing two very different spheres

[285] Str There are many accomplished men Socrates who say believing themselves to speak wisely that the art of measurement is universal and has to do with all things And this means what we are now saying for all particles of the human body and minister to the body [289] will form a seventh class, which may be called by the general term of nourishment, unless you have any better name to offer. This, however, appertains rather to the husbandman, huntsman, trainer, doctor, cook, and is not to be assigned to the Statesman's art.

Y. Soc. Certainly not.

Str. These seven classes include nearly every description of property, with the exception of tame animals. Consider—there was the original material, which ought to have been placed first; next come instruments, vessels, vehicles, defences, playthings, nourishment; small things, which may be included under one of these—as for example, coins, seals and stamps, are omitted, for they have not in them the character of any larger kind which includes them; but some of them may, with a little forcing, be placed among ornaments, and others may be made to harmonize with the class of implements. The art of herding, which has been already divided into parts, will include all property in tame animals, except slaves.

Y. Soc. Very true.

Str. The class of slaves and ministers only remains, and I suspect that in this the real aspirants for the throne, who are the rivals of the king in the formation of the political web, will be discovered; just as spinners, carders, and the rest of them, were the rivals of the weaver. All the others, who were termed co-operators, have been got rid of among the occupations already mentioned, and separated from the royal and political science.

Y. Soc. I agree.

Str. Let us go a little nearer, in order that we may be more certain of the complexion of this remaining class.

Y. Soc. Let us do so.

Str. We shall find from our present point of view that the greatest servants are in a case and condition which is the reverse of what we anticipated.

Y. Soc. Who are they?

Str. Those who have been purchased, and have so become possessions; these are unmistakably slaves, and certainly do not claim royal science.

Y. Soc. Certainly not.

Str. Again, freemen who of their own accord become the servants of the other classes in a State, and who exchange and equalise the products of husbandry and the other arts, some sitting in the market-place, others going from city to city by land or sea, and giving money in exchange for money or for other productions—[290] the money-changer, the merchant, the ship-owner, the retailer, will not put in any claim to statecraft or politics?

Y. Soc. No; unless, indeed, to the politics of commerce.

Str. But surely men whom we see acting as hirelings and serfs, and too happy to turn their hand to anything, will not profess to share in royal science?

Y. Soc. Certainly not.

Str. But what would you say of some other serviceable officials?

Y. Soc. Who are they, and what services do they perform?

Str. There are heralds, and scribes perfected by practice, and divers others who have great skill in various sorts of business connected with the government of states—what shall we call them?

Y. Soc. They are the officials, and servants of the rulers, as you just now called them, but not themselves rulers.

Str. There may be something strange in any servant pretending to be a ruler, and yet I do not think that I could have been dreaming when I imagined that the principal claimants to political science would be found somewhere in this neighbourhood.

Y. Soc. Very true.

Str. Well, let us draw nearer, and try the claims of some who have not yet been tested: in the first place, there are diviners, who have a portion of servile or ministerial science, and are thought to be the interpreters of the gods to men.

Y. Soc. True.

Str. There is also the priestly class, who, as the law declares, know how to give the gods gifts from men in the form of sacrifices which are acceptable to them, and to ask on our behalf blessings in return from them. Now both these are branches of the servile or ministerial art.

Y. Soc. Yes, clearly.

Str. And here I think that we seem to be getting on the right track; for the priest and the diviner are swollen with pride and prerogative, and they create an awful impression of themselves by the magnitude of their enterprises; in Egypt, the king himself is not allowed to reign, unless he have priestly powers, and if he should be of another class and has thrust himself in, he must get enrolled in the priesthood. In many parts of Hellas, the duty of offering the most solemn propitiatory sacrifices is assigned to the us return to our Statesman and apply to his case the aforesaid example of weaving

Y Soc Very good —let us do as you say

Str The art of the king has been separated from the similar arts of shepherds and indeed from all those which have to do with herds at all There still remain however of the causal and co operative arts those which are immediately concerned with States and which must first be distinguished from one another

Y Soc Very good

Str You know that these arts cannot easily be divided into two halves the reason will be very evident as we proceed

Y Soc Then we had better do so

Str We must carve them like a victim into members or limbs since we cannot bisect them For we certainly should divide everything into as few parts as possible

Y Soc What is to be done in this case?

Str What we did in the example of weaving —all those arts which furnish the tools were regarded by us as co-operative

Y Soc Yes

Str So now and with still more reason all arts which make any implement in a State whether great or small may be regarded by us as co-operative for without them neither State nor Statesmanship would be possible and yet we are not inclined to say that any of them is a product of the kingly art

Y Soc No indeed

Str The task of separating this class from others is not an easy one for there is plausibility in saying that anything in the world is the instrument of doing something But there is another class of possessions in a city of which I have a word to say

Y Soc What class do you mean?

Str A class which may be described as not having this power that is to say not like an instrument framed for production but designed for the preservation of that which is produced

Y Soc To what do you refer?

Str To the class of vessels as they are comprehensively termed which are constructed for the preservation of things moist and dry of things prepared in the fire or out of the fire [288] this is a very large class and has if I am not mistaken literally nothing to do with the royal art of which we are in search

Y Soc Certainly not

Str There is also a third class of possessions to be noted different from these and very extensive moving or resting on land or water honourable and also dishonourable The whole of this class has one name because it is intended to be sat upon being always a seat for some thing

Y Soc What is it?

Str A vehicle which is certainly not the work of the Statesman but of the carpenter potter and coppersmith

Y Soc I understand

Str And is there not a fourth class which is again different and in which most of the things formerly mentioned are contained—every kind of dress most sorts of arms walls and enclosures whether of earth or stone and ten thousand other things? all of which being made for the sake of defence may be truly called defences and are for the most part to be regarded as the work of the builder or of the weaver rather than of the Statesman

Y Soc Certainly

Str Shall we add a fifth class of ornamentation and drawing and of the imitations produced by drawing and music which are designed for amusement only and may be fairly comprehended under one name?

Y Soc What is it?

Str Plaything is the name

Y Soc Certainly

Str That one name may be fitly predicated of all of them for none of these things have a serious purpose—amusement is their sole aim.

Y Soc That again I understand

Str Then there is a class which provides materials for all these out of which and in which the arts already mentioned fabricate their works —this manifold class I say which is the creation and offspring of many other arts, may I not rank sixth?

Y Soc What do you mean?

Str I am referring to gold silver and other metals and all that wood-cutting and shearing of every sort provides for the art of carpentry and plaiting and there is the process of barking and stripping the cuticle of plants and the currier s art which strips off the skins of animals and other similar arts which manufacture corks and papyri and cords and provide for the manufacture of composite species out of simple kinds—the whole class may be termed the primitive and simple possession of man and with this the kingly science has no concern at all

Y Soc True

Str The provision of food and of all other things which mingle their particles with the

Cf Phaedrus 65

intimated w ll be our duty

Str Do you think that the multitude in a State can attain pol tical science?

Y Soc Impossible

Str But, perhaps, in a city of a thousand men, there would be a hundred or say fifty who could?

Y Soc In that case political science would certainly be the easiest of all sciences there could not be found in a city of that number as many really first rate draught players, if judged by the standard of the rest of Hellas, and there would certainly not be as many kings For kings we may truly call those who possess royal science whether they rule or not, as was shown in the previous argument

[293] Str Thank you for reminding me and the consequence is that any true form of government can only be supposed to be the government of one, two or at any rate of a few

Y Soc Certainly

Str And these whether they rule with the will or against the will of their subjects, with written laws or without written laws and whether they are poor or rich, and whatever be the nature of their rule, must be supposed according to our present view to rule on some scientific principle just as the physician whether he cures us against our w ll or with our will, and whatever be his mode of treatment—incision, burning, or the infliction of some other pain—whether he practises out of a book or not out of a book and whether he be rich or poor whether he purges or reduces in some other way or e en fattens h s patients is a physician a l the same, so long as he exercises authority over them according to rules of art, if he only does them good and heals and sa es them And this we lay down to be the only proper test of the art of medicine or of any other art of command

Y Soc Qu te true

Str Then that can be the only true form of gov rnment in wh ch the governors are really found to possess science, and are not mere pretender whether th ey rule acco ding to law or without law over w ll ng or unwill ng subjects, and are r ch or poo r themsel es—none of these things can with any propri ty be included in the notion of the ruler

Y Soc True

Str And whether w th a view to the publ c good they purge the Stat by kill ng some or ex l ng some whether th y reduce the size of the body co por te by sending out from the hive swarms of citizens, or by introducing persons from without increase it while they act according to the rules of wisdom and justice, and use their power with a view to the general security and improvement, the city over which they rule, and which has these characteristics, may be described as the only true State All other governments are not genuine or real but only imitations of this and some of them are better and some of them are worse the better are said to be well go erned but they are mere imitations like the others

Y Soc I agree Stranger in the greater part of what you say but as to their ruling without laws—the expression has a harsh sound

[294] Str You have been too quick for me Socrates I was just going to ask you whether you objected to any of my statements And now I see that we shall ha e to consider this notion of there being good government without laws

Y Soc Certainly

Str There can be no doubt that legislation is in a manner the business of a king and yet the best thing of all is not that the law should rule but that a man should rule, supposing him to have wisdom and royal power Do you see why this is?

Y Soc Why?

Str Because the law does not perfectly comprehend what is noblest and most just for all and therefore cannot enforce what is best The d fferences of men and actions, and the endless irregular movements of human things, do not admit of any universal and simple rule And no art whatsoe er can lay down a rule which will last for all time

Y Soc Of course not.

Str But the law is always striving to make one —like an obstinate and ignorant tyrant who will not allow anything to be done contrary to his appo ntment, or any question to be asked—not even in sudden changes of circumstances w hen something happens to be better than what he commanded for some one

Y Soc Certainly the law treats us all precisely in the manner which you describe

Str A perfectly simple principle can never be applied to a state of things wh ch is the reverse of simple

Y Soc True.

Str Then if the law is not the perfection of r ght why are we compelled to make laws at all? The reason of this has next to be investigated

Y Soc Certainly

Str Let me ask whether you have not m eet

Cf 59

highest magistracies and here at Athens the most solemn and national of the ancient sacrifices are supposed to be celebrated by him who has been chosen by lot to be the King Archon

Y Soc Precisely

[291] Str But who are these other kings and priests elected by lot who now come into view followed by their retainers and a vast throng as the former class disappears and the scene changes?

Y Soc Whom can you mean?

Str They are a strange crew

Y Soc Why strange?

Str A minute ago I thought that they were animals of every tribe for many of them are like lions and centaurs and many more like satyrs and such weak and shifty creatures —Protean shapes quickly changing into one another s forms and natures and now Socrates I begin to see who they are

Y Soc Who are they? You seem to be gazing on some strange vision

Str Yes every one looks strange when you do not know him and just now I myself fell into this mistake—at first sight coming suddenly upon him I did not recognize the politician and his troop

Y Soc Who is he?

Str The chief of Sophists and most accomplished of wizards who must at any cost be separated from the true king or Statesman if we are ever to see daylight in the present enquiry

Y Soc That is a hope not lightly to be renounced

Str Never if I can help it and first let me ask you a question

Y Soc What?

Str Is not monarchy a recognized form of government?

Y Soc Yes

Str And after monarchy next in order comes the government of the few?

Y Soc Of course

Str Is not the third form of government the rule of the multitude which is called by the name of democracy?

Y Soc Certainly

Str And do not these three expand in a manner into five producing out of themselves two other names?

Y Soc What are they?

Str There is a criterion of voluntary and involuntary poverty and riches law and the absence of law which men now a-days apply to them the two first they subdivide accordingly and ascribe to monarchy two forms and two corresponding names royalty and tyranny

Y Soc Very true

Str And the government of the few they distinguish by the names of aristocracy and oligarchy

Y Soc Certainly

[292] Str Democracy alone whether rigidly observing the laws or not, and whether the multitude rule over the men of property with their consent or against their consent always in ordinary language has the same name

Y Soc True

Str But do you suppose that any form of government which is defined by these characteristics of the one the few or the many of poverty or wealth of voluntary or compulsory submission of written law or the absence of law, can be a right one?

Y Soc Why not?

Str Reflect and follow me

Y Soc In what direction?

Str Shall we abide by what we said at first or shall we retract our words?

Y Soc To what do you refer?

Str If I am not mistaken we said that royal power was a science?

Y Soc Yes

Str And a science of a peculiar kind which was selected out of the rest as having a character which is at once judicial and authoritative?

Y Soc Yes

Str And there was one kind of authority over lifeless things and another other living animals and so we proceeded in the division step by step up to this point not losing the idea of science but unable as yet to determine the nature of the particular science?

Y Soc True

Str Hence we are led to observe that the distinguishing principle of the State cannot be the few or many the voluntary or involuntary poverty or riches but some notion of science must enter into it if we are to be consistent with what has preceded

Y Soc And we must be consistent

Str Well then in which of these various forms of States may the science of government which is among the greatest of all sciences and most difficult to acquire be supposed to reside? That we must discover and then we shall see who are the false politicians who pretend to be politicians but are not, although they persuade many and shall separate them from the wise king

Y Soc That as the argument has already ease, but evil, or disgrace or injustice

Y Soc Quite true.

Str And when the citizen contrary to law and custom, is compelled to do what is juster and better and nobler than he did before the last and most absurd thing which he could say about such violence is that he has incurred disgrace or evil or injustice at the hands of those who compelled him.

Y Soc Very true.

Str And shall we say that the violence, if exercised by a rich man, is just, and if by a poor man unjust? May not any man, rich or poor with or without laws, with the will of the citizens or against the will of the citizens, do what is for their interest? Is not this the true principle of government, according to which the wise and good man will order the affairs of his subjects? [297] As the pilot, by watching continually over the interests of the ship and of the crew—not by laying down rules, but by making his art a law—preserves the lives of his fellow sailors, even so and in the self same way may there not be a true form of polity created by those who are able to govern in a similar spirit, and who show a strength of art which is superior to the law? Nor can wise rulers ever err while they observing the one great rule of distributing justice to the citizens with intelligence and skill, are able to preserve them and, as far as may be, to make them better from be in worse

Y Soc No one can deny what has been now said.

Str Neither if you consider can any one deny the other statement.

Y Soc What was it?

Str We said that no great number of persons whoever they may be, can attain political knowledge, or order a State wisely but that the true government is to be found in a small body or in an individual and that other States are but imitations of this as we said a little while ago some for the better and some for the worse

Y Soc What do you mean? I cannot have understood your previous remark about imitations

Str And yet the mere suggestion which I hastily threw out is highly important, even if we leave the question where it is, and do not seek by the discussion of it to expose the error which prevails in this matter

Y Soc What do you mean?

Str The idea which has to be grasped by us is not easy or familiar but we may attempt to express it thus —Supposing the government of which I have been speaking to be the only true model, then the others must use the written laws of this—in no other way can they be saved they will have to do what is now generally approved although not the best thing in the world

Y Soc What is this?

Str No citizen should do anything contrary to the laws, and any infringement of them should be punished with death and the most extreme penalties and this is very right and good when regarded as the second best thing, if you set aside the first, of which I was just now speaking Shall I explain the nature of what I call the second best?

Y Soc By all means.

Str I must again have recourse to my favourite images through them, and them alone, can I describe kings and rulers.

Y Soc What images?

Str The noble pilot and the wise physician who is worth many another man —in the similitude of these let us endeavour to discover some image of the king

Y Soc What sort of an image?

[298] Str Well such as this —Every man will reflect that he suffers strange things at the hands of both of them the physician saves any whom he wishes to save and any whom he wishes to maltreat he maltreats—cutting or burning them and at the same time requiring them to bring him payments, which are a sort of tribute of which little or nothing is spent upon the sick man, and the greater part is consumed by him and his domestics and the finale is that he receives money from the relations of the sick man or from some enemy of his, and puts him out of the way And the pilots of ships are guilty of numberless evil deeds of the same kind they intentionally play false and leave you ashore when the hour of sailing arrives or they cause mishaps at sea and cast away their freight and are guilty of other rogueries. Now suppose that we, bearing all this in mind, were to determine, after consideration that neither of these arts shall any longer be allowed to exercise absolute control either over freemen or over slaves, but that we will summon an assembly either of all the people, or of the rich only that anybody who likes, whatever may be his calling, or even if he have no calling may offer an opinion either about seamanship or about diseases—whether as to the manner in which physic or surgical instruments are to be applied to the patient, or again about the vessels and the nautical implements which are required in ings for gymnastic contests in your city such as there are in other cities at which men compete in running wrestling and the like?

Y Soc Yes they are very common among us

Str And what are the rules which are enforced on their pupils by professional trainers or by others having similar authority? Can you remember?

Y Soc To what do you refer?

Str The training masters do not issue minute rules for individuals or give every individual what is exactly suited to his constitution they think that they ought to go more roughly to work and to prescribe generally the regimen which will benefit the majority

Y Soc Very true

Str And therefore they assign equal amounts of exercise to them all they send them forth together and let them rest together from their running wrestling or whatever the form of bodily exercise may be

Y Soc True

[295] Str And now observe that the legislator who has to preside over the herd and to enforce justice in their dealings with one another will not be able in enacting for the general good to provide exactly what is suitable for each particular case

Y Soc He cannot be expected to do so

Str He will lay down laws in a general form for the majority roughly meeting the cases of individuals and some of them he will deliver in writing and others will be unwritten and these last will be traditional customs of the country

Y Soc He will be right

Str Yes quite right for how can he sit at every man s side all through his life prescribing for him the exact particulars of his duty? Who Socrates would be equal to such a task? No one who really had the royal science if he had been able to do this would have imposed upon himself the restriction of a written law

Y Soc So I should infer from what has now been said

Str Or rather my good friend from what is going to be said

Y Soc And what is that?

Str Let us put to ourselves the case of a physician or trainer who is about to go into a far country and is expecting to be a long time away from his patients—thinking that his instructions will not be remembered unless they are written down he will leave notes of them for the use of his pupils or patients

Y Soc True

Str But what would you say if he came back sooner than he had intended and owing to an unexpected change of the winds or other celestial influences something else happened to be better for them—would he not venture to suggest this new remedy although not contemplated in his former prescription? Would he persist in observing the original law neither himself giving any new commandments nor the patient daring to do otherwise than was prescribed under the idea that this course only was healthy and medicinal all others noxious and heterodox? Viewed in the light of science and true art would not all such enactments be utterly ridiculous?

Y Soc Utterly

Str And if he who gave laws written or unwritten determining what was good or bad honourable or dishonourable just or unjust, to the tribes of men who flock together in their several cities and are governed in accordance with them if I say the wise legislator were suddenly to come again [296] or another like to him is he to be prohibited from changing them?—would not this prohibition be in reality quite as ridiculous as the other?

Y Soc Certainly

Str Do you know a plausible saying of the common people which is in point?

Y Soc I do not recall what you mean at the moment

Str They say that if any one knows how the ancient laws may be improved he must first persuade his own State of the improvement and then he may legislate but not otherwise

Y Soc And are they not right?

Str I dare say But supposing that he does use some gentle violence for their good what is this violence to be called? Or rather before you answer let me ask the same question in reference to our previous instances

Y Soc What do you mean?

Str Suppose that a skilful physician has a patient of whatever sex or age whom he compels against his will to do something for his good which is contrary to the written rules what is this compulsion to be called? Would you ever dream of calling it a violation of the art or a breach of the laws of health? Nothing could be more unjust than for the patient to whom such violence is applied to charge the physician who practises the violence with wanting skill or aggravating his disease.

Y Soc Most true

Str In the political art error is not called dis-

men, having fixed laws, in acting contrary to them with a view to something better would only be acting, as far as they are able, like the true Statesman?

Y. Soc. Certainly.

Str. If they had no knowledge of what they were doing, they would imitate the truth, and they would always imitate ill; but if they had knowledge, the imitation would be the perfect truth, and an imitation no longer.

Y. Soc. Quite true.

Str. And the principle that no great number of men are able to acquire a knowledge of any art has been already admitted by us.

Y. Soc. Yes, it has.

Str. Then the royal or political art, if there be such an art, will never be attained either by the wealthy or by the other mob.

Y. Soc. Impossible.

Str. Then the nearest approach which these lower forms of government can ever make to the true government of the one scientific [301] ruler is to do nothing contrary to their own written laws and national customs.

Y. Soc. Very good.

Str. When the rich imitate the true form, such a government is called aristocracy; and when they are regardless of the laws, oligarchy.

Y. Soc. True.

Str. Or again, when an individual rules according to law in imitation of him who knows, we call him a king; and if he rules according to law, we give him the same name, whether he rules with opinion or with knowledge.

Y. Soc. To be sure.

Str. And when an individual truly possessing knowledge rules, his name will surely be the same—he will be called a king; and thus the five names of governments, as they are now reckoned, become one.

Y. Soc. That is true.

Str. And when an individual ruler governs neither by law nor by custom, but following in the steps of the true man of science pretends that he can only act for the best by violating the laws, while in reality appetite and ignorance are the motives of the imitation, may not such an one be called a tyrant?

Y. Soc. Certainly.

Str. And this we believe to be the origin of the tyrant and the king, of oligarchies, and aristocracies, and democracies—because men are offended at the one monarch, and can never be made to believe that any one can be worthy of such authority, or is able and willing in the spirit of virtue and knowledge to act justly and holily to all; they fancy that he will be a despot who will wrong and harm and slay whom he pleases of us; for if there could be such a despot as we describe, they would acknowledge that we ought to be too glad to have him, and that he alone would be the happy ruler of a true and perfect State.

Y. Soc. To be sure.

Str. But then, as the State is not like a bee-hive, and has no natural head who is at once recognized to be the superior both in body and in mind, mankind are obliged to meet and make laws, and endeavour to approach as nearly as they can to the true form of government.

Y. Soc. True.

Str. And when the foundation of politics is in the letter only and in custom, and knowledge is divorced from action, can we wonder, Socrates, at the miseries which there are, and always will be, in States? Any other art, built on such a foundation and thus conducted, [302] would ruin all that it touched. Ought we not rather to wonder at the natural strength of the political bond? For States have endured all this, time out of mind, and yet some of them still remain and are not overthrown, though many of them, like ships at sea, founder from time to time, and perish, and have perished and will hereafter perish, through the badness of their pilots and crews, who have the worst sort of ignorance of the highest truths—I mean to say, that they are wholly unaquainted with politics, of which, above all other sciences, they believe themselves to have acquired the most perfect knowledge.

Y. Soc. Very true.

Str. Then the question arises:—which of these untrue forms of government is the least oppressive to their subjects, though they are all oppressive; and which is the worst of them? Here is a consideration which is beside our present purpose, and yet having regard to the whole it seems to influence all our actions: we must examine it.

Y. Soc. Yes, we must.

Str. You may say that of the three forms, the same is at once the hardest and the easiest.

Y. Soc. What do you mean?

Str. I am speaking of the three forms of government, which I mentioned at the beginning of this discussion—monarchy, the rule of the few, and the rule of the many.

Y. Soc. True.

Str. If we divide each of these we shall have six, from which the true one may be distinguished as a seventh.

navigation and how to meet the dangers of winds and waves which are incidental to the voyage how to behave when encountering pirates and what is to be done with the old fashioned galleys if they have to fight with others of a similar build—and that whatever shall be decreed by the multitude on these points upon the advice of persons skilled or unskilled shall be written down on triangular tablets and columns or enacted although unwritten to be national customs and that in all future time vessels shall be navigated and remedies administered to the patient after this fashion

Y Soc What a strange notion!

Str Suppose further that the pilots and physicians are appointed annually either out of the rich or out of the whole people and that they are elected by lot and that after their election they navigate vessels and heal the sick according to the written rules

Y Soc Worse and worse

Str But hear what follows —When the year of office has expired the pilot or physician has to come before a court of review in which the judges are either selected from the wealthy classes or chosen by [299] lot out of the whole people and anybody who pleases may be their accuser and may lay to their charge that during the past year they have not navigated their vessels or healed their patients according to the letter of the law and the ancient customs of their ancestors and if either of them is condemned some of the judges must fix what he is to suffer or pay

Y Soc He who is willing to take a command under such conditions deserves to suffer any penalty

Str Yet once more we shall have to enact that if any one is detected enquiring into piloting and navigation or into health and the true nature of medicine or about the winds or other conditions of the atmosphere contrary to the written rules and has any ingenious notions about such matters he is not to be called a pilot or physician but a cloudy prating sophist — further on the ground that he is a corrupter of the young who would persuade them to follow the art of medicine or piloting in an unlawful manner and to exercise an arbitary rule over their patients or ships any one who is qualified by law may inform against him and indict him in some court and then if he is found to be persuading any whether young or old to act contrary to the written law he is to be punished with the utmost rigour for no one should presume to be wiser than the laws and as touching healing and health and piloting and navigation the nature of them is known to all for anybody may learn the written laws and the national customs If such were the mode of procedure Socrates about these sciences and about generalship and any branch of hunting or about painting or imitation in general or carpentry or any sort of handicraft, or husbandry, or planting or if we were to see an art of rearing horses or tending herds or divination or any ministerial service or draught playing or any science conversant with number whether simple or square or cube or comprising motion—I say if all these things were done in this way according to written regulations and not according to art what would be the result?

Y Soc All the arts would utterly perish and could never be recovered because enquiry would be unlawful And human life, which is bad enough already would then become utterly unendurable

[300] Str But what if while compelling all these operations to be regulated by written law we were to appoint as the guardian of the laws some one elected by a show of hands or by lot, and he caring nothing about the laws were to act contrary to them from motives of interest or favour and without knowledge—would not this be a still worse evil than the former?

Y Soc Very true

Str To go against the laws which are based upon long experience and the wisdom of counsellors who have graciously recommended them and persuaded the multitude to pass them would be a far greater and more ruinous error than any adherence to written law?

Y Soc Certainly

Str Therefore as there is a danger of this, the next best thing in legislating is not to allow either the individual or the multitude to break the law in any respect whatever

Y Soc True

Str The laws would be copies of the true particulars of action as far as they admit of being written down from the lips of those who have knowledge?

Y Soc Certainly they would

Str And as we were saying he who has knowledge and is a true Statesman will do many things within his own sphere of action by his art without regard to the laws when he is of opinion that something other than that which he has written down and enjoined to be observed during his absence would be better

Y Soc Yes we said so

Str And any individual or any number of

Y Soc Far superior

Str And the science which determines wheth we ought to persuade or not, must be superior the science which is able to persuade?

Y Soc Of course.

Str Very good and to what science do we as gn the power of persuading a multitude by a easing tale and not by teaching?

Y Soc That pov er I think, must clearly be signed to rhetoric.

Str And to what science do we give the pow r of determining whether we are to employ ersuasion or force towards any one or to re rain altogether?

Y Soc To that science wh ch governs the rts of speech and persuasion

Str Which, if I am not mistaken, will be politics?

Y Soc Very good.

Str Rhetoric seems to be qui kly distin guished from politics, being a different species, yet ministering to it.

Y Soc Yes

Str But what would you think of another sort of power or science?

Y Soc What science?

Str The science which has to do with mili tary operations against our enemies—is that to be regarded as a science or not

Y Soc Hov can generalship and military tactics be regarded as other than a science?

Str And is the art which is able and knov s ho to advise v hen we are to go to war or to make peace the same as this or different?

Y Soc If we are to be consistent, we must say different

[305] Str And we must also suppose that this rules the other I we are not to g ve up our former notion?

Y Soc True

Str And, considering hov great and ter ble the whole art of ar is, can v e imagine any which is superio to it but the truly royal?

Y Soc No other

St The art of the general is only min sterial and therefore not po lit cal?

Y Soc Exactly

St Once more l t us c ns der the nature of the righteous judge

Y Soc V ry good

St Does he do anything, but dec de the dealings of m n w th one another to be just or un just n accordance w th the standard which he recei es from the king and legislator—showing h s own pecul a v rtue only n th s, that he is not perverted by gifts, or fears, or p ty or by any sort of favour or enmity into deciding the suits of men with one another contrary to the appointment of the legislator?

Y Soc No his office is such as you describe.

Str Then the inference is that the power of the judge is not royal but only the power of a guardian of the law which ministers to the royal po ver?

Y Soc True

Str The revie of all these sciences shows that none of them is political or royal For the truly royal ought not itself to act but to rule over those who are able to act the king ought to know what is and what is not a fitting opportunity for taking the initiative in matters of the greatest importance, whilst others should execute his orders.

Y Soc True.

Str And, therefore, the arts which we have described, as they have no authority over themselves or one another but are each of them con cerned with some special action of their own, have, as they ought to have, special names cor responding to their several actions.

Y Soc I agree.

Str And the sc ence v hich is over them all and has charge of the laws, and of all matters af fecting the State, and truly weaves them all in to one if we v ould describe under a name char acteristic of their common nature, most truly v e may call politics

Y Soc Exactly so

Str Then now that we have discovered the various classes in a State shall I analyse poli tics after the pattern which weaving supplied?

[306] Y Soc I greatly wish that you would

Str Then I must describe the nature of the royal eb and show how the various threads are woven into one piece.

Y Soc Clearly

Str A task has to be accomplished v hich al though d fficult, appears to be necessary

Y Soc Certainly the attempt must be made.

St To a sume that one part of virtue differs in kind from another is a position easily assailable by contentious disputants v ho appeal to popular opinion

Y Soc I do not understand

Str Let me put the matter in another way I suppose that you would consider courage to be a part of virtue?

Y Soc Certainly I should.

Str And you ould think temperance to be different from courage and likev ise to be a part of virtue?

CL 287-90 303-5

Y Soc How would you make the division?

Str Monarchy divides into royalty and tyr anny the rule of the few into aristocracy which has an auspicious name and oligarchy and democracy or the rule of the many which before was one must now be divided

Y Soc On what principle of division?

Str On the same principle as before although the name is now discovered to have a twofold meaning For the distinction of ruling with law or without law applies to this as well as to the rest

Y Soc Yes

Str The division made no difference when we were looking for the perfect State as we showed before But now that this has been sepa rated off and as we said the others alone are left for us the principle of law and the absence of law will bisect them all

Y Soc That would seem to follow from what has been said

Str Then monarchy, when bound by good prescriptions or laws is the best of all the six and when lawless is the most bitter and op pressive to the subject

Y Soc True

[303] Str The government of the few which is intermediate between that of the one and many is also intermediate in good and evil but the government of the many is in every re spect weak and unable to do either any great good or any great evil when compared with the others because the offices are too minutely subdivided and too many hold them And this therefore is the worst of all lawful governments and the best of all lawless ones If they are all without the restraints of law democracy is the form in which to live is best if they are well ordered then this is the last which you should choose as royalty the first form is the best with the exception of the seventh for that excels them all and is among States what God is among men

Y Soc You are quite right and we should choose that above all

Str The members of all these States with the exception of the one which has knowledge may be set aside as being not Statesmen but par tisans—upholders of the most monstrous idols and themselves idols and being the greatest imitators and magicians they are also the great est of Sophists

Y Soc The name of Sophist after many wind ings in the argument appears to have been most justly fixed upon the politicians as they are termed

Str And so our satyric drama has been played out and the troop of Centaurs and Sat yrs however unwilling to leave the stage have at last been separated from the political scien e.

Y Soc So I perceive

Str There remain however natures still more troublesome because they are more nearly akin to the king and more difficult to discern the examination of them may be compared to the process of refining gold

Y Soc What is your meaning?

Str The workmen begin by sifting away the earth and stones and the like there remain in a confused mass the valuable elements akin to gold which can only be separated by fire—cop per silver and other precious metals these are at last refined away by the use of tests, until the gold is left quite pure

Y Soc Yes that is the way in which these things are said to be done

Str In like manner all alien and uncongenial matter has been separated from political sci ence and what is precious and of a kindred na ture has been left there remain the nobler arts of the general and the judge and the higher sort of oratory which is an ally of the royal art [304] and persuades men to do justice and assists in guiding the helm of States —How can we best clear away all these leaving him whom we seek alone and unalloyed?

Y Soc That is obviously what has in some way to be attempted

Str If the attempt is all that is wanting he shall certainly be brought to light and I think that the illustration of music may assist in ex hibiting him Please to answer me a question

Y Soc What question?

Str There is such a thing as learning music or handicraft arts in general?

Y Soc There is

Str And is there any higher art or science having power to decide which of these arts are and are not to be learned —what do you say?

Y Soc I should answer that there is

Str And do we acknowledge this science to be different from the others?

Y Soc Yes

Str And ought the other sciences to be su perior to this or no single science to any oth er? Or ought this science to be the overseer and governor of all the others?

Y Soc The latter

Str You mean to say that the science which judges whether we ought to learn or not, must be superior to the science which is learned or which teaches?

Str. And now think of what happens with the more courageous natures. Are they not always inciting their country to go to war, owing to their excessive love of the military life? they raise up enemies against themselves many and mighty, and either utterly ruin their native land or enslave and subject it to its foes?

Y. Soc. That, again, is true.

Str. Must we not admit, then, that where these two classes exist, they always feel the greatest antipathy and antagonism towards one another?

Y. Soc. We cannot deny it.

Str. And returning to the enquiry with which we began, have we not found that considerable portions of virtue are at variance with one another, and give rise to a similar opposition in the characters who are endowed with them?

Y. Soc. True.

Str. Let us consider a further point.

Y. Soc. What is it?

Str. I want to know whether any constructive art will make any, even the most trivial thing, out of bad and good materials indifferently, if this can be helped? does not all art rather reject the bad as far as possible, and accept the good and fit materials, and from these elements, whether like or unlike, gathering them all into one, work out some nature or idea?

Y. Soc. To be sure.

Str. Then the true and natural art of statesmanship will never allow any State to be formed by a combination of good and bad men, if this can be avoided; but will begin by testing human natures in play, and after testing them, will entrust them to proper teachers who are the ministers of her purposes—she will herself give orders, and maintain authority; just as the art of weaving continually gives orders and maintains authority over the carders and all the others who prepare the material for the work, commanding the subsidiary arts to execute the works which she deems necessary for making the web.

Y. Soc. Quite true.

Str. In like manner, the royal science appears to me to be the mistress of all lawful educators and instructors, and having this queenly power, will not permit them to train men in what will produce characters unsuited to the political constitution which she desires to create, but only in what will produce such as are suitable. Those which have no share of manliness and temperance, or any other virtuous inclination, and, from the necessity of an evil nature, are violently carried away to godlessness and insolence and injustice, she gets rid of by death and exile, and punishes them with the greatest of disgraces.

Y. Soc. That is commonly said.

[309] Str. But those who are wallowing in ignorance and baseness she bows under the yoke of slavery.

Y. Soc. Quite right.

Str. The rest of the citizens, out of whom, if they have education, something noble may be made, and who are capable of being united by the Statesman, the kingly art blends and weaves together; taking on the one hand those whose natures tend rather to courage, which is the stronger element and may be regarded as the warp, and on the other hand those which incline to order and gentleness, and which are represented in the figure as spun thick and soft, after the manner of the woof—these, which are naturally opposed, she seeks to bind and weave together in the following manner:

Y. Soc. In what manner?

Str. First of all, she takes the eternal element of the soul and binds it with a divine cord, to which it is akin, and then the animal nature, and binds that with human cords.

Y. Soc. I do not understand what you mean.

Str. The meaning is, that the opinion about the honourable and the just and good and their opposites, which is true and confirmed by reason, is a divine principle, and when implanted in the soul, is implanted, as I maintain, in a nature of heavenly birth.

Y. Soc. Yes; what else should it be?

Str. Only the Statesman and the good legislator, having the inspiration of the royal muse, can implant this opinion, and he, only in the rightly educated, whom we were just now describing.

Y. Soc. Likely enough.

Str. But him who cannot, we will not designate by any of the names which are the subject of the present enquiry.

Y. Soc. Very right.

Str. The courageous soul when attaining this truth becomes civilized, and rendered more capable of partaking of justice; but when not partaking, is inclined to brutality. Is not that true?

Y. Soc. Certainly.

Str. And again, the peaceful and orderly nature, if sharing in these opinions, becomes temperate and wise, as far as this may be in a State, but if not, deservedly obtains the ignominious name of silliness.

Y Soc True

Str I shall venture to put forward a strange theory about them

Y Soc What is it?

Str That they are two principles which thoroughly hate one another and are antagonistic throughout a great part of nature

Y Soc How singular!

Str Yes very—for all the parts of virtue are commonly said to be friendly to one another

Y Soc Yes

Str Then let us carefully investigate whether this is universally true or whether there are not parts of virtue which are at war with their kindred in some respect

Y Soc Tell me how we shall consider that question

Str We must extend our enquiry to all those things which we consider beautiful and at the same time place in two opposite classes

Y Soc Explain what are they?

Str Acuteness and quickness whether in body or soul or in the movement of sound and the imitations of them which painting and music supply you must have praised yourself before now, or been present when others praised them

Y Soc Certainly

Str And do you remember the terms in which they are praised?

Y Soc I do not

Str I wonder whether I can explain to you in words the thought which is passing in my mind

Y Soc Why not?

Str You fancy that this is all so easy Well let us consider these notions with reference to the opposite classes of action under which they fall When we praise quickness and energy and acuteness whether of mind or body or sound we express our praise of the quality which we admire by one word, and that one word is manliness or courage

Y Soc How?

Str We speak of an action as energetic and brave, quick and manly and vigorous too and when we apply the name of which I speak as the common attribute of all these natures we certainly praise them

[307] Y Soc True

Str And do we not often praise the quiet strain of action also?

Y Soc To be sure

Str And do we not then say the opposite of what we said of the other?

Y Soc How do you mean?

Str We exclaim How calm! How temperate! in admiration of the slow and quiet working of the intellect and of steadiness and gentleness in action of smoothness and depth of voice and of all rhythmical movement and of music in general when these have a proper solemnity Of all such actions we predicate not courage, but a name indicative of order

Y Soc Very true.

Str But when on the other hand either of these is out of place the names of either are changed into terms of censure

Y Soc How so?

Str Too great sharpness or quickness or hardness is termed violence or madness too great slowness or gentleness is called cowardice or sluggishness and we may observe that for the most part these qualities and the temperance and manliness of the opposite characters are arrayed as enemies on opposite sides and do not mingle with one another in their respective actions and if we pursue the enquiry we shall find that men who have these different qualities of mind differ from one another

Y Soc In what respect?

Str In respect of all the qualities which I mentioned and very likely of many others According to their respective affinities to either class of actions they distribute praise and blame —praise to the actions which are akin to their own blame to those of the opposite party—and out of this many quarrels and occasions of quarrel arise among them

Y Soc True

Str The difference between the two classes is often a trivial concern but in a state and when affecting really important matters becomes of all disorders the most hateful

Y Soc To what do you refer?

Str To nothing short of the whole regulation of human life For the orderly class are always ready to lead a peaceful life, quietly doing their own business this is their manner of behaving with all men at home and they are equally ready to find some way of keeping the peace with foreign States And on account of this fondness of theirs for peace which is often out of season where their influence prevails they become by degrees unwarlike and bring up their young men to be like themselves they are at the mercy of their enemies whence in a few years they and their children and the whole city often pass imperceptibly from the condition of freemen into that of slaves

[308] Y Soc What a cruel fate!

Str. And now think of what happens with the more courageous natures. Are they not always inciting their country to go to war, owing to their excessive love of the military life? they raise up enemies against themselves many and mighty, and either utterly ruin their native land or enslave and subject it to its foes?

Y. Soc. That, again, is true.

Str. Must we not admit, then, that where these two classes exist, they always feel the greatest antipathy and antagonism towards one another?

Y. Soc. We cannot deny it.

Str. And returning to the enquiry with which we began, have we not found that considerable portions of virtue are at variance with one another, and give rise to a similar opposition in the characters who are endowed with them?

Y. Soc. True.

Str. Let us consider a further point.

Y. Soc. What is it?

Str. I want to know whether any constructive art will make any, even the most trivial thing, out of bad and good materials indifferently, if this can be helped? does not all art rather reject the bad as far as possible, and accept the good and fit materials, and from these elements, whether like or unlike, gathering them all into one, work out some nature or idea?

Y. Soc. To be sure.

Str. Then the true and natural art of statesmanship will never allow any State to be formed by a combination of good and bad men, if this can be avoided; but will begin by testing human natures in play, and after testing them, will entrust them to proper teachers who are the ministers of her purposes—she will herself give orders, and maintain authority; just as the art of weaving continually gives orders and maintains authority over the carders and all the others who prepare the material for the work, commanding the subsidiary arts to execute the works which she deems necessary for making the web.

Y. Soc. Certainly.

Str. And again, the peaceful and orderly nature, if sharing in these opinions, becomes temperate and wise, as far as this may be in a State, but if not, deservedly obtains the ignominious name of silliness.

Y Soc Quite true

Str Can we say that such a connection as this will lastingly unite the evil with one another or with the good or that any science would seriously think of using a bond of this kind to join such materials?

Y Soc Impossible

[310] Str But in those who were originally of a noble nature and who have been nurtured in noble ways and in those only may we not say that union is implanted by law and that this is the medicine which art prescribes for them, and of all the bonds which unite the dissimilar and contrary parts of virtue is not this, as I was saying the divinest?

Y Soc Very true

Str Where this divine bond exists there is no difficulty in imagining or when you have imagined in creating the other bonds which are human only

Y Soc How is that and what bonds do you mean?

Str Rights of intermarriage and ties which are formed between States by giving and taking children in marriage or between individuals by private betrothals and espousals For most persons form marriage connections without due regard to what is best for the procreation of children

Y Soc In what way?

Str They seek after wealth and power which in matrimony are objects not worthy even of a serious censure

Y Soc There is no need to consider them at all

Str More reason is there to consider the practice of those who make family their chief aim and to indicate their error

Y Soc Quite true

Str They act on no true principle at all they seek their ease and receive with open arms those who are like themselves and hate those who are unlike them being too much influenced by feelings of dislike

Y Soc How so?

Str The quiet orderly class seek for natures like their own and as far as they can they marry and give in marriage exclusively in this class and the courageous do the same they seek natures like their own whereas they should both do precisely the opposite

Y Soc How and why is that?

Str Because courage when untempered by the gentler nature during many generations may at first bloom and strengthen but at last bursts forth into downright madness

Y Soc Like enough

Str And then, again the soul which is over full of modesty and has no element of courage in many successive generations is apt to grow too indolent and at last to become utterly paralyzed and useless

Y Soc That again is quite likely

Str It was of these bonds I said that there would be no difficulty in creating them if only both classes originally held the same opinion about the honourable and good —indeed in this single work the whole process of royal weaving is comprised—never to allow temperate natures to be separated from the brave but to weave them together like the warp and the woof by common sentiments and honours and reputation [311] and by the giving of pledges to one another and out of them forming one smooth and even web to entrust to them the offices of State

Y Soc How do you mean?

Str Where one officer only is needed you must choose a ruler who has both these qualities —when many you must mingle some of each for the temperate ruler is very careful and just and safe but is wanting in thoroughness and go

Y Soc Certainly that is very true

Str The character of the courageous on the other hand falls short of the former in justice and caution but has the power of action in a remarkable degree and where either of these two qualities is wanting there cities cannot altogether prosper either in their public or private life

Y Soc Certainly they cannot

Str This then we declare to be the completion of the web of political action which is created by a direct intertexture of the brave and temperate natures whenever the royal science has drawn the two minds into communion with one another by unanimity and friendship and having perfected the noblest and best of all the webs which political life admits and enfolding therein all other inhabitants of cities whether slaves or freemen binds them in one fabric and governs and presides over them and in so far as to be happy is vouchsafed to a city in no particular fails to secure their happiness

Y Soc Your picture Stranger of the king and statesman no less than of the Sophist is quite perfect.

PHILEBUS

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE Socrates Protarchus Philebus

[11] Socrates OBSERVE, Protarchus, the nature of the position which you are now going to take from Philebus and what the other position is which I maintain and which, if you do not approve of it, is to be controverted by you Shall you and I sum up the two sides?

Protarchus By all means.

Soc Philebus was saying that enjoyment and pleasure and delight, and the class of feelings akin to them, are a good to every living being whereas I contend, that not these, but wisdom and intelligence and memory and their kindred, right opinion and true reasoning are better and more desirable than pleasure for all who are able to partake of them, and that to all such who are or ever will be they are the most advantageous of all things. Have I not given Philebus, a fair statement of the two sides of the argument?

Philebus Nothing could be fairer Socrates.

Soc And do you, Protarchus, accept the position which is assigned to you?

Pro I cannot do otherwise, since our excellent Philebus has left the field

Soc Surely the truth about these matters ought, by all means, to be ascertained

Pro Certainly

Soc Shall we further agree—

Pro To what

Soc That you and I must now try to indicate some state and disposition of the soul which has the property of making all men happy

Pro Yes, by all means.

Soc And you say that pleasure, and I say that wisdom, is such a state?

Pro True

Soc And what if there be a third state, which is better than either? Then both of us are vanquished—are we not? But if this life, which really has the power of making men happy turn out to be more akin to pleasure than to wisdom the life of pleasure may still have the advantage over the life of wisdom [12]

Pro True.

Soc Or suppose that the better life is more nearly allied to wisdom, then wisdom conquers, and pleasure is defeated —do you agree?

Pro Certainly

Soc And what do you say Philebus?

Phi I say and shall always say that pleasure is easily the conqueror but you must decide for yourself Protarchus.

Pro You, Philebus, have handed over the argument to me, and have no longer a voice in the matter?

Phi True enough. Nevertheless I would clear myself and deliver my soul of you and I call the goddess herself to witness that I now do so

Pro You may appeal to us we too will be the witnesses of your words And now Socrates, whether Philebus is pleased or displeased we will proceed with the argument.

Soc Then let us begin with the goddess herself, of whom Philebus says that she is called Aphrodite, but that her real name is Pleasure.

Pro Very good

Soc The awe which I always feel Protarchus, about the names of the gods is more than human—it exceeds all other fears And now I would not sin against Aphrodite by naming her amiss let her be called what she pleases. But Pleasure I know to be manifold and with her as I was just now saying, we must begin, and consider what her nature is She has one name and therefore you would imagine that she is one and yet surely she takes the most varied and even unlike forms For do we not say that the intemperate has pleasure and that the temperate has pleasure in his very temperance—that the fool is pleased when he is full of foolish fancies and hopes and that the wise man has pleasure in his wisdom? and how foolish would any one be who affirmed that all these opposite pleasures are severally alike!

Pro Why Socrates they are opposed in so far as they spring from opposite sources but they are not in themselves opposite For must not pleasure be of all things most absolutely like pleasure—that is like himself?

Soc Yes my good friend, just as colour is like colour —in so far as colours are colours there is no difference between them and yet we all know that black is not only unlike but even absolutely opposed to white or again as figure is like figure for all figures are comprehended under one class and yet particular figures may be absolutely opposed to one another [13] and there is an infinite diversity of them And we might find similar examples in many other things therefore do not rely upon this argument which would go to prove the unity of the most extreme opposites And I suspect that we shall find a similar opposition among pleasures

Pro Very likely but how will this invalidate the argument?

Soc Why I shall reply that dissimilar as they are you apply to them a new predicate for you say that all pleasant things are good now although no one can argue that pleasure is not pleasure, he may argue as we are doing that pleasures are oftener bad than good but you call them all good and at the same time are compelled if you are pressed to acknowledge that they are unlike And so you must tell us what is the identical quality existing alike in good and bad pleasures which makes you designate all of them as good Pro What do you mean Socrates? Do you think that any one who asserts pleasure to be the good will tolerate the notion that some pleasures are good and others bad?

Soc And yet you will acknowledge that they are different from one another and sometimes opposed?

Pro Not in so far as they are pleasures

Soc That is a return to the old position Protarchus and so we are to say (are we?) that there is no difference in pleasures but that they are all alike and the examples which have just been cited do not pierce our dull minds but we go on arguing all the same like the weakest and most inexperienced reasoners?

Pro What do you mean?

Soc Why I mean to say that in self-defence I may if I like follow your example and assert boldly that the two things most unlike are most absolutely alike and the result will be that you and I will prove ourselves to be very tyros in the art of disputing and the argument will be blown away and lost Suppose that we put back and return to the old position then perhaps we may come to an understanding with one another

Pro How do you mean?

Soc Shall I Protarchus have my own question asked of me by you?

Pro What question?

Soc Ask me whether wisdom and science and mind and those other qualities which I when asked by you at first what is the nature of the good affirmed to be good are not in the same case with the pleasures of which you spoke

Pro What do you mean?

Soc The sciences are a numerous class and will be found to present great differences But even admitting that like the pleasures they are opposite as well as different [14] should I be worthy of the name of dialectician if in order to avoid this difficulty I were to say (as you are saying of pleasure) that there is no difference between one science and another —would not the argument founder and disappear like an idle tale although we might ourselves escape drowning by clinging to a fallacy?

Pro May none of this befall us except the deliverance! Yet I like the even handed justice which is applied to both our arguments Let us assume, then that there are many and diverse pleasures and many and different sciences

Soc And let us have no concealment Protarchus of the differences between my good and yours but let us bring them to the light in the hope that in the process of testing them, they may show whether pleasure is to be called the good or wisdom or some third quality for surely we are not now simply contending in order that my view or that yours may prevail but I presume that we ought both of us to be fighting for the truth

Pro Certainly we ought.

Soc Then let us have a more definite understanding and establish the principle on which the argument rests

Pro What principle?

Soc. A principle about which all men are always in a difficulty, and some men sometimes against their will.

Pro. Speak plainer.

Soc. The principle which has just turned up, which is a marvel of nature; for that one should be many or many one, are wonderful propositions; and he who affirms either is very open to attack.

Pro. Do you mean, when a person says that I, Protarchus, am by nature one and also many, dividing the single "me" into many "me's," and even opposing them as great and small, light and heavy, and in ten thousand other ways?

Soc. Those, Protarchus, are the common and acknowledged paradoxes about the one and many, which I may say that everybody has by this time agreed to dismiss as childish and obvious and detrimental to the true course of thought; and no more favour is shown to that other puzzle, in which a person proves the members and parts of anything to be divided, and then confessing that they are all one, says laughingly in disproof of his own words: Why, here is a miracle, the one is many and infinite, and the many are only one.

Pro. But what, Socrates, are those other marvels connected with this subject which, as you imply, have not yet become common and acknowledged? [15]

Soc. When, my boy, the one does not belong to the class of things that are born and perish, as in the instances which we were giving, for in those cases, and when unity is of this concrete nature, there is, as I was saying, a universal consent that no refutation is needed; but when the assertion is made that man is one, or ox is one, or beauty one, or the good one, then the interest which attaches to these and similar unities and the attempt which is made to divide them gives birth to a controversy.

Pro. Of what nature?

Soc. In the first place, as to whether these unities have a real existence; and then how each individual unity, being always the same, and incapable either of generation or of destruction, but retaining a permanent individuality, can be conceived either as dispersed and multiplied in the infinity of the world of generation, or as still entire and yet divided from itself, which latter would seem to be the greatest impossibility of all, for how can one and the same thing be at the same time in one and in many things? These, Protarchus, are the real difficulties, and this is the one and many to which they relate; they are the source of great perplexity if ill decided, and the right determination of them is very helpful.

Pro. Then, Socrates, let us begin by clearing up these questions.

Soc. That is what I should wish.

Pro. And I am sure that all my other friends will be glad to hear them discussed; Philebus, fortunately for us, is not disposed to move, and we had better not stir him up with questions.

Soc. Good; and where shall we begin this great and multifarious battle, in which such various points are at issue? Shall we begin thus?

Pro. How?

Soc. We say that the one and many become identified by thought, and that now, as in time past, they run about together, in and out of every word which is uttered, and that this union of them will never cease, and is not now beginning, but is, as I believe, an everlasting quality of thought itself which never grows old. Any young man, when he first tastes these subtleties, is delighted, and fancies that he has found a treasure of wisdom; in the first enthusiasm of his joy he leaves no stone, or rather no thought unturned, now rolling up the many into the one, and kneading them together, now unfolding and dividing them; he puzzles himself first and above all, and then he proceeds to puzzle his neighbours, whether they are older or younger [16] or of his own age—that makes no difference; neither father nor mother does he spare; no human being who has ears is safe from him, hardly even his dog, and a barbarian would have no chance of escaping him, if an interpreter could only be found.

Pro. Considering, Socrates, how many we are, and that all of us are young men, is there not a danger that we and Philebus may all set upon you, if you abuse us? We understand what you mean; but is there no charm by which we may dispel all this confusion, no more excellent way of arriving at the truth? If there is, we hope that you will guide us into that way, and we will do our best to follow, for the enquiry in which we are engaged, Socrates, is not unimportant.

Soc. The reverse of unimportant, my boys, as Philebus calls you, and there neither is nor ever will be a better than my own favourite way, which has nevertheless already often deserted me and left me helpless in the hour of need.

Pro. Tell us what that is.

Soc. One which may be easily pointed out, but is by no means easy of application; it is the

and consider what her nature is She has one name and therefore you would imagine that she is one and yet surely she takes the most varied and even unlike forms For do we not say that the intemperate has pleasure and that the temperate has pleasure in his very temperance—that the fool is pleased when he is full of foolish fancies and hopes and that the wise man has pleasure in his wisdom? and how foolish would any one be who affirmed that all these opposite pleasures are severally alike!

Pro How do you mean?

Soc Shall I Protarchus have my own question asked of me by you?

Pro What question?

Soc Ask me whether wisdom and science and mind and those other qualities which I when asked by you at first what is the nature of the good affirmed to be good are not in the same case with the pleasures of which you spoke

Pro Certainly we ought

Soc Then let us have a more definite understanding and establish the principle on which the argument rests

Pro What principle?

Egyptian legend is said to have been Theuth observing that the human voice was infinite first distinguished in this infinity a certain number of vowels, and then other letters which had sound, but were not pure vowels (i e., the semivowels) these too exist in a definite number and lastly he distinguished a third class of letters which we now call mutes, without voice and without sound, and divided these, and likewise the two other classes of vowels and semivowels, into the individual sounds and told the number of them and gave to each and all of them the name of letters and observing that none of us could learn any one of them and not learn them all and in consideration of this common bond which in a manner united them he assigned to them all a single art, and this he called the art of grammar or letters

Phi The illustration, Protarchus, has assisted me in understanding the original statement but I still feel the defect of which I just now complained

Soc Are you going to ask, Philebus, what this has to do with the argument?

Phi Yes that is a question which Protarchus and I have been long asking

Soc Assuredly you have already arrived at the answer to the question which as you say you have been so long asking?

Phi How so?

Soc Did we not begin by enquiring into the comparative eligibility of pleasure and wisdom?

Phi Certainly

Soc And we maintain that they are each of them one?

Phi True.

Soc And the precise question to which the previous discussion desires an answer is how they are one and also many [i.e. how they have one genus and many species] and are not at once infinite, and what number of species is to be assigned to either of them before they pass into infinity

[19] Pro That is a very serious question, Philebus, to which Socrates has ingeniously brought us round, and please to consider which of us shall answer him there may be something ridiculous in my being unable to answer and therefore imposing the task upon you when I have undertaken the whole charge of the argument, but if neither of us were able to answer the result methinks would be still more ridiculous Let us consider then what we are to do —Socrates, if I understood him rightly is asking whether there are not kinds of pleasure, and what is the number and nature of them and the same of wisdom

Soc Most true O son of Callias and the previous argument showed that if we are not able to tell the kinds of everything that has unity likeness, sameness, or their opposites, none of us will be of the smallest use in any enquiry

Pro That seems to be very near the truth Socrates Happy would the wise man be if he knew all things and the next best thing for him is that he should know himself Why do I say so at this moment? I will tell you You Socrates, have granted us this opportunity of conversing with you, and are ready to assist us in determining what is the best of human goods For when Philebus said that pleasure and delight and enjoyment and the like were the chief good you answered—No not those but another class of goods and we are constantly reminding ourselves of what you said and very properly in order that we may not forget to examine and compare the two And these goods which in your opinion are to be designated as superior to pleasure and are the true objects of pursuit, are mind and knowledge and understanding and art and the like There was a dispute about which were the best and we playfully threatened that you should not be allowed to go home until the question was settled and you agreed and placed yourself at our disposal And now as children say what has been fairly given cannot be taken back cease then to fight against us in this way

Soc In what way?

[20] Phi Do not perplex us and keep asking questions of us to which we have not as yet any sufficient answer to give let us not imagine that a general puzzling of us all is to be the end of our discussion, but if we are unable to answer do you answer as you have promised Consider then, whether you will divide pleasure and knowledge according to their kinds or you may let the matter drop if you are able and willing to find some other mode of clearing up our controversy

Soc If you say that I have nothing to apprehend for the words "if you are willing dispel all my fear and moreover a god seems to have recalled something to my mind

Phi What is that?

Soc I remember to have heard long ago certain discussions about pleasure and wisdom whether awake or in a dream I cannot tell they were to the effect that neither the one nor the other of them was the good but some third thing which was different from them and better than either If this be clearly established parent of all the discoveries in the arts

Pro Tell us what it is

Soc A gift of heaven which as I conceive the gods tossed among men by the hands of a new Prometheus and therewith a blaze of light and the ancients who were our betters and nearer the gods than we are handed down the tradition that whatever things are said to be are composed of one and many and have the finite and infinite implanted in them seeing then that such is the order of the world we too ought in every enquiry to begin by laying down one idea of that which is the subject of enquiry this unity we shall find in everything Having found it we may next proceed to look for two if there be two or, if not then for three or some other number subdividing each of these units until at last the unity with which we began is seen not only to be one and many and infinite but also a definite number the infinite must not be suffered to approach the many until the entire number of the species intermediate between unity and infinity has been discovered—then and not till then we may rest from division and without further troubling ourselves about the endless individuals may allow them to drop into infinity This as I was saying is the way of considering and learning and teaching one another which the gods have handed down to us [17] But the wise men of our time are either too quick or too slow in conceiving plurality in unity Having no method they make their one and many anyhow and from unity pass at once to infinity the intermediate steps never occur to them And this I repeat is what makes the difference between the mere art of disputation and true dialectic

Pro I think that I partly understand you Socrates but I should like to have a clearer notion of what you are saying

Soc I may illustrate my meaning by the letters of the alphabet Protarchus which you were made to learn as a child

Pro How do they afford an illustration?

Soc The sound which passes through the lips whether of an individual or of all men is one and yet infinite

Pro Very true

Soc And yet not by knowing either that sound is one or that sound is infinite are we perfect in the art of speech but the knowledge of the number and nature of sounds is what makes a man a grammarian

Pro Very true.

Soc And the knowledge which makes a man a musician is of the same kind

Pro How so?

Soc Sound is one in music as well as in grammar?

Pro Certainly

Soc And there is a higher note and a lower note and a note of equal pitch —may we affirm so much?

Pro Yes

Soc But you would not be a real musician if this was all that you knew though if you did not know this you would know almost nothing of music

Pro Nothing

Soc But when you have learned what sounds are high and what low and the number and nature of the intervals and their limits or proportions and the systems compounded out of them which our fathers discovered and have handed down to us who are their descendants under the name of harmonies and the affections corresponding to them in the movements of the human body which when measured by numbers ought as they say to be called rhythms and measures and they tell us that the same principle should be applied to every one and many —when I say you have learned all this, then my dear friend you are perfect and you may be said to understand any other subject when you have a similar grasp of it But the infinity of kinds and the infinity of individuals which there is in each of them when not classified creates in every one of us a state of infinite ignorance and he who never looks for number in anything will not himself be looked for in the number of famous men

[18] Pro I think that what Socrates is now saying is excellent Philebus

Phi I think so too but how do his words bear upon us and upon the argument?

Soc Philebus is right in asking that question of us Protarchus

Pro Indeed he is and you must answer him

Soc I will but you must let me make one little remark first about these matters I was saying that he who begins with any individual unity should proceed from that not to infinity but to a definite number and now I say conversely that he who has to begin with infinity should not jump to unity but he should look about for some number representing a certain quantity and thus out of all end in one And now let us return for an illustration of our principle to the case of letters

Pro What do you mean?

Soc Some god or divine man who in the chosen contrary to the nature of the truly eligible, and not of his own free will but either through ignorance or from some unhappy necessity

Pro Certainly that seems to be true.

Soc And now have I not sufficiently shown that Philebus goddess is not to be regarded as identical with the good?

Phi Neither is your "mind" the good, Socrates, for that will be open to the same objections.

Soc Perhaps, Philebus, you may be right in saying so of my mind but of the true, which is also the divine mind, far otherwise However I will not at present claim the first place for mind as against the mixed life but we must come to some understanding about the second place. For you might affirm pleasure and I mind to be the cause of the mixed life and in that case although neither of them would be the good, one of them might be imagined to be the cause of the good And I might proceed further to argue in opposition to Philebus, that the element which makes this mixed life eligible and good, is more akin and more similar to mind than to pleasure. And if this is true, pleasure cannot be truly said to share either in the first or second place and does not, if I may trust my own mind attain even to the third

Pro Truly Socrates, pleasure appears to me to have had a fall in fighting for the palm [23] she has been smitten by the argument, and is laid low I must say that mind would have fallen too, and may therefore be thought to show discretion in not putting forward a similar claim. And if pleasure were deprived not only of the first but of the second place she would be terribly damaged in the eyes of her admirers, for not even to them would she still appear as fair as before.

Soc Well but had we not better leave her now and not pain her by applying the crucial test, and finally detecting her?

Pro Nonsense, Socrates.

Soc Why? because I said that we had better not pain pleasure, which is an impossibility?

Pro Yes, and more than that, because you do not seem to be aware that none of us will let you go home until you have finished the argument.

Soc Heavens! Protarchus, that will be a tedious business, and just at present not at all an easy one. For in going to war in the cause of mind, who is aspiring to the second prize, I ought to have weapons of another make from those which I used before some, however of the old ones may do again And must I then finish the argument?

Pro Of course you must

Soc Let us be very careful in laying the foundation

Pro What do you mean?

Soc Let us divide all existing things into two, or rather if you do not object, into three classes.

Pro Upon what principle would you make the division?

Soc Let us take some of our newly found notions.

Pro Which of them?

Soc Were we not saying that God revealed a finite element of existence and also an infinite?

Pro Certainly

Soc Let us assume these two principles, and also a third, which is compounded out of them but I fear that I am ridiculously clumsy at these processes of division and enumeration.

Pro What do you mean my good friend?

Soc I say that a fourth class is still wanted.

Pro What will that be?

Soc Find the cause of the third or compound and add this as a fourth class to the three others.

Pro And would you like to have a fifth class or cause of resolution as well as a cause of composition?

Soc Not, I think, at present but if I want a fifth at some future time you shall allow me to have it.

Pro Certainly

Soc Let us begin with the first three and as we find two out of the three greatly divided and dispersed let us endeavour to reunite them, and see how in each of them there is a one and many [24] Pro If you would explain to me a little more about them perhaps I might be able to follow you.

Soc Well the two classes are the same which I mentioned before, one the finite, and the other the infinite I will first show that the infinite is in a certain sense many and the finite may be hereafter discussed

Pro I agree.

Soc And now consider well for the question to which I invite your attention is difficult and controverted When you speak of hotter and colder can you conceive any limit in those qualities? Does not the more and less, which dwells in their very nature, prevent their having any end? for if they had an end the more and less would themselves have an end then pleasure will lose the victory for the good will cease to be identified with her —Am I not right?

Pro Yes

Soc And there will cease to be any need of distinguishing the kinds of pleasures as I am inclined to think, but this will appear more clearly as we proceed

Pro Capital Socrates pray go on as you propose

Soc But let us first agree on some little points

Pro What are they?

Soc Is the good perfect or imperfect?

Pro The most perfect Socrates of all things

Soc And is the good sufficient?

Pro Yes, certainly and in a degree surpassing all other things

Soc And no one can deny that all percipient beings desire and hunt after good and are eager to catch and have the good about them and care not for the attainment of anything which is not accompanied by good

Pro That is undeniable

Soc Now let us part off the life of pleasure from the life of wisdom and pass them in review

Pro How do you mean?

Soc Let there be no wisdom in the life of pleasure nor any pleasure in the life of wisdom, for if either of them is the chief good it cannot be supposed to want anything but if either is shown to want anything then it cannot really be the chief good

[21] Pro Impossible

Soc And will you help us to test these two lives?

Pro Certainly

Soc Then answer

Pro Ask

Soc Would you choose Protarchus to live all your life long in the enjoyment of the greatest pleasures?

Pro Certainly I should

Soc Would you consider that there was still anything wanting to you if you had perfect pleasure?

Pro Certainly not

Soc Reflect would you not want wisdom and intelligence and forethought and similar qualities? would you not at any rate want sight?

Pro Why should I? Having pleasure I should have all things

Soc Living thus you would always throughout your life enjoy the greatest pleasures?

Pro I should

Soc But if you had neither mind nor memory, nor knowledge nor true opinion you would in the first place be utterly ignorant of whether you were pleased or not because you would be entirely devoid of intelligence

Pro Certainly

Soc And similarly if you had no memory you would not recollect that you had ever been pleased nor would the slightest recollection of the pleasure which you feel at any moment remain with you and if you had no true opinion you would not think that you were pleased when you were and if you had no power of calculation you would not be able to calculate on future pleasure and your life would be the life not of a man but of an oyster or pulmo marinus Could this be otherwise?

Pro No

Soc But is such a life eligible?

Pro I cannot answer you Socrates the argument has taken away from me the power of speech

Soc We must keep up our spirits —let us now take the life of mind and examine it in turn

Pro And what is this life of mind?

Soc I want to know whether any one of us would consent to live having wisdom and mind and knowledge and memory of all things but having no sense of pleasure or pain and wholly unaffected by these and the like feelings?

Pro Neither life Socrates appears eligible to me or is likely as I should imagine, to be chosen by any one else

[22] Soc What would you say Protarchus, to both of these in one or to one that was made out of the union of the two?

Pro Out of the union that is of pleasure with mind and wisdom?

Soc Yes that is the life which I mean

Pro There can be no difference of opinion not some but all would surely choose this third rather than either of the other two and in addition to them

Soc But do you see the consequence?

Pro To be sure I do The consequence is, that two out of the three lives which have been proposed are neither sufficient nor eligible for man or for animal

Soc Then now there can be no doubt that neither of them has the good for the one which had would certainly have been sufficient and perfect and eligible for every living creature or thing that was able to live such a life and if any of us had chosen any other he would have

Soc Or again when cold and heat prevail does not the introduction of them take away excess and indefiniteness, and infuse moderation and harmony?

Pro Certainly

Soc And from a like admixture of the finite and infinite come the seasons, and all the delights of life?

Pro Most true

Soc I omit ten thousand other things, such as beauty and health and strength, and the many beauties and high perfections of the soul O my beautiful Philebus the goddess methinks, seeing the universal wantonness and wickedness of all things and that there was in them no limit to pleasures and self indulgence, devised the limit of law and order whereby as you say Philebus, she torments or as I maintain, delivers the soul—What think you, Protarchus?

Pro Her ways are much to my mind Socrates.

Soc You will observe that I have spoken of three classes?

Pro Yes, I think that I understand you you mean to say that the infinite is one class and that the finite is a second class of existences but what you would make the third I am not so certain.

Soc That is because the amazing variety of the third class is too much for you, my dear friend but there was not this difficulty with the infinite, which also comprehended many classes, for all of them were sealed with the note of more and less and therefore appeared one

Pro True

Soc And the finite or limit had not many divisions, and we readily acknowledged it to be by nature one

Pro Yes

Soc Yes, indeed and when I speak of the third class, understand me to mean any offspring of these, being a birth into true being effected by the measure which the limit introduces.

Pro I understand

Soc Still there was as we said a fourth class to be investigated, and you must assist in the investigation for does not everything which comes into being of necessity come into being through a cause?

Pro Yes certainly for how can there be any thing which has no cause?

Soc And is not the agent the same as the cause in all except name the agent and the cause may be rightly called one?

[27] Pro Very true.

Soc And the same may be said of the patient, or effect we shall find that they too differ as I was saying only in name—shall we not?

Pro We shall

Soc The agent or cause always naturally leads, and the patient or effect naturally follows it?

Pro Certainly

Soc Then the cause and what is subordinate to it in generation are not the same but different?

Pro True

Soc Did not the things which were generated and the things out of which they were generated furnish all the three classes?

Pro Yes.

Soc And the creator or cause of them has been satisfactorily proven to be distinct from them—and may therefore be called a fourth principle?

Pro So let us call it.

Soc Quite right but now having distinguished the four I think that we had better refresh our memories by recapitulating each of them in order

Pro By all means

Soc Then the first I will call the infinite or unlimited and the second the finite or limited then follows the third an essence compound and generated and I do not think that I shall be far wrong in speaking of the cause of mixture and generation as the fourth

Pro Certainly not.

Soc And now what is the next question, and how came we hither? Were we not enquiring whether the second place belonged to pleasure or wisdom

Pro We were

Soc And now having determined these points shall we not be better able to decide about the first and second place, which was the original subject of dispute?

Pro I dare say

Soc We said if you remember that the mixed life of pleasure and wisdom was the conqueror—did we not?

Pro True.

Soc And we see what is the place and nature of this life and to what class it is to be assigned?

Pro Beyond a doubt.

Soc This is evidently comprehended in the third or mixed class which is not composed of any two particular ingredients but of all the elements of infinity bound down by the finite,

Pro That is most true

Soc Even as we say, into the hotter and the colder there enters a more and a less

Pro Yes

Soc Then says the argument there is never any end of them and being endless they must also be infinite

Pro Yes Socrates that is exceedingly true

Soc Yes my dear Protarchus and your answer reminds me that such an expression as exceedingly which you have just uttered and also the term gently have the same significance as more or less for whenever they occur they do not allow of the existence of quantity —they are always introducing degrees into actions instituting a comparison of a more or a less excessive or a more or a less gentle and at each creation of more or less quantity disappears For as I was just now saying if quantity and measure did not disappear but were allowed to intrude in the sphere of more and less and the other comparatives these last would be driven out of their own domain When definite quantity is once admitted there can be no longer a hotter or a colder (for these are always progressing and are never in one stay) but definite quantity is at rest and has ceased to progress Which proves that comparatives such as the hotter and the colder are to be ranked in the class of the infinite

Pro Your remark certainly has the look of truth Socrates but these subjects as you were saying are difficult to follow at first I think however that if I could hear the argument repeated by you once or twice there would be a substantial agreement between us

Soc Yes, and I will try to meet your wish but as I would rather not waste time in the enumeration of endless particulars let me know whether I may not assume as a note of the infinite—

[25] Pro What?

Soc I want to know whether such things as appear to us to admit of more or less or are denoted by the words exceedingly gently extremely and the like may not be referred to the class of the infinite which is their unity for as was asserted in the previous argument all things that were divided and dispersed should be brought together and have the mark or seal of some one nature if possible set upon them—do you remember?

Pro Yes

Soc And all things which do not admit of more or less but admit their opposites that is to say first of all equality and the equal or again the double or any other ratio of number and measure—all these may, I think be rightly reckoned by us in the class of the limited or finite what do you say?

Pro Excellent Socrates

Soc And now what nature shall we ascribe to the third or compound kind?

Pro You I think will have to tell m that.

Soc Rather God will tell you if there be any God who will listen to my prayers

Pro Offer up a prayer then and think

Soc I am thinking Protarchus and I believe that some God has befriended us

Pro What do you mean and what proof have you to offer of what you are saying?

Soc I will tell you and do you listen to my words

Pro Proceed

Soc Were we not speaking just now of hotter and colder?

Pro True

Soc Add to them drier wetter more, less, swifter slower greater smaller and all that in the preceding argument we placed under the unity of more and less

Pro In the class of the infinite you mean?

Soc Yes and now mingle this with the other

Pro What is the other?

Soc The class of the finite which we ought to have brought together as we did the infinite but perhaps it will come to the same thing if we do so now —when the two are combined a third will appear

Pro What do you mean by the class of the finite?

Soc The class of the equal and the double and any class which puts an end to difference and opposition and by introducing number creates harmony and proportion among the different elements

Pro I understand you seem to me to mean that the various opposites when you mingle with them the class of the finite takes certain forms

Soc Yes, that is my meaning

Pro Proceed

Soc Does not the right participation in the finite give health—in disease for instance?

Pro Certainly

[26] Soc And whereas the high and low the swift and the slow are infinite or unlimited does not the addition of the principles aforesaid introduce a limit, and perfect the whole frame of music?

Pro Yes certainly

I am not mistaken of the earth which is in animals and the earth which is in the universe, and you would give a similar reply about all the other elements?

Pro Why how could any man who gave any other be deemed in his senses?

Soc I do not think that he could—but now go n to the next step When we saw those elements of which we have been speaking gathered up in one did we not call them a body?

Pro We did

Soc And the same may be said of the cosmos, which for the same reason may be considered to be a body because made up of the same elements

Pro Very true.

Soc But is our body nourished wholly by this body or is this body nourished by our body thence deriving and having the qualities of which we were just now speaking?

Pro That again Socrates, is a question which does not deserve to be asked [30] Soc Well tell me, is this question worth asking?

Pro What question?

Soc May our body be said to have a soul?

Pro Clearly

Soc And whence comes that soul my dear Protarchus, unless the body of the universe, which contains elements like those in our bodies but in every way fairer had also a soul? Can there be another source?

Pro Clearly Socrates, that is the only source.

Soc Why yes, Protarchus for surely we cannot imagine that of the four classes the finite the infinite the composition of the two and the cause the fourth, which enters into all things, giving to our bodies souls, and the art of self management, and of healing disease and operating in other ways to heal and organize having too all the attributes of wisdom —we cannot, I say imagine that whereas the self-same elements exist, both in the entire heaven and in great provinces of the heaven only fairer and purer this last should not also in that higher sphere have designed the noblest and fairest things?

Pro Such a supposition is quite unreasonable.

Soc Then if this be denied should we not be wise in adopting the other view and maintaining that there is in the universe a mighty infinite and an adequate limit, of which we have often spoken as well as a presiding cause of no mean power which orders and arranges years and seasons and months and may be justly called wisdom and mind?

Pro Most justly

Soc And wisdom and mind cannot exist without soul?

Pro Certainly not

Soc And in the divine nature of Zeus would you not say that there is the soul and mind of a king because there is in him the power of the cause? And other gods have other attributes by which they are pleased to be called

Pro Very true

Soc Do not then suppose that these words are rashly spoken by us, O Protarchus, for they are in harmony with the testimony of those who said of old time that mind rules the universe

Pro True

Soc And they furnish an answer to my enquiry (cf 28) for they imply that mind is the parent of that class of the four which we called the cause of all and I think that you now have my answer

Pro I have indeed and yet I did not observe that you had answered

Soc A jest is sometimes refreshing Protarchus when it interrupts earnest.

[31] Pro Very true

Soc I think friend that we have now pretty clearly set forth the class to which mind belongs and what is the power of mind

Pro True

Soc And the class to which pleasure belongs has also been long ago discovered?

Pro Yes.

Soc And let us remember too of both of them (1) that mind was akin to the cause and of this family and (2) that pleasure is infinite and belongs to the class which neither has, nor ever will have in itself, a beginning middle, or end of its own

Pro I shall be sure to remember

Soc We must next examine what is their place and under what conditions they are generated And we will begin with pleasure since her class was first examined and yet pleasure cannot be rightly tested apart from pain.

Pro If this is the road let us take it.

Soc I wonder whether you would agree with me about the origin of pleasure and pain

Pro What do you mean?

Soc I mean to say that their natural seat is in the mixed class

Pro And would you tell me again, sweet Socrates, which of the aforesaid classes is the mixed one?

Soc I will my fine fellow to the best of my ability and may therefore be truly said to comprehend the conqueror life

Pro Most true

Soc And what shall we say Philebus of your life which is all sweetness and in which of the aforesaid classes is that to be placed? Perhaps you will allow me to ask you a question before you answer?

Phi Let me hear

Soc Have pleasure and pain a limit, or do they belong to the class which admits of more and less?

Phi They belong to the class which admits of more Socrates, for pleasure would not be perfectly good if she were not infinite in quantity and degree

[28] Soc Nor would pain Philebus be perfectly evil And therefore the infinite cannot be that element which imparts to pleasure some degree of good But now—admitting if you like that pleasure is of the nature of the infinite —in which of the aforesaid classes O Protarchus and Philebus can we without irreverence place wisdom and knowledge and mind? And let us be careful for I think that the danger will be very serious if we err on this point

Phi You magnify, Socrates the importance of your favourite god

Soc And you my friend are also magnifying your favourite goddess but still I must beg you to answer the question

Pro Socrates is quite right Philebus and we must submit to him

Phi And did not you Protarchus propose to answer in my place?

Pro Certainly I did but I am now in a great strait and I must entreat you Socrates to be our spokesman and then we shall not say any thing wrong or disrespectful of your favourite

Soc I must obey you Protarchus nor is the task which you impose a difficult one but did I really as Philebus implies disconcert you with my playful solemnity when I asked the question to what class mind and knowledge belong?

Pro You did indeed, Socrates

Soc Yet the answer is easy since all philosophers assert with one voice that mind is the king of heaven and earth—in reality they are magnifying themselves And perhaps they are right But still I should like to consider the class of mind if you do not object a little more fully

Phi Take your own course Socrates and never mind length we shall not tire of you

Soc Very good let us begin then, Protarchus by asking a question

Pro What question?

Soc Whether all this which they call the universe is left to the guidance of unreason and chance medley or on the contrary, as our fathers have declared ordered and governed by a marvellous intelligence and wisdom

Pro Wide asunder are the two assertions illustrious Socrates for that which you were just now saying to me appears to be blasphemy but the other assertion, that mind orders all things, is worthy of the aspect of the world and of the sun, and of the moon and of the stars and of the whole circle of the heavens and never will I say or think otherwise

Soc Shall we then agree with them of old time in maintaining this doctrine—not merely reasserting the notions of others without risk to ourselves [29]—but shall we share in the danger and take our part of the reproach which will await us when an ingenious individual declares that all is disorder?

Pro That would certainly be my wish

Soc Then now please to consider the next stage of the argument

Pro Let me hear

Soc We see that the elements which enter into the nature of the bodies of all animals fire water air and as the storm tossed sailor cries land [i e, earth] reappear in the constitution of the world

Pro The proverb may be applied to us for truly the storm gathers over us and we are at our wit s end

Soc There is something to be remarked about each of these elements

Pro What is it?

Soc Only a small fraction of any one of them exists in us and that of a mean sort, and not in any way pure or having any power worthy of its nature One instance will prove this of all of them there is fire within us and in the universe

Pro True

Soc And is not our fire small and weak and mean? But the fire in the universe is wonderful in quantity and beauty and in every power that fire has

Pro Most true

Soc And is the fire in the universe nourished and generated and ruled by the fire in us or is the fire in you and me and in other animals dependent on the universal fire?

Pro That is a question which does not deserve an answer

Soc Right and you would say the same if

Cf. 28 30

impropriety in the assumption of either alternative. But whether the gods are or are not indifferent to pleasure is a point which may be considered hereafter if in any way relevant to the argument, and whatever is the conclusion we will place it to the account of mind in her contest for the second place, should she have to resign the first.

Pro. Just so

Soc The other class of pleasures, which as we were saying, is purely mental, is entirely derived from memory

Pro What do you mean?

Soc I must first of all analyse memory or rather perception which is prior to memory if the subject of our discussion is ever to be properly cleared up

Pro. How will you proceed?

Soc Let us imagine affections of the body which are extinguished before they reach the soul, and leave her unaffected and again, other affections which vibrate through both soul and body and impart a shock to both and to each of them.

Pro Granted

Soc And the soul may be truly said to be oblivious of the first but not of the second?

Pro Quite true.

Soc When I say oblivious, do not suppose that I mean forgetfulness in a literal sense for forgetfulness is the exit of memory which in this case has not yet entered and to speak of the loss of that which is not yet in existence, and never has been, is a contradiction do you see

Pro Yes

Soc Then just be so good as to change the terms.

Pro How shall I change them?

[34] Soc Instead of the oblivion of the soul, when you are describing the state in which she is unaffected by the shocks of the body say unconsciousness

Pro I see

Soc And the union or communion of soul and body in one feeling and motion would be properly called consciousness?

Pro Most true.

Soc Then now we know the meaning of the word

Pro Yes.

Soc And memory may I think, be rightly described as the preservation of consciousness?

Pro Right.

Soc But do we not distinguish memory from recollection?

Pro I think so

Soc And do we not mean by recollection the power which the soul has of recovering when by herself some feeling which she experienced when in company with the body?

Pro Certainly

Soc And when she recovers of herself the lost recollection of some consciousness or knowledge, the recovery is termed recollection and reminiscence?

Pro Very true.

Soc There is a reason why I say all this.

Pro What is it?

Soc I want to attain the plainest possible notion of pleasure and desire, as they exist in the mind only apart from the body and the previous analysis helps to show the nature of both.

Pro Then now Socrates, let us proceed to the next point.

Soc There are certainly many things to be considered in discussing the generation and whole complexion of pleasure At the outset we must determine the nature and seat of desire.

Pro Ay let us enquire into that, for we shall lose nothing

Soc Nay Protarchus, we shall surely lose the puzzle if we find the answer

Pro A fair retort but let us proceed.

Soc Did we not place hunger thirst, and the like, in the class of desires?

Pro Certainly

Soc And yet they are very different what common nature have we in view when we call them by a single name?

Pro By heavens, Socrates, that is a question which is not easily answered but it must be answered.

Soc Then let us go back to our examples.

Pro Where shall we begin?

Soc Do we mean anything when we say "a man thirsts"?

Pro Yes.

Soc We mean to say that he "is empty"?

Pro Of course.

Soc And is not thirst desire?

Pro Yes, of drink.

[35] Soc Would you say of drink, or of replenishment with drink?

Pro I should say of replenishment with drink.

Soc Then he who is empty desires, as would appear the opposite of what he experiences for he is empty and desires to be full?

Pro Clearly so

Soc But how can a man who is empty for the first time, attain either by perception or

Pro Very good

Soc Let us then understand the mixed class to be that which we placed third in the list of four

Pro That which followed the infinite and the finite and in which you ranked health and if I am not mistaken harmony

Soc Capital and now will you please to give me your best attention?

Pro Proceed I am attending

Soc I say that when the harmony in animals is dissolved there is also a dissolution of nature and a generation of pain

Pro That is very probable

Soc And the restoration of harmony and return to nature is the source of pleasure if I may be allowed to speak in the fewest and shortest words about matters of the greatest moment

Pro I believe that you are right Socrates but will you try to be a little plainer?

Soc Do not obvious and every day phenomena furnish the simplest illustration?

Pro What phenomena do you mean?

Soc Hunger for example is a dissolution and a pain

Pro True

Soc Whereas eating is a replenishment and a pleasure?

[32] Pro Yes

Soc Thirst again is a destruction and a pain but the effect of moisture replenishing the dry place is a pleasure once more the unnatural separation and dissolution caused by heat is painful and the natural restoration and refrigeration is pleasant

Pro Very true

Soc And the unnatural freezing of the moisture in an animal is pain and the natural process of resolution and return of the elements to their original state is pleasure And would not the general proposition seem to you to hold that the destroying of the natural union of the finite and infinite which as I was observing before make up the class of living beings is pain and that the process of return of all things to their own nature is pleasure?

Pro Granted what you say has a general truth

Soc Here then is one kind of pleasures and pains originating severally in the two processes which we have described?

Pro Good

Soc Let us next assume that in the soul herself there is an antecedent hope of pleasure which is sweet and refreshing and an expectation of pain fearful and anxious

Pro Yes this is another class of pleasures and pains which is of the soul only apart from the body and is produced by expectation

Soc Right for in the analysis of these pure, as I suppose them to be the pleasures being unalloyed with pain and the pains with pleasure methinks that we shall see clearly whether the whole class of pleasure is to be desired or whether this quality of entire desirableness is not rather to be attributed to another of the classes which have been mentioned and whether pleasure and pain like heat and cold and other things of the same kind are not sometimes to be desired and sometimes not to be desired as being not in themselves good but only sometimes and in some instances admitting of the nature of good

Pro You say most truly that this is the track which the investigation should pursue

Soc Well then assuming that pain ensues on the dissolution and pleasure on the restoration of the harmony let us now ask what will be the condition of animated beings who are neither in process of restoration nor of dissolution And mind what you say I ask whether any animal who is in that condition can possibly have any feeling of pleasure or pain great or small?

Pro Certainly not

[33] Soc Then here we have a third state over and above that of pleasure and of pain?

Pro Very true

Soc And do not forget that there is such a state it will make a great difference in our judgment of pleasure whether we remember this or not And I should like to say a few words about it

Pro What have you to say?

Soc Why you know that if a man chooses the life of wisdom there is no reason why he should not live in this neutral state

Pro You mean that he may live neither rejoicing nor sorrowing?

Soc Yes and if I remember rightly when the lives were compared no degree of pleasure whether great or small was thought to be necessary to him who chose the life of thought and wisdom

Pro Yes certainly we said so

Soc Then he will live without pleasure and who knows whether this may not be the most divine of all lives?

Pro If so the gods at any rate cannot be supposed to have either joy or sorrow

Soc Certainly not—there would be a great

Pro. Right.

Soc. I am always wondering at the question which has now been raised.

Pro. How so?

Soc. Do you deny that some pleasures are false, and others true?

Pro. To be sure I do.

Soc. Would you say that no one ever seemed to rejoice and yet did not rejoice, or seemed to feel pain and yet did not feel pain, sleeping or waking, mad or lunatic?

Pro. So we have always held, Socrates.

[37] Soc. But were you right? Shall we enquire into the truth of your opinion?

Pro. I think that we should.

Soc. Let us then put into more precise terms the question which has arisen about pleasure and opinion. Is there such a thing as opinion?

Pro. Yes.

Soc. And such a thing as pleasure?

Pro. Yes.

Soc. And an opinion must be of something?

Pro. True.

Soc. And a man must be pleased by something?

Pro. Quite correct.

Soc. And whether the opinion be right or wrong, makes no difference; it will still be an opinion?

Pro. Certainly.

Soc. And he who is pleased, whether he is rightly pleased or not will always have a real feeling of pleasure?

Pro. Yes; that is also quite true.

Soc. Then, how can opinion be both true and false, and pleasure true only, although pleasure and opinion are both equally real?

Pro. Yes; that is the question.

Soc. You mean that opinion admits of truth and falsehood, and hence becomes not merely opinion, but opinion of a certain quality; and this is what you think should be examined?

Pro. Yes.

Soc. And further, even if we admit the existence of qualities in other objects, may not pleasure and pain be simple and devoid of quality?

Pro. Clearly.

Soc. But there is no difficulty in seeing that pleasure and pain as well as opinion have qualities, for they are great or small, and have various degrees of intensity; as was indeed said long ago by us.

Pro. Quite true.

Soc. And if badness attaches to any of them, Protarchus, then we should speak of a bad opinion or of a bad pleasure?

Pro. Quite true, Socrates.

Soc. And if rightness attaches to any of them, should we not speak of a right opinion or right pleasure; and in like manner of the reverse of rightness?

Pro. Certainly.

Soc. And if the thing opined be erroneous, might we not say that opinion, being erroneous, is not right or rightly opined?

Pro. Certainly.

Soc. And if we see a pleasure or pain which errs in respect of its object, shall we call that right or good, or by any honourable name?

Pro. Not if the pleasure is mistaken; how could we?

Soc. And surely pleasure often appears to accompany an opinion which is not true, but false?

[38] Pro. Certainly it does; and in that case, Socrates, as we were saying, the opinion is false, but no one could call the actual pleasure false.

Soc. How eagerly, Protarchus, do you rush to the defence of pleasure!

Pro. Nay, Socrates, I only repeat what I hear.

Soc. And is there no difference, my friend, between that pleasure which is associated with right opinion and knowledge, and that which is often found in all of us associated with falsehood and ignorance?

Pro. There must be a very great difference between them.

Soc. Then, now let us proceed to contemplate this difference.

Pro. Lead, and I will follow.

Soc. Well, then, my view is—

Pro. What is it?

Soc. We agree—do we not?—that there is such a thing as false, and also such a thing as true opinion?

Pro. Yes.

Soc. And pleasure and pain, as I was just now saying, are often consequent upon these—upon true and false opinion, I mean.

Pro. Very true.

Soc. And do not opinion and the endeavour to form an opinion always spring from memory and perception?

Pro. Certainly.

Soc. Might we imagine the process to be something of this nature?

Pro. Of what nature?

Soc. An object may be often seen at a distance not very clearly, and the seer may want to determine what it is which he sees.

Pro. Very likely.

Soc. Soon he begins to interrogate himself.

memory to any apprehension of replenishment of which he has no present or past experience?

Pro Impossible

Soc And yet he who desires surely desires something?

Pro Of course

Soc He does not desire that which he experiences for he experiences thirst and thirst is emptiness but he desires replenishment?

Pro True

Soc Then there must be something in the thirsty man which in some way apprehends replenishment?

Pro There must

Soc And that cannot be the body for the body is supposed to be emptied?

Pro Yes

Soc The only remaining alternative is that the soul apprehends the replenishment by the help of memory as is obvious, for what other way can there be?

Pro I cannot imagine any other

Soc But do you see the consequence?

Pro What is it?

Soc That there is no such thing as desire of the body

Pro Why so?

Soc Why because the argument shows that the endeavour of every animal is to the reverse of his bodily state

Pro Yes

Soc And the impulse which leads him to the opposite of what he is experiencing proves that he has a memory of the opposite state

Pro True

Soc And the argument having proved that memory attracts us towards the objects of desire proves also that the impulses and the desires and the moving principle in every living being have their origin in the soul

Pro Most true

Soc The argument will not allow that our body either hungers or thirsts or has any similar experience

Pro Quite right

Soc Let me make a further observation the argument appears to me to imply that there is a kind of life which consists in these affections

Pro Of what affections and of what kind of life are you speaking?

Soc I am speaking of being emptied and replenished and of all that relates to the preservation and destruction of living beings as well as of the pain which is felt in one of these states and of the pleasure which succeeds to it

Pro True

Soc And what would you say of the intermediate state?

Pro What do you mean by intermediate?

Soc I mean when a person is in actual suffering and yet remembers past pleasures which if they would only return would relieve him but as yet he has them not May we not say of him, that he is in an intermediate state? [36]

Pro Certainly

Soc Would you say that he was wholly pained or wholly pleased?

Pro Nay I should say that he has two pains in his body there is the actual experience of pain and in his soul longing and expectation

Soc What do you mean Protarchus by the two pains? May not a man who is empty have at one time a sure hope of being filled and at other times be quite in despair?

Pro Very true

Soc And has he not the pleasure of memory when he is hoping to be filled and yet in that he is empty is he not at the same time in pain?

Pro Certainly

Soc Then man and the other animals have at the same time both pleasure and pain?

Pro I suppose so

Soc But when a man is empty and has no hope of being filled there will be the double experience of pain You observed this and inferred that the double experience was the single case possible

Pro Quite true Socrates

Soc Shall the enquiry into these states of feeling be made the occasion of raising a question?

Pro What question?

Soc Whether we ought to say that the pleasures and pains of which we are speaking are true or false? or some true and some false?

Pro But how Socrates can there be false pleasures and pains?

Soc And how Protarchus can there be true and false fears or true and false expectations or true and false opinions?

Pro I grant that opinions may be true or false but not pleasures

Soc What do you mean? I am afraid that we are raising a very serious enquiry

Pro There I agree

Soc And yet my boy for you are one of Philebus boys (cf 16) the point to be considered is whether the enquiry is relevant to the argument

Pro Surely

Soc No tedious and irrelevant discussion can be allowed what is said should be pertinent that they are false pleasures.

Pro. They are.

Soc. The bad then commonly delight in false pleasures, and the good in true pleasures?

Pro. Doubtless.

Soc. Then upon this view there are false pleasures in the souls of men which are a ludicrous imitation of the true, and there are pains of a similar character?

Pro. There are.

Soc. And did we not allow that a man who had an opinion at all had a real opinion, but often about things which had no existence either in the past, present, or future?

Pro. Quite true.

Soc. And this was the source of false opinion and opining; am I not right?

Pro. Yes.

Soc. And must we not attribute to pleasure and pain a similar real but illusory character?

Pro. How do you mean?

Soc. I mean to say that a man must be admitted to have real pleasure who is pleased with anything or anyhow; and he may be pleased about things which neither have nor have ever had any real existence, and, more often than not, are never likely to exist.

Pro. Yes, Socrates, that again is undeniable.

Soc. And may not the same be said about fear and anger and the like; are they not often false?

Pro. Quite so.

Soc. And can opinions be good or bad except in as far as they are true or false?

Pro. In no other way.

[41] Soc. Nor can pleasures be conceived to be bad except in so far as they are false.

Pro. Nay, Socrates, that is the very opposite of truth; for no one would call pleasures and pains bad because they are false, but by reason of some other great corruption to which they are liable.

Soc. Well, of pleasures which are corrupt and caused by corruption we will hereafter speak, if we care to continue the enquiry; for the present I would rather show by another argument that there are many false pleasures existing or coming into existence in us, because this may assist our final decision.

Pro. Very true; that is to say, if there are such pleasures.

Soc. I think that there are, Protarchus; but this is an opinion which should be well assured, and not rest upon a mere assertion.

Pro. Very good.

Soc. Then now, like wrestlers, let us approach and grasp this new argument.

Pro. Proceed.

Soc. We were maintaining a little while since, that when desires, as they are termed, exist in us, then the body has separate feelings apart from the soul—do you remember?

Pro. Yes, I remember that you said so.

Soc. And the soul was supposed to desire the opposite of the bodily state, while the body was the source of any pleasure or pain which was experienced.

Pro. True.

Soc. Then now you may infer what happens in such cases.

Pro. What am I to infer?

Soc. That in such cases pleasure and pains come simultaneously; and there is a juxtaposition of the opposite sensations which correspond to them, as has been already shown.

Pro. Clearly.

Soc. And there is another point to which we have agreed.

Pro. What is it?

Soc. That pleasure and pain both admit of more and less, and that they are of the class of infinites.

Pro. Certainly, we said so.

Soc. But how can we rightly judge of them?

Pro. How can we?

Soc. It is our intention to judge of their comparative importance and intensity, measuring pleasure against pain, and pain against pain, and pleasure against pleasure.

Pro. Yes, such is our intention, and we shall judge of them accordingly.

[42] Soc. Well, take the case of sight. Does not the nearness or distance of magnitudes obscure their true proportions, and make us opine falsely; and do we not find the same illusion happening in the case of pleasures and pains?

Pro. Yes, Socrates, and in a degree far greater.

Soc. Then what we are now saying is the opposite of what we were saying before.

Pro. What was that?

Soc. Then the opinions were true and false, and infected the pleasures and pains with their own falsity.

Pro. Very true.

Soc. But now it is the pleasures which are said to be true and false because they are seen at various distances, and subjected to comparison; the pleasures appear to be greater and more vehement when placed side by side with the pains, and the pains when placed side by side with the pleasures.

Pro In what manner?

Soc He asks himself— What is that which appears to be standing by the rock under the tree? This is the question which he may be supposed to put to himself when he sees such an appearance

Pro True

Soc To which he may guess the right answer, saying as if in a whisper to himself— It is a man

Pro Very good

Soc Or again he may be misled and then he will say— No it is a figure made by the shepherds

Pro Yes

Soc And if he has a companion he repeats his thought to him in articulate sounds and what was before an opinion has now become a proposition

Pro Certainly

Soc But if he be walking alone when these thoughts occur to him he may not unfrequently keep them in his mind for a considerable time

Pro Very true

Soc Well now I wonder whether you would agree in my explanation of this phenomenon

Pro What is your explanation?

Soc I think that the soul at such times is like a book

Pro How so?

[39] Soc Memory and perception meet and they and their attendant feelings seem to me almost to write down words in the soul and when the inscribing feeling writes truly then true opinion and true propositions which are the expressions of opinion come into our souls —but when the scribe within us writes falsely the result is false

Pro I quite assent and agree to your statement

Soc I must bespeak your favour also for another artist who is busy at the same time in the chambers of the soul

Pro Who is he?

Soc The painter who after the scribe has done his work draws images in the soul of the things which he has described

Pro But when and how does he do this?

Soc When a man besides receiving from sight or some other sense certain opinions or statements sees in his mind the images of the subjects of them —is not this a very common mental phenomenon?

Pro Certainly

Soc And the images answering to true opinions and words are true and to false opinions and words false are they not?

Pro They are

Soc If we are right so far there arises a further question

Pro What is it?

Soc Whether we experience the feeling of which I am speaking only in relation to the present and the past, or in relation to the future also?

Pro I should say in relation to all times alike

Soc Have not purely mental pleasures and pains been described already as in some cases anticipations of the bodily ones from which we may infer that anticipatory pleasures and pains have to do with the future?

Pro Most true

Soc And do all those writings and paintings which as we were saying a little while ago are produced in us, relate to the past and present only and not to the future?

Pro To the future very much

Soc When you say Very much you mean to imply that all these representations are hopes about the future and that mankind are filled with hopes in every stage of existence?

Pro Exactly

Soc Answer me another question

Pro What question?

Soc A just and pious and good man is the friend of the gods is he not?

Pro Certainly he is

Soc And the unjust and utterly bad man is the reverse?

[40] Pro True

Soc And all men as we were saying just now are always filled with hopes?

Pro Certainly

Soc And these hopes as they are termed are propositions which exist in the minds of each of us?

Pro Yes

Soc And the fancies of hope are also pictured in us a man may often have a vision of a heap of gold and pleasures ensuing and in the picture there may be a likeness of himself mightily rejoicing over his good fortune

Pro True

Soc And may we not say that the good being friends of the gods have generally true pictures presented to them and the bad false pictures?

Pro Certainly

Soc The bad too have pleasures painted in their fancy as well as the good but I presume

Soc And do they think that they have pleasure when they are free from pain?

Pro They say so

Soc And they must think or they would not say that they have pleasure

Pro I suppose not.

Soc And yet if pleasure and the negation of pain are of distinct natures they are wrong

Pro But they are undoubtedly of distinct natures.

Soc Then shall we take the view that they are three, as we were just now saying or that they are two only—the one being a state of pain, which is an evil and the other a cessation of pain which is of itself a good, and is called pleasant?

Pro But why Socrates do we ask the question at all? I do not see the reason.

Soc You, Protarchus have clearly never heard of certain enemies of our friend Philebus

Pro And who may they be?

Soc Certain persons who are reputed to be masters in natural philosophy who deny the very existence of pleasure.

Pro Indeed!

Soc They say that what the school of Philebus calls pleasures are all of them only avoidances of pain.

Pro And would you, Socrates have us agree with them?

Soc Why no I would rather use them as a sort of diviners who divine the truth, not by rules of art, but by an instinctive repugnance and extreme detestation which a noble nature has of the power of pleasure, in which they think that there is nothing sound and her seductive influence is declared by them to be witchcraft, and not pleasure. This is the use which you may make of them And when you have considered the various grounds of their dislike, you shall hear from me what I deem to be true pleasures Having thus examined the nature of pleasure from both points of view we will bring her up for judgment.

Pro Well said

Soc Then let us enter into an alliance with these philosophers and follow in the track of their dislike I imagine that they would say something of this sort they would begin at the beginning, and ask whether if we wanted to know the nature of any quality such as hardness, we should be more likely to discover it by looking at the hardest things rather than at the least hard? You, Protarchus shall answer these severe gentlemen as you answer me

Pro By all means, and I reply to them, that you should look at the greatest instances

Soc Then if we want to see the true nature of pleasures as a class we should not look at the most diluted pleasures, [45] but at the most extreme and most vehement?

Pro In that every one will agree.

Soc And the obvious instances of the great est pleasures as we have often said are the pleasures of the body?

Pro Certainly

Soc And are they felt by us to be or become greater when we are sick or when we are in health? And here we must be careful in our answer or we shall come to grief

Pro How will that be?

Soc Why because we might be tempted to answer "When we are in health"

Pro Yes, that is the natural answer

Soc Well but are not those pleasures the greatest of which mankind have the greatest desires?

Pro True

Soc And do not people who are in a fever or any similar illness feel cold or thirst or other bodily affections more intensely? Am I not right in saying that they have a deeper want and greater pleasure in the satisfaction of their want?

Pro That is obvious as soon as it is said.

Soc Well then shall we not be right in saying that if a person would wish to see the greatest pleasures he ought to go and look, not at health, but at disease? And here you must distinguish —do not imagine that I mean to ask whether those who are very ill have more pleasures than those who are well but understand that I am speaking of the magnitude of pleasure I want to know where pleasures are found to be most intense. For as I say we have to discover what is pleasure and what they mean by pleasure who deny her very existence

Pro I think I follow you.

Soc You will soon have a better opportunity of showing whether you do or not, Protarchus Answer now and tell me whether you see I will not say more, but more intense and excessive pleasures in wantonness than in temperance? Reflect before you speak.

Pro I understand you, and see that there is a great difference between them the temperate are restrained by the wise man's aphorism of "Never too much," which is their rule, but excess of pleasure possessing the minds of fools and wantons becomes madness and makes them shout with delight.

Soc Very good and if this be true then the Pro Certainly and for the reason which you mention

Soc And suppose you part off from pleasures and pains the element which makes them appear to be greater or less than they really are you will acknowledge that this element is illusory and you will never say that the corresponding excess or defect of pleasure or pain is real or true

Pro Certainly not

Soc Next let us see whether in another direction we may not find pleasures and pains existing and appearing in living beings which are still more false than these Pro What are they and how shall we find them?

Soc If I am not mistaken I have often repeated that pains and aches and suffering and uneasiness of all sorts arise out of a corruption of nature caused by concretions and dissolutions and repletions and evacuations and also by growth and decay?

Pro Yes that has been often said

Soc And we have also agreed that the restoration of the natural state is pleasure?

Pro Right

Soc But now let us suppose an interval of time at which the body experiences none of these changes

Pro When can that be Socrates?

Soc Your question Protarchus does not help the argument

Pro Why not Socrates?

Soc Because it does not prevent me from repeating mine

Pro And what was that?

Soc Why Protarchus admitting that there is no such interval I may ask what would be the necessary consequence if there were?

Pro You mean what would happen if the body were not changed either for good or bad?

Soc Yes

Pro Why then Socrates I should suppose that there would be neither pleasure nor pain

[43] Soc Very good but still if I am not mistaken you do assert that we must always be experiencing one of them that is what the wise tell us for say they all things are ever flowing up and down

Pro Yes and their words are of no mean authority

Soc Of course for they are no mean authorities themselves and I should like to avoid the brunt of their argument Shall I tell you how I mean to escape from them? And you shall be the partner of my flight

Pro How?

Soc To them we will say Good but are we, or living things in general always conscious of what happens to us—for example, of our growth or the like? Are we not on the contrary almost wholly unconscious of this and similar phenomena? You must answer for them

Pro The latter alternative is the true one

Soc Then we were not right in saying just now that motions going up and down cause pleasures and pains?

Pro True

Soc A better and more unexceptionable way of speaking will be—

Pro What?

Soc If we say that the great changes produce pleasures and pains but that the moderate and lesser ones do neither

Pro That Socrates is the more correct mode of speaking

Soc But if this be true the life to which I was just now referring again appears

Pro What life?

Soc The life which we affirmed to be devoid either of pain or of joy

Pro Very true

Soc We may assume then that there are three lives one pleasant one painful and the third which is neither what say you?

Pro I should say as you do that there are three of them

Soc But if so the negation of pain will not be the same with pleasure

Pro Certainly not

Soc Then when you hear a person saying that always to live without pain is the pleasantest of all things what would you understand him to mean by that statement?

Pro I think that by pleasure he must mean the negative of pain

Soc Let us take any three things or suppose that we embellish a little and call the first gold the second silver and there shall be a third which is neither

Pro Very good

Soc Now can that which is neither be either gold or silver?

Pro Impossible

Soc No more can that neutral or middle life be rightly or reasonably spoken or thought of as pleasant or painful

Pro Certainly not

[44] Soc And yet my friend there are as we know persons who say and think so

Pro Certainly

Soc. And do they think that they have pleasure when they are free from pain?

Pro. They say so.

Soc. And they must think or they would not say that they have pleasure.

Pro. I suppose not.

Soc. And yet if pleasure and the negation of pain are of distinct natures, they are wrong.

Pro. But they are undoubtedly of distinct natures.

Soc. Then shall we take the view that they are three, as we were just now saying, or that they are two only—the one being a state of pain, which is an evil, and the other a cessation of pain, which is of itself a good, and is called pleasant?

Pro. But why, Socrates, do we ask the question at all? I do not see the reason.

Soc. You, Protarchus, have clearly never heard of certain enemies of our friend Philebus.

Pro. And who may they be?

Soc. Certain persons who are reputed to be masters in natural philosophy, who deny the very existence of pleasure.

Pro. Indeed!

This is the use which you may make of them. And when you have considered the various grounds of their dislike, you shall hear from me what I deem to be true pleasures. Having thus examined the nature of pleasure from both points of view, we will bring her up for judgment.

Pro. Well said.

Soc. Then let us enter into an alliance with these philosophers and follow in the track of their dislike. I imagine that they would say something of this sort; they would begin at the beginning, and ask whether, if we wanted to know the nature of any quality, such as hardness, we should be more likely to discover it by looking at the hardest things, rather than at the least hard? Soc. Very good, and if this be true, then the greatest pleasures and pains will clearly be found in some vicious state of soul and body and not in a virtuous state

[46] Pro Certainly

Soc And ought we not to select some of these for examination and see what makes them the greatest?

Pro To be sure we ought

Soc Take the case of the pleasures which arise out of certain disorders

Pro What disorders?

Soc The pleasures of unseemly disorders which our severe friends utterly detest

Pro What pleasures?

Soc Such for example as the relief of itching and other ailments by scratching which is the only remedy required For what in Heaven s name is the feeling to be called which is thus produced in us?—Pleasure or pain?

Pro A villainous mixture of some kind Socrates I should say

Soc I did not introduce the argument O Protarchus with any personal reference to Philebus but because without the consideration of these and similar pleasures we shall not be able to determine the point at issue

Pro Then we had better proceed to analyze this family of pleasures

Soc You mean the pleasures which are mingled with pain?

Pro Exactly

Soc There are some mixtures which are of the body and only in the body and others which are of the soul and only in the soul while there are other mixtures of pleasures with pains common both to soul and body which in their composite state are called sometimes pleasures and sometimes pains

Pro How is that?

Soc Whenever in the restoration or in the derangement of nature a man experiences two opposite feelings for example when he is cold and is growing warm or again when he is hot and is becoming cool and he wants to have the one and be rid of the other —the sweet has a bitter as the common saying is and both together fasten upon him and create irritation and in time drive him to distraction

Pro That description is very true to nature

Soc And in these sorts of mixtures the pleasures and pains are sometimes equal and sometimes one or other of them predominates?

Pro True

Soc Of cases in which the pain exceeds the pleasure an example is afforded by itching of which we were just now speaking and by the tingling which we feel when the boiling and fiery element is within and the rubbing and motion only relieves the surface, and does not reach the parts affected then if you put them to the fire and as a last resort apply cold to them you may often produce the most intense pleasure or pain in the inner parts which contrasts and mingles with the pain or pleasure, as the case may be, of the outer parts [47] and this is due to the forcible separation of what is united or to the union of what is separated and to the juxtaposition of pleasure and pain

Pro Quite so

Soc Sometimes the element of pleasure prevails in a man and the slight undercurrent of pain makes him tingle and causes a gentle irritation or again the excessive infusion of pleasure creates an excitement in him —he even leaps for joy he assumes all sorts of attitudes he changes all manner of colours he gasps for breath and is quite amazed, and utters the most irrational exclamations

Pro Yes indeed

Soc He will say of himself and others will say of him that he is dying with these delights and the more dissipated and good for nothing he is the more vehemently he pursues them in every way of all pleasures he declares them to be the greatest and he reckons him who lives in the most constant enjoyment of them to be the happiest of mankind

Pro That Socrates is a very true description of the opinions of the majority about pleasures

Soc Yes Protarchus quite true of the mixed pleasures which arise out of the communion of external and internal sensations in the body there are also cases in which the mind contributes an opposite element to the body whether of pleasure or pain and the two unite and form one mixture Concerning these I have already remarked that when a man is empty he desires to be full and has pleasure in hope and pain in vacuity But now I must further add what I omitted before that in all these and similar emotions in which body and mind are opposed (and they are innumerable) pleasure and pain coalesce in one

Pro I believe that to be quite true

Soc There still remains one other sort of admixture of pleasures and pains

Pro What is that?

Soc The union which as we were saying the mind often experiences of purely mental feelings

Pro What do you mean?

Soc Why do we not speak of anger fear desire, sorrow love, emulation envy and the like, as pains which belong to the soul only?

Pro. Yes.

Soc And shall we not find them also full of the most wonderful pleasures? need I remind you of the anger

Which stirs even a wise man to violence,
And is sweeter than honey and the honeycomb?

And you remember how pleasures mingle with pains in lamentation [48] and bereavement?

Pro Yes, there is a natural connection between them.

Soc And you remember also how at the sight of tragedies the spectators smile through their tears?

Pro Certainly I do

Soc And are you aware that even at a comedy the soul experiences a mixed feeling of pain and pleasure?

Pro I do not quite understand you.

Soc I admit, Protarchus, that there is some difficulty in recognizing this mixture of feelings at a comedy

Pro There is, I think.

Soc And the greater the obscurity of the case the more desirable is the examination of it, because the difficulty in detecting other cases of mixed pleasures and pains will be less.

Pro Proceed

Soc I have just mentioned envy would you not call that a pain of the soul?

Pro Yes.

Soc And yet the envious man finds something in the misfortunes of his neighbours at which he is pleased?

Pro. Certainly

Soc And ignorance, and what is termed donishness, are surely an evil?

Pro To be sure.

Soc From these considerations learn to know the nature of the ridiculous.

Pro Explain.

Soc The ridiculous is in short the specific name which is used to describe the vicious form of a certain habit and of vice in general it is that kind which is most at variance with the inscription at Delphi.

Pro You mean, Socrates Know thyself.

Soc I do and the opposite would be, Know not thyself.

Pro Certainly

Soc And now O Protarchus, try to divide this into three.

Pro. Indeed I am afraid that I cannot.

Soc Do you mean to say that I must make the division for you?

Pro Yes, and what is more, I beg that you will

Soc Are there not three ways in which ignorance of self may be shown?

Pro What are they?

Soc In the first place, about money the ignorant may fancy himself richer than he is

Pro Yes, that is a very common error

Soc And still more often he will fancy that he is taller or fairer than he is, or that he has some other advantage of person which he really has not.

Pro Of course.

Soc And yet surely by far the greatest number err about the goods of the mind they imagine themselves to be much better men than they are. [49]

Pro Yes that is by far the commonest delusion.

Soc And of all the virtues, is not wisdom the one which the mass of mankind are always claiming, and which most arouses in them a spirit of contention and lying conceit of wisdom?

Pro Certainly

Soc And may not all this be truly called an evil condition?

Pro. Very evil

Soc But we must pursue the division a step further Protarchus, if we would see in envy of the childish sort a singular mixture of pleasure and pain.

Pro How can we make the further division which you suggest?

Soc All who are silly enough to entertain this lying conceit of themselves may of course be divided, like the rest of mankind, into two classes—one having power and might and the other the reverse.

Pro Certainly

Soc Let this, then, be the principle of division those of them who are weak and unable to revenge themselves, when they are laughed at, may be truly called ridiculous, but those who can defend themselves may be more truly described as strong and formidable for ignorance in the powerful is hateful and horrible, because hurtful to others both in reality and in fiction, but powerless ignorance may be reckoned and in truth is, ridiculous.

Pro That is very true, but I do not as yet see where is the admixture of pleasures and pains.

Soc Well, then, let us examine the nature of envy

Pro Proceed

Soc Is not envy an unrighteous pleasure and also an unrighteous pain?

Pro Most true

Soc There is nothing envious or wrong in rejoicing at the misfortunes of enemies?

Pro Certainly not

Soc But to feel joy instead of sorrow at the sight of our friends misfortunes—is not that wrong?

Pro Undoubtedly

Soc Did we not say that ignorance was always an evil?

Pro True

Soc And the three kinds of vain conceit in our friends which we enumerated—the vain conceit of beauty of wisdom and of wealth are ridiculous if they are weak and detestable when they are powerful May we not say as I was saying before that our friends who are in this state of mind when harmless to others are simply ridiculous?

Pro They are ridiculous

Soc And do we not acknowledge this ignorance of theirs to be a misfortune?

Pro Certainly

Soc And do we feel pain or pleasure in laughing at it?

Pro Clearly we feel pleasure

[50] Soc And was not envy the source of this pleasure which we feel at the misfortunes of friends?

Pro Certainly

Soc Then the argument shows that when we laugh at the folly of our friends pleasure in mingling with envy mingles with pain for envy has been acknowledged by us to be mental pain and laughter is pleasant and so we envy and laugh at the same instant

Pro True

Soc And the argument implies that there are combinations of pleasure and pain in lamentations and in tragedy and comedy not only on the stage but on the greater stage of human life and so in endless other cases

Pro I do not see how any one can deny what you say Socrates however eager he may be to assert the opposite opinion

Soc I mentioned anger desire sorrow fear love emulation envy and similar emotions as examples in which we should find a mixture of the two elements so often named did I not?

Pro Yes

Soc We may observe that our conclusions hitherto have had reference only to sorrow and envy and anger

Pro I see

Soc Then many other cases still remain?

Pro Certainly

Soc And why do you suppose me to have pointed out to you the admixture which takes place in comedy? Why but to convince you that there was no difficulty in showing the mixed nature of fear and love and similar affections and I thought that when I had given you the illustration you would have let me off and have acknowledged as a general truth that the body without the soul and the soul without the body as well as the two united are susceptible of all sorts of admixtures of pleasures and pains and so further discussion would have been unnecessary And now I want to know whether I may depart or will you keep me here until midnight? I fancy that I may obtain my release without many words —if I promise that to-morrow I will give you an account of all these cases But at present I would rather sail in another direction and go to other matters which remain to be settled before the judgment can be given which Philebus demands

Pro Very good Socrates in what remains take your own course

Soc Then after the mixed pleasures the unmixed should have their turn this is the natural and necessary order

[51] Pro Excellent

Soc These in turn then I will now endeavour to indicate for with the maintainers of the opinion that all pleasuresare a cessation of pain I do not agree but as I was saying I use them as witnesses that there are pleasures which seem only and are not and there are others again which have great power and appear in many forms yet are intermingled with pains, and are partly alleviations of agony and distress both of body and mind

Pro Then what pleasures Socrates should we be right in conceiving to be true?

Soc True pleasures are those which are given by beauty of colour and form and most of those which arise from smells those of sound again and in general those of which the want is painless and unconscious, and of which the fruition is palpable to sense and pleasant and unalloyed with pain

Pro Once more Socrates I must ask what you mean

Soc My meaning is certainly not obvious, and I will endeavour to be plainer I do not mean by beauty of form such beauty as that of animals or pictures which the many would suppose to be my meaning but, says the argument, understand me to mean straight lines and circles, and the plane or solid figures which are formed out of them by turning-lathes and rulers and measurers of angles for these I affirm to be not only relatively beautiful, like other things, but they are eternally and absolutely beautiful, and they have peculiar pleasures quite unlike the pleasures of scratching. And there are colours which are of the same character and have similar pleasures now do you understand my meaning?

Pro. I am trying to understand, Socrates, and I hope that you will try to make your meaning clearer

Soc When sounds are smooth and clear and have a single pure tone, then I mean to say that they are not relatively but absolutely beautiful, and have natural pleasures associated with them.

Pro Yes, there are such pleasures.

Soc The pleasures of smell are of a less ethereal sort, but they have no necessary admixture of pain, and all pleasures however and wherever experienced, which are unattended by pains, I assign to an analogous class. Here then are two kinds of pleasures.

Pro I understand

[52] Soc To these may be added the pleasures of knowledge, if no hunger of knowledge and no pain caused by such hunger precede them.

Pro And this is the case.

Soc Well, but if a man who is full of knowledge loses his knowledge are there not pains of forgetting?

Pro Not necessarily but there may be times of reflection, when he feels grief at the loss of his knowledge.

Soc Yes, my friend, but at present we are enumerating only the natural perceptions, and have nothing to do with reflection.

Pro In that case you are right in saying that the loss of knowledge is not attended with pain.

Soc These pleasures of knowledge, then, are unmixed with pain and they are not the pleasures of the many but of a very few

Pro Quite true.

Soc And now having fairly separated the pure pleasures and those which may be rightly termed impure, let us further add to our description of them, that the pleasures which are in excess have no measure, but that those which are not in excess have measure the great, the vehement whether more or less frequent, we shall be right in referring to the class of the infinite, and of the more and less which pours through body and soul alike and the others we shall refer to the class which has measure.

Pro Quite right, Socrates.

Soc Still there is something more to be considered about pleasures.

Pro What is it?

Soc When you speak of purity and clearness, or of excess abundance, greatness and sufficiency in what relation do these terms stand to truth?

Pro Why do you ask Socrates?

Soc Because, Protarchus I should wish to test pleasure and knowledge in every possible way in order that if there be a pure and impure element in either of them, I may present the pure element for judgment, and then they will be more easily judged of by you and by me and by all of us

Pro Most true.

Soc Let us investigate all the pure kinds first selecting for consideration a single instance.

Pro What instance shall we select?

[53] Soc Suppose that we first of all take whiteness.

Pro Very good

Soc How can there be purity in whiteness, and what purity? Is that purest which is greatest or most in quantity or that which is most unadulterated and freest from any admixture of other colours?

Pro Clearly that which is most unadulterated.

Soc True, Protarchus and so the purest white, and not the greatest or largest in quantity is to be deemed truest and most beautiful?

Pro Right.

Soc And we shall be quite right in saying that a little pure white is whiter and fairer and truer than a great deal that is mixed

Pro Perfectly right.

Soc There is no need of adducing many similar examples in illustration of the argument about pleasures one such is sufficient to prove to us that a small pleasure or a small amount of pleasure, if pure or unalloyed with pain, is always pleasanter and truer and fairer than a great pleasure or a great amount of pleasure of another kind.

Pro Assuredly and the instance you have given is quite sufficient.

Soc But what do you say of another question —have we not heard that pleasure is always a generation, and has no true being? Do

Pro Proceed

Soc Is not envy an unrighteous pleasure and also an unrighteous pain?

is nothing else, but that good is in the soul only; and that the only good of the soul is pleasure; and that courage or temperance or understanding, or any other good of the soul, is not really a good?—and is there not yet a further absurdity in our being compelled to say that he who has a feeling of pain and not of pleasure is bad at the time when he is suffering pain, even though he be the best of men; and again, that he who has a feeling of pleasure, in so far as he is pleased at the time when he is pleased, in that degree excels in virtue?

Pro. Nothing, Socrates, can be more irrational than all this.

Soc. And now, having subjected pleasure to every sort of test, let us not appear to be too sparing of mind and knowledge: let us ring their metal bravely, and see if there be unsoundness in any part, until we have found out what in them is of the purest nature; and then the truest elements both of pleasure and knowledge may be brought up for judgment.

Pro. Right.

Soc. Knowledge has two parts,—the one productive, and the other educational?

Pro. True.

Soc. And in the productive or handicraft arts, is not one part more akin to knowledge, and the other less; and may not the one part be regarded as the pure, and the other as the impure?

Pro. Certainly.

Soc. Let us separate the superior or dominant elements in each of them.

Pro. What are they, and how do you separate them?

Soc. I mean to say, that if arithmetic, mensuration, and weighing be taken away from any art, that which remains will not be much.

Pro. Not much, certainly.

Soc. The rest will be only conjecture, and the better use of the senses which is given by experience and practice, in addition to a certain power of guessing, which is commonly called art, and is perfected by attention and pains. [56]

Pro. Nothing more, assuredly.

Soc. Music, for instance, is full of this empiricism; for sounds are harmonized, not by measure, but by skilful conjecture; the music of the flute is always trying to guess the pitch of each vibrating note, and is therefore mixed up with much that is doubtful and has little which is certain.

Pro. Most true.

Soc. And the same will be found to hold good of medicine and husbandry and piloting and generalship.

Pro. Very true.

Soc. The art of the builder, on the other hand, which uses a number of measures and instruments, attains by their help to a greater degree of accuracy than the other arts.

Pro. How is that?

Soc. In ship-building and house-building, and in other branches of the art of carpentering, the builder has his rule, lathe, compass, line, and a most ingenious machine for straightening wood.

Pro. Very true, Socrates.

Soc. Then now let us divide the arts of which we were speaking into two kinds,—the arts which, like music, are less exact in their results, and those which, like carpentering, are more exact.

Pro. Let us make that division.

Soc. Of the latter class, the most exact of all are those which we just now spoke of as primary.

Pro. I see that you mean arithmetic, and the kindred arts of weighing and measuring.

Soc. Certainly, Protarchus; but are not these also distinguishable into two kinds?

Pro. What are the two kinds?

Soc. In the first place, arithmetic is of two kinds, one of which is popular, and the other philosophical.

Pro. How would you distinguish them?

Soc. There is a wide difference between them, Protarchus; some arithmeticians reckon unequal units; as for example, two armies, two oxen, two very large things or two very small things. The party who are opposed to them insist that every unit in ten thousand must be the same as every other unit.

Pro. Undoubtedly there is, as you say, a great difference among the votaries of the science; and there may be reasonably supposed to be two sorts of arithmetic.

Soc. And when we compare the art of mensuration which is used in building with philosophical geometry [57] or the art of computation which is used in trading with exact calculation, shall we say of either of the pairs that it is one or two?

Pro. On the analogy of what has preceded, I should be of opinion that they were severally two.

Soc. Right; but do you understand why I have discussed the subject?

Pro. I think so, but I should like to be told by you.

not certain ingenious philosophers teach this doctrine, and ought not we to be grateful to them?

Pro What do they mean?

Soc I will explain to you my dear Protarchus what they mean by putting a question

Pro Ask and I will answer

Soc I assume that there are two natures one self existent and the other ever in want of something

Pro What manner of natures are they?

Soc The one majestic ever the other inferior

Pro You speak riddles

Soc You have seen loves good and fair, and also brave lovers of them

Pro I should think so

Soc Search the universe for two terms which are like these two and are present everywhere

Pro Yet a third time I must say Be a little plainer, Socrates

Soc There is no difficulty, Protarchus the argument is only in play and insinuates that some things are for the sake of something else (relatives) and that other things are the ends to which the former class subserve (absolutes)

Pro Your many repetitions make me slow to understand

[54] Soc As the argument proceeds my boy I dare say that the meaning will become clearer

Pro Very likely

Soc Here are two new principles

Pro What are they?

Soc One is the generation of all things and the other is essence

Pro I readily accept from you both generation and essence

Soc Very right and would you say that generation is for the sake of essence or essence for the sake of generation?

Pro You want to know whether that which is called essence is, properly speaking, for the sake of generation?

Soc Yes

Pro By the gods, I wish that you would repeat your question

Soc I mean O my Protarchus to ask whether you would tell me that ship building is for the sake of ships or ships for the sake of shipbuilding? and in all similar cases I should ask the same question

Pro Why do you not answer yourself Socrates?

Soc I have no objection but you must take your part

Pro Certainly

Soc My answer is that all things instrumental remedial material are given to us with a view to generation and that each generation is relative to or for the sake of some being or essence, and that the whole of generation is relative to the whole of essence

Pro Assuredly

Soc Then pleasure being a generation must surely be for the sake of some essence?

Pro True

Soc And that for the sake of which something else is done must be placed in the class of good and that which is done for the sake of something else in some other class my good friend

Pro Most certainly

Soc Then pleasure being a generation will be rightly placed in some other class than that of good?

Pro Quite right

Soc Then as I said at first, we ought to be very grateful to him who first pointed out that pleasure was a generation only and had no true being at all for he is clearly one who laughs at the notion of pleasure being a good.

Pro Assuredly

Soc And he would surely laugh also at those who make generation their highest end

Pro Of whom are you speaking and what do they mean?

Soc I am speaking of those who when they are cured of hunger or thirst or any other defect by some process of generation are delighted at the process as if it were pleasure and they say that they would not wish to live without these and other feelings of a like kind which might be mentioned

[55] Pro That is certainly what they appear to think

Soc And is not destruction universally admitted to be the opposite of generation?

Pro Certainly

Soc Then he who chooses thus would choose generation and destruction rather than that third sort of life in which as we were saying was neither pleasure nor pain but only the purest possible thought

Pro He who would make us believe pleasure to be a good is involved in great absurdities Socrates.

Soc Great, indeed and there is yet another of them

Pro What is it?

Soc Is there not an absurdity in arguing that there is nothing good or noble in the body or

Pro Very true

Soc And can we say that any of these things ich neither are nor have been nor will be changeable when judged by the strict rule truth, ever become certain?

Pro Impossible

Soc How can anything fixed be concerned th that which has no fixedness?

Pro How indeed?

Soc Then mind and science when employed out such changing things do not attain the ghest truth?

Pro I should imagine not.

Soc And now let us bid farewell a long fare ll, to you or me or Philebus or Gorgias and ge on behalf of the argument a single point.

Pro What point?

Soc Let us say that the stable and pure and ie and unalloyed has to do with the things ich are eternal and unchangeable and un xed, or if not, at any rate what is most akin them has and that all other things are to be iced in a second or inferior class.

Pro Very true

Soc And of the names expressing cognition, ght not the fairest to be given to the fairest ngs?

Pro That is natural

Soc And are not mind and wisdom the mes which are to be honoured most?

Pro Yes.

Soc And these names may be said to have ir truest and most exact application when e mind is engaged in the contemplation of e being?

Pro Certainly

Soc And these were the names which I added of the rivals of pleasure?

Pro Very true, Socrates.

Soc In the next place as to the mixture, here the ingredients pleasure and wisdom and may be compared to artists who have their terials ready to their hands

Pro Yes

Soc And now we must begin to mix them?

Pro By all means

Soc But had we not better have a preliminary d and refresh our memories?

Pro Of what?

Soc Of that which I have already mentioned ll says the proverb [60] that we ought to at twice and even thrice that which is good

Pro Certainly

Soc Well then by Zeus, let us proceed and I ll make what I believe to be a fair summary the argument.

Pro Let me hear

Soc Philebus says that pleasure is the true end of all living beings at which all ought to aim and moreover that it is the chief good of all and that the two names good and pleasant are correctly given to one thing and one nature Socrates on the other hand begins by denying this and further says, that in nature as in name they are two and that wisdom partakes more than pleasure of the good Is not and was not this what we were saying Protarchus?

Pro Certainly

Soc And is there not and was there not a further point which was conceded between us?

Pro What was it?

Soc That the good differs from all other things

Pro In what respect?

Soc In that the being who possesses good always everywhere and in all things has the most perfect sufficiency and is never in need of anything else.

Pro Exactly

Soc And did we not endeavour to make an imaginary separation of wisdom and pleasure, assigning to each a distinct life so that pleasure was wholly excluded from wisdom and wisdom in like manner had no part whatever in pleasure?

Pro We did.

Soc And did we think that either of them alone would be sufficient?

Pro Certainly not

Soc And if we erred in any point, then let any one who will, take up the enquiry again and set us right and assuming memory and wisdom and knowledge and true opinion to belong to the same class, let him consider whether he would desire to possess or acquire —I will not say pleasure however abundant or intense if he has no real perception that he is pleased, nor any consciousness of what he feels, nor any recollection however momentary of the feeling—but would he desire to have anything at all if these faculties were wanting to him? And about wisdom I ask the same question can you conceive that any one would choose to have all wisdom absolutely devoid of pleasure rather than with a certain degree of pleasure or all pleasure devoid of wisdom rather than with a certain degree of wisdom?

Pro Certainly not Socrates but why repeat such questions any more?

[61] Soc Then the perfect and universally

Soc The argument has all along been seeking a parallel to pleasure and true to that original design, has gone on to ask whether one sort of knowledge is purer than another, as one pleasure is purer than another

Pro Clearly that was the intention

Soc And has not the argument in what has preceded already shown that the arts have different provinces and vary in their degrees of certainty?

Pro Very true

Soc And just now did not the argument first designate a particular art by a common term thus making us believe in the unity of that art and then again as if speaking of two different things proceed to enquire whether the art as pursed by philosophers or as pursued by non philosophers has more of certainty and purity?

Pro That is the very question which the argument is asking

Soc And how Protarchus, shall we answer the enquiry?

Pro O Socrates we have reached a point at which the difference of clearness in different kinds of knowledge is enormous

Soc Then the answer will be the easier

Pro Certainly and let us say in reply that those arts into which arithmetic and mensuration enter far surpass all others and that of these the arts or sciences which are animated by the pure philosophic impulse are infinitely supe[illegible] in accuracy and truth

Soc Then [illegible] your judgment and this is the answer which upon your authority we will give to all masters of the art [illegible] of misinterpretation?

Pro What answer? [55]

Soc That there are two arts of arithmetic and two of mensuration and also several other arts which in like manner have this double nature and yet only one name

Pro Let us boldly return this answer to the masters of whom you speak Socrates and hope for good luck

Soc We have explained what we term the most exact arts or sciences

Pro Very good

Soc And yet, Protarchus dialectic will refuse to acknowledge us if we do not award to her the first place

[58] Pro And pray what is dialectic?

Soc Clearly the science which has to do with all that knowledge of which we are now speaking for I am sure that all men who have a grain of intelligence will admit that the knowledge which has to do with being and reality [illegible] and sameness and unchangeableness, is [illegible] the truest of all But how would you [illegible] this question Protarchus?

Pro I have often heard Gorgias [illegible] Socrates that the art of persuasion far [illegible] passed every other this as he says, is by [illegible] the best of them all for to it all things [illegible] not by compulsion but of their own free [illegible] Now I should not like to quarrel either [illegible] you or with him

Soc You mean to say that you would [illegible] to desert if you were not ashamed?

Pro As you please

Soc May I not have led you into a [illegible]hension?

Pro How?

Soc Dear Protarchus, I never [illegible] was the greatest or best or usefullest of [illegible] sciences, but which had clearness and [illegible] and the greatest amount of truth, [illegible] humble and little useful an art [illegible] Gorgias, if you do not deny that his art has the advantage in usefulness to mankind, he [illegible] not quarrel with you for saying that the study of which I am speaking is superior in this particular of essential truth [illegible] of white colours, a little whiteness, if that [illegible] be only pure, was said to be superior [illegible] to a great mass which is impure [illegible] let us give our best attention and [illegible] not the comparative use or reputation of the sciences, but the power or faculty, if there be such which the soul has of loving the truth and of doing all things for the sake of it [illegible] search into the pure element of mind and intelligence, and then [illegible] whether the science of which I have been speaking is most likely to possess the faculty, or whether there be some other which has higher claims.

[illegible]

And is r[illegible] with the o[illegible] claims[illegible] than any other science or art [illegible]

Pro W[illegible] who [illegible] hardly thin[illegible] and destin[illegible] a firmer grasp [illegible]

[59] Soc Do you [illegible] that the arts in ge[illegible] them make use of op[illegible] engaged in the investig[illegible]ion? Even he who supp[illegible] pied with nature is re[illegible] things of this world ho[illegible] or acted upon Is not th[illegible] in which his life is spen[illegible]

Pro True

Soc He is labouring [illegible] but about things which [illegible]

Pro Very true.

Soc And can we say that any of these things which neither are nor have been nor will be unchangeable when judged by the strict rule of truth, ever become certain?

Pro Impossible

Soc How can anything fixed be concerned with that which has no fixedness?

Pro How indeed?

Soc Then mind and science when employed about such changing things do not attain the highest truth?

Pro I should imagine not.

Soc And now let us bid farewell a long farewell to you or me or Philebus or Gorgias and urge on behalf of the argument a single point

Pro What point?

Soc Let us say that the stable and pure and true and unalloyed has to do with the things which are eternal and unchangeable and unmixed, or if not, at any rate what is most akin to them has and that all other things are to be placed in a second or inferior class

Pro Very true

Soc And of the names expressing cognition, ought not the fairest to be given to the fairest things?

Pro That s natural

Soc And are not mind and wisdom the names which are to be hon ured most?

Pro Yes

Soc And these names may be said to have their truest and most exact application when the mind is engaged in the contemplation of true being?

Pro Certainly

Soc And these were the names which I adduced of the rivals of pleasure?

Pro Very true, Socrates.

Soc In the next place as to the mixture here are the ingredients pleasure and wisdom and we may be compared to artists who have their materials ready to their hands

Pro Yes

Soc And now we must begin to mix them?

Pro By all means

Soc But had we not better have a preliminary word and refresh our memories?

Pro Of what?

Soc Of that which I have already mentioned Well says the proverb [60] that we ought to repeat twice and even thrice that which is good

Pro Certainly

Soc Well then by Zeus let us proceed and I will make what I believe to be a fair summary of the argument.

Pro Let me hear

Soc Philebus says that pleasure is the true end of all living beings at which all ought to aim and moreover that it is the chief good of all and that the two names "good" and "pleasant" are correctly given to one thing and one nature Socrates, on the other hand begins by denying this and further says that in nature as in name they are two, and that wisdom partakes more than pleasure of the good Is not and was not this what we were saying Protarchus?

Pro Certainly

Soc And is there not and was there not a further point which was conceded between us?

Pro What was it?

Soc That the good differs from all other things

Pro In what respect?

Soc In that the being who possesses good always everywhere and in all things has the most perfect sufficiency and is never in need of anything else

Pro Exactly

Soc And did we not endeavour to make an imaginary separation of wisdom and pleasure, assigning to each a distinct life so that pleasure was wholly excluded from wisdom and wisdom in like manner had no part whatever in pleasure?

Pro We did.

Soc And did we think that either of them alone would be sufficient?

Pro Certainly not.

Soc And if we erred in any point, then let any one who will, take up the enquiry again and set us right and assuming memory and wisdom and knowledge and true opinion to belong to the same class let him consider whether he would desire to possess or acquire —I will not say pleasure however abundant or intense if he has no real perception that he is pleased nor any consciousness of what he feels, nor any recollection however momentary of the feeling—but would he desire to have anything at all if these faculties were wanting to him? And about wisdom I ask the same question can you conceive that any one would choose to have all wisdom absolutely devoid of pleasure rather than with a certain degree of pleasure or all pleasure devoid of wisdom rather than with a certain degree of wisdom?

Pro Certainly not Socrates but why repeat such questions any more?

[61] Soc Then the perfect and universally

Soc Also we said that truth was to form an element in the mixture

[65] Pro Certainly

Soc Then if we are not able to hunt the good with one idea only with three we may catch our prey Beauty Symmetry Truth are the three and these taken together we may regard as the single cause of the mixture and the mixture as being good by reason of the infusion of them

Pro Quite right

Soc And now Protarchus any man could decide well enough whether pleasure or wisdom is more akin to the highest good and more honourable among gods and men

Pro Clearly and yet perhaps the argument had better be pursued to the end

Soc We must take each of them separately in their relation to pleasure and mind and pronounce upon them for we ought to see to which of the two they are severally most akin

Pro You are speaking of beauty truth, and measure?

Soc Yes Protarchus take truth first and after passing in review mind truth pleasure pause awhile and make answer to yourself—as to whether pleasure or mind is more akin to truth

Pro There is no need to pause for the difference between them is palpable pleasure is the veriest impostor in the world and it is said that in the pleasures of love, which appear to be the greatest perjury is excused by the gods for pleasures like children have not the least particle of reason in them whereas mind is either the same as truth or the most like truth and the truest

Soc Shall we next consider measure in like manner and ask whether pleasure has more of this than wisdom or wisdom than pleasure?

Pro Here is another question which may be easily answered for I imagine that nothing can ever be more immoderate than the transports of pleasure or more in conformity with measure than mind and knowledge

Soc Very good, but there still remains the third test Has mind a greater share of beauty than pleasure and is mind or pleasure the fairer of the two?

Pro No one, Socrates either awake or dreaming ever saw or imagined mind or wisdom to be in aught unseemly at any time past present or future

Soc Right

Pro But when we see some one indulging in pleasures perhaps in the greatest of pleasures [66] the ridiculous or disgraceful nature of the action makes us ashamed and so we put them out of sight and consign them to darkness, under the idea that they ought not to meet the eye of day

Soc Then Protarchus, you will proclaim everywhere by word of mouth to this company and by messengers bearing the tidings far and wide, that pleasure is not the first of possessions nor yet the second but that in measure and the mean and the suitable and the like, the eternal nature has been found

Pro Yes that seems to be the result of what has been now said

Soc In the second class is contained the symmetrical and beautiful and perfect or sufficient and all which are of that family

Pro True

Soc And if you reckon in the third class mind and wisdom you will not be far wrong if I divine aright.

Pro I dare say

Soc And would you not put in the fourth class the goods which we were affirming to appertain specially to the soul—sciences and arts and true opinions as we called them? These come after the third class and form the fourth as they are certainly more akin to good than pleasure is

Pro Surely

Soc The fifth class are the pleasures which were defined by us as painless being the pure pleasures of the soul herself as we termed them which accompany some the sciences and some the senses

Pro Perhaps

Soc And now as Orpheus says

With the sixth generation cease the glory of my song

Here at the sixth award let us make an end all that remains is to set the crown on our discourse

Pro True

Soc Then let us sum up and reassert what has been said thus offering the third libation to the saviour Zeus

Pro How?

Soc Philebus affirmed that pleasure was always and absolutely the good

Pro I understand this third libation Socrates of which you spoke meant a recapitulation

Soc Yes but listen to the sequel convinced of what I have just been saying and feeling indignant at the doctrine which is maintained not by Philebus only but by thousands of others, I affirmed that mind was far better and far more excellent, as an element of human life, than pleasure

Pro. True.

Soc. But, suspecting that there were other things which were also better I went on to say, that if there was anything better than either, then I would claim the second place for mind over pleasure, and pleasure would lose the second place as well as the first.

Pro. You did

[67] Soc. Nothing could be more satisfactorily shown than the unsatisfactory nature of both of them.

Pro. Very true.

Soc. The claims both of pleasure and mind to be the absolute good have been entirely disproven in this argument, because they are both wanting in self sufficiency and also in adequacy and perfection.

Pro. Most true.

Soc. But, though they must both resign in favour of another mind is ten thousand times nearer and more akin to the nature of the conqueror than pleasure.

Pro. Certainly

Soc. And, according to the judgment which has now been given, pleasure will rank fifth

Pro. True.

Soc. But not first no not even if all the oxen and horses and animals in the world by their pursuit of enjoyment proclaim her to be so — although the many trusting in them, as diviners trust in birds, determine that pleasures make up the good of life, and deem the lusts of animals to be better witnesses than the inspirations of divine philosophy

Pro. And now Socrates, we tell you that the truth of what you have been saying is approved by the judgment of all of us

Soc. And will you let me go?

Pro. There is a little which yet remains, and I will remind you of it, for I am sure that you will not be the first to go away from an argument.

Soc Also we said that truth was to form an element in the mixture

[65] Pro Certainly

Soc Then if we are not able to hunt the good with one idea only, with three we may catch our prey Beauty Symmetry Truth are the three and these taken together we may regard as the single cause of the mixture and the mixture as being good by reason of the infusion of them es to protect an army they should be continued in peace. For what men in general term peace would be said by him to be only a name in reality every city is in a natural state of war with every other not indeed proclaimed by heralds, but everlasting. And if you look closely you will find that this was the intention of the Cretan legislator all institutions, private as well as public, were arranged by him with a view to war in giving them he was under the impression that no possessions or institutions are of any value to him who is defeated in battle for all the good things of the conquered pass into the hands of the conquerors.

Ath You appear to me, Stranger to have been thoroughly trained in the Cretan institutions, and to be well informed about them will you tell me a little more explicitly what is the principle of government which you would lay down? You seem to imagine that a well-governed state ought to be so ordered as to conquer all other states in war am I right in supposing this to be your meaning?

Cle Certainly and our Lacedaemonian friend, if I am not mistaken, will agree with me.

Meg Why my good friend, how could any Lacedaemonian say anything else?

Ath. And is what you say applicable only to states, or also to villages?

Cle To both alike.

Ath. The case is the same?

Cle Yes.

Ath And in the village will there be the same war of family against family and of individual against individual

Cle The same.

Ath. And should each man conceive himself to be his own enemy —what shall we say?

Cle O Athenian Stranger—inhabitant of Attica I will not call you, for you seem to deserve rather to be named after the goddess herself, because you go back to first principles—you have thrown light upon the argument, and will now be better able to understand what I was just saying—that all men are publicly one another's enemies, and each man privately his own.

(Ath My good sir what do you mean?)—

Cle Moreover there is a victory and defeat—the first and best of victories, the lowest and worst of defeats—which each man gains or sustains at the hands, not of another but of himself this shows that there is a war against ourselves going on within every one of us.

[627] Ath Let us now reverse the order of the argument Seeing that every individual is either his own superior or his own inferior may we say that there is the same principle in the house, the village, and the state?

Cle You mean that in each of them there is a principle of superiority or inferiority to self?

Ath Yes.

Cle You are quite right in asking the question, for there certainly is such a principle, and above all in states and the state in which the better citizens win a victory over the mob and over the inferior classes may be truly said to be better than itself, and may be justly praised, where such a victory is gained, or censured in the opposite case

Ath Whether the better is ever really conquered by the worse is a question which requires more discussion, and may be therefore left for the present. But I now quite understand your meaning when you say that citizens who are of the same race and live in the same cities may unjustly conspire, and having the superiority in numbers may overcome and enslave the few just and when they prevail, the state may be truly called its own inferior and therefore bad and when they are defeated, its own superior and therefore good.

Cle Your remark, Stranger is a paradox, and yet we cannot possibly deny it.

Ath. Here is another case for consideration —in a family there may be several brothers, who are the offspring of a single pair very possibly the majority of them may be unjust, and the just may be in a minority

Cle Very possibly

Ath And you and I ought not to raise a question of words as to whether this family and household are rightly said to be superior when they conquer and inferior when they are conquered for we are not now considering what may or may not be the proper or customary way of speaking, but we are considering the natural principles of right and wrong in laws.

Cle What you say Stranger is most true.

Meg Quite excellent, in my opinion, as far as we have gone.

Ath Again might there not be a judge over these brethren, of whom we were speaking

Cle Certainly

Ath Now which would be the better judge —one who destroyed the bad and appointed the good to govern themselves or one who, while allowing the good to govern let the bad live, and made them voluntarily submit? Or [624] Athenian Stranger TELL me Strangers is a God or some man supposed to be the author of your laws?

Cleinias A God Stranger in very truth a God among us Cretans he is said to have been Zeus but in Lacedaemon whence our friend here comes I believe they would say that Apollo is their lawgiver would they not Megillus?

Megillus Certainly

Ath And do you Cleinias believe as Homer tells that every ninth year Minos went to converse with his Olympian sire and was inspired by him to make laws for your cities?

Cle Yes that is our tradition and there was Rhadamanthus a brother of his with whose name you are familiar he is reputed to have been the justest of men [625] and we Cretans are of opinion that he earned this reputation from his righteous administration of justice when he was alive

Ath Yes and a noble reputation it was worthy of a son of Zeus As you and Megillus have been trained in these institutions I dare say that you will not be unwilling to give an account of your government and laws on our way we can pass the time pleasantly in talking about them for I am told that the distance from Cnosus to the cave and temple of Zeus is considerable and doubtless there are shady places under the lofty trees which will protect us from this scorching sun Being no longer young we may often stop to rest beneath them and get over the whole journey without difficulty beguiling the time by conversation

Cyrnus, he who is faithful in a civil broil is worth his weight in gold and silver.

And such an one is far better, as we affirm, than the other in a more difficult kind of war, much in the same degree as justice and temperance and wisdom, when united with courage, are better than courage only; for a man cannot be faithful and good in civil strife without having all virtue. But in the war of which Tyrtaeus speaks, many a mercenary soldier will take his stand and be ready to die at his post, and yet they are generally and almost without exception insolent, unjust, violent men, and the most senseless of human beings. You will ask what the conclusion is, and what I am seeking to prove: I maintain that the divine legislator of Crete, like any other who is worthy of consideration, will always and above all things in making laws have regard to the greatest virtue; which, according to Theognis, is loyalty in the hour of danger, and may be truly called perfect justice. Whereas, that virtue which Tyrtaeus highly praises is well enough, and was praised by the poet at the right time, yet in place and dignity may be said to be only fourth-rate.

Cle. Stranger, we are degrading our inspired lawgiver to a rank which is far beneath him.

Ath. Nay, I think that we degrade not him but ourselves, if we imagine that Lycurgus and Minos laid down laws both in Lacedaemon and Crete mainly with a view to war.

Cle. What ought we to say then?

Ath. What truth and what justice require of us, if I am not mistaken, when speaking in behalf of divine excellence;—that the legislator when making his laws had in view not a part only, and this the lowest part of virtue, but all virtue, and that he devised classes of laws answering to the kinds of virtue; not in the way in which modern inventors of laws make the classes, for they only investigate and offer laws whenever a want is felt, and one man has a class of laws about allotments and heiresses, another about assaults; others about ten thousand other such matters. [631] But we maintain that the right way of examining into laws is to proceed as we have now done, and I admired the spirit of your exposition; for you were quite right in beginning with virtue, and saying that this was the aim of the giver of the law, but I thought that you went wrong when you added that all his legislation had a view only to a part, and the least part of virtue, and this called forth my subsequent remarks. Will you allow me then to explain how I should have liked to have heard you expound the matter?

Cle. By all means.

Ath. You ought to have said, Stranger—The Cretan laws are with reason famous among the Hellenes; for they fulfil the object of laws, which is to make those who use them happy; and they confer every sort of good. Now goods are of two kinds: there are human and there are divine goods, and the human hang upon the divine; and the state which attains the greater, at the same time acquires the less, or, not having the greater, has neither. Of the lesser goods the first is health, the second beauty, the third strength, including swiftness in running and bodily agility generally, and the fourth is wealth, not the blind god [Pluto], but one who is keen of sight, if only he has wisdom for his companion. For wisdom is chief and leader of the divine class of goods, and next follows temperance; and from the union of these two with courage springs justice, and fourth in the scale of virtue is courage. All these naturally take precedence of the other goods, and this is the order in which the legislator must place them, and after them he will enjoin the rest of his ordinances on the citizens with a view to these, the human looking to the divine, and the divine looking to their leader mind. Some of his ordinances will relate to contracts of marriage which they make one with another, and then to the procreation and education of children, both male and female; the duty of the lawgiver will be to take charge of his citizens, in youth and age, and at every time of life, and to give them punishments and rewards; and in reference to all their intercourse with one another, he ought to consider their pains and pleasures and desires, and the vehemence of all their passions; he should keep a watch over them, and blame and praise them rightly by the mouth of the laws themselves. [632] Also with regard to anger and terror, and the other perturbations of the soul, which arise out of misfortune, and the deliverances from them which prosperity brings, and the experiences which come to men in diseases, or in war, or poverty, or the opposite of these; in all these states he should determine and teach what is the good and evil of the condition of each. In the next place, the legislator has to be careful how the citizens make their money and in what way they spend it, and to have an eye to their mutual contracts and dissolutions of contracts, whether voluntary or involuntary: he should

It ranks after justice, temperance, and wisdom.

third I suppose in the scale of excellence might be placed a judge, [628] who finding the family distracted not only did not destroy any one but reconciled them to one another for ever after and gave them laws which they mutually observed and was able to keep them friends

Cle The last would be by far the best sort of judge and legislator

Ath And yet the aim of all the laws which he gave would be the reverse of war

Cle Very true

Ath And will he who constitutes the state and orders the life of man have in view external war or that kind of intestine war called civil which no one if he could prevent would like to have occurring in his own state and when occurring every one would wish to be quit of as soon as possible?

Cle He would have the latter chiefly in view

Ath And would he prefer that this civil war should be terminated by the destruction of one of the parties and by the victory of the other or that peace and friendship should be re-established and that, being reconciled they should give their attention to foreign enemies?

Cle Every one would desire the latter in the case of his own state

Ath And would not that also be the desire of the legislator?

Cle Certainly

Ath And would not every one always make laws for the sake of the best?

Cle To be sure

Ath But war whether external or civil is not the best and the need of either is to be deprecated but peace with one another and good will are best Nor is the victory of the state over itself to be regarded as a really good thing but as a necessity a man might as well say that the body was in the best state when sick and purged by medicine forgetting that there is also a state of the body which needs no purge And in like manner no one can be a true statesman whether he aims at the happiness of the individual or state who looks only or first of all to external warfare nor will he ever be a sound legislator who orders peace for the sake of war and not war for the sake of peace

Cle I suppose that there is truth Stranger in that remark of yours and yet I am greatly mistaken if war is not the entire aim and object of our own institutions and also of the Lacedaemonian

[629] Ath I dare say but there is no reason why we should rudely quarrel with one another about your legislators instead of gently questioning them seeing that both we and they are equally in earnest Please follow me and the argument closely —And first I will put forward Tyrtaeus an Athenian by birth but also a Spartan citizen who of all men was most eager about war Well he says I sing not I care not about any man even if he were the richest of men and possessed every good (and then he gives a whole list of them) if he be not at all times a brave warrior I imagine that you too must have heard his poems our Lacedaemonian friend has probably heard more than enough of them

Meg Very true

Cle And they have found their way from Lacedaemon to Crete

Ath Come now and let us all join in asking this question of Tyrtaeus O most divine poet, we will say to him the excellent praise which you have bestowed on those who excel in war sufficiently proves that you are wise and good and I and Megillus and Cleinias of Cnosus do, as I believe entirely agree with you But we should like to be quite sure that we are speaking of the same men tell us then do you agree with us in thinking that there are two kinds of war or what would you say? A far inferior man to Tyrtaeus would have no difficulty in replying quite truly that war is of two kinds—one which is universally called civil war and is as we were just now saying of all wars the worst the other as we should all admit in which we fall out with other nations who are of a different race, is a far milder form of warfare

Cle Certainly far milder

Ath Well now when you praise and blame war in this high flown strain whom are you praising or blaming and to which kind of war are you referring? I suppose that you must mean foreign war if I am to judge from expressions of yours in which you say that you abominate those

Who refuse to look upon fields of blood and will not draw near and strike at their enemies

And we shall naturally go on to say to him—You Tyrtaeus as it seems praise those who distinguish themselves in external and foreign war and he must admit this

Cle Evidently

Ath They are good but we say that there are still better men whose virtue is displayed in the greatest of all battles [630] And we too have a poet whom we summon as a witness, Theognis citizen of Megara in Sicily

Meg. I was able to tell you, Stranger, many laws which were directed against pain; but I do not know that I can point out any great or obvious examples of similar institutions which are concerned with pleasure; there are some lesser provisions, however, which I might mention.

Cle. Neither can I show anything of that sort which is at all equally prominent in the Cretan laws.

Ath. No wonder, my dear friends; and if, as is very likely, in our search after the true and good, one of us may have to censure the laws of the others, we must not be offended, but take kindly what another says.

Cle. You are quite right, Athenian Stranger, and we will do as you say.

Ath. At our time of life, Cleinias, there should be no feeling of irritation.

Cle. Certainly not.

Ath. I will not at present determine whether he who censures the Cretan or Lacedaemonian polities is right or wrong. But I believe that I can tell better than either of you what the many say about them. For assuming that you have reasonably good laws, one of the best of them will be the law forbidding any young men to enquire which of them are right or wrong; but with one mouth and one voice they must all agree that the laws are all good, for they came from God; and any one who says the contrary is not to be listened to. But an old man who remarks any defect in your laws may communicate his observation to a ruler or to an equal in years when no young man is present.

[635] Cle. Exactly so, Stranger; and like a diviner, although not there at the time, you seem to me quite to have hit the meaning of the legislator, and to say what is most true.

Ath. As there are no young men present, and the legislator has given old men free licence, there will be no impropriety in our discussing these very matters now that we are alone.

Cle. True. And therefore you may be as free as you like in your censure of our laws, for there is no discredit in knowing what is wrong; he who receives what is said in a generous and friendly spirit will be all the better for it.

Ath. Very good; however, I am not going to say anything against your laws until to the best of my ability I have examined them, but I am going to raise doubts about them. For you are the only people known to us, whether Greek or barbarian, whom the legislator commanded to eschew all great pleasures and amusements and never to touch them; whereas in the matter of pains or fears which we have just been discussing, he thought that they who from infancy had always avoided pains and fears and sorrows, when they were compelled to face them would run away from those who were hardened in them, and would become their subjects. Now the legislator ought to have considered that this was equally true of pleasure; he should have said to himself, that if our citizens are from their youth upward unacquainted with the greatest pleasures, and unused to endure amid the temptations of pleasure, and are not disciplined to refrain from all things evil, the sweet feeling of pleasure will overcome them just as fear would overcome the former class, and in another and even a worse manner they will be the slaves of those who are able to endure amid pleasures, and have had the opportunity of enjoying them, they being often the worst of mankind. One half of their souls will be a slave, the other half free; and they will not be worthy to be called in the true sense men and freemen. Tell me whether you assent to my words?

Cle. On first hearing, what you say appears to be the truth; but to be hasty in coming to a conclusion about such important matters would be very childish and simple.

Ath. Suppose, Cleinias and Megillus, that we consider the virtue which follows next of those which we intended to discuss (for after courage comes temperance), what institutions shall we find relating to temperance, either in Crete or Lacedaemon, which, like your military institutions, differ from those of any ordinary state.

[636] Meg. That is not an easy question to answer; still I should say that the common meals and gymnastic exercises have been excellently devised for the promotion both of temperance and courage.

Ath. There seems to be a difficulty, Stranger, with regard to states, in making words and facts coincide so that there can be no dispute about them. As in the human body, the regimen which does good in one way does harm in another; and we can hardly say that any one course of treatment is adapted to a particular constitution. Now the gymnasia and common meals do a great deal of good, and yet they are a source of evil in civil troubles; as is shown in the case of the Milesian, and Boeotian, and Thurian youth, among whom these institutions seem always to have had a tendency to degrade the ancient and natural custom of love below

see how they order all this and consider where justice as well as injustice is found or is wanting in their several dealings with one another and honour those who obey the law and impose fixed penalties on those who disobey, until the round of civil life is ended and the time has come for the consideration of the proper funeral rites and honours of the dead And the lawgiver reviewing his work, will appoint guardians to preside over these things—some who walk by intelligence others by true opinion only and then mind will bind together all his ordinances and show them to be in harmony with temperance and justice and not with wealth or ambition This is the spirit, Stranger in which I was and am desirous that you should pursue the subject And I want to know the nature of all these things, and how they are arranged in the laws of Zeus as they are termed and in those of the Pythian Apollo, which Minos and Lycurgus gave and how the order of them is discovered to his eyes who has experience in laws gained either by study or habit although they are far from being self evident to the rest of mankind like ourselves

Cle How shall we proceed Stranger?

Ath I think that we must begin again as before and first consider the habit of courage and then we will go on and discuss another and then another form of virtue if you please In this way we shall have a model of the whole and with these and similar discourses we will beguile the way And when we have gone through all the virtues we will show by the grace of God that the institutions of which I was speaking look to virtue

[633] Meg Very good and suppose that you first criticize this praiser of Zeus and the laws of Crete

Ath I will try to criticize you and myself as well as him for the argument is a common concern Tell me—were not first the syssitia and secondly the gymnasia invented by your legislator with a view to war?

Meg Yes

Ath And what comes third and what fourth? For that I think is the sort of enumeration which ought to be made of the remaining parts of virtue no matter whether you call them parts or what their name is provided the meaning is clear

Meg Then I or any other Lacedaemonian would reply that hunting is third in order

Ath Let us see if we can discover what comes fourth and fifth

Meg I think that I can get as far as the fourth head which is the frequent endurance of pain, exhibited among us Spartans in certain hand-to-hand fights, also in stealing with the prospect of getting a good beating there is, too, the so-called Crypteia or secret service, in which wonderful endurance is shown—our people wander over the whole country by day and by night and even in winter have not a shoe to their foot, and are without beds to lie upon and have to attend upon themselves. Marvellous too is the endurance which our citizens show in their naked exercises, contending against the violent summer heat and there are many similar practices to speak of which in detail would be endless

Ath Excellent O Lacedaemonian Stranger But how ought we to define courage? Is it to be regarded only as a combat against fears and pains or also against desires and pleasures and against flatteries which exercise such a tremendous power that they make the hearts even of respectable citizens to melt like wax?

Meg I should say the latter

Ath In what preceded as you will remember our Cnosian friend was speaking of a man or a city being inferior to themselves —Were you not Cleinias?

Cle I was

Ath Now which is in the truest sense inferior the man who is overcome by pleasure or by pain?

Cle I should say the man who is overcome by pleasure for all men deem him to be inferior in a more disgraceful sense than the other who is overcome by pain

Ath But surely the lawgivers of Crete and Lacedaemon have not legislated for a courage which is lame of one leg [634] able only to meet attacks which come from the left, but impotent against the insidious flatteries which come from the right?

Cle Able to meet both I should say

Ath Then let me once more ask what institutions have you in either of your states which give a taste of pleasures and do not avoid them any more than they avoid pains but which set a person in the midst of them and compel or induce him by the prospect of reward to get the better of them? Where is an ordinance about pleasure similar to that about pain to be found in your laws? Tell me what there is of this nature among you —What is there which makes your citizen equally brave against pleasure and pain conquering what they ought to conquer and superior to the enemies who are most dangerous and nearest home?

a wrong way Let me give you an illustration of what I mean —You may suppose a person to be praising wheat as a good kind of food where upon another person instantly blames wheat, without ever enquiring into its effect or use, or in what way or to whom, or with what, or in what state and how wheat is to be given And that is just what we are doing in this discussion. At the very mention of the word intoxication, one side is ready with their praises and the other with their censures which is absurd For either side adduce their witnesses and approvers, and some of us think that we speak with authority because we have many witnesses and others because they see those who abstain conquering in battle, and this again is disputed by us. Now I cannot say that I shall be satisfied, if we go on discussing each of the remaining laws in the same way And about this very point of intoxication I should like to speak in another way which I hold to be the right one for if number is to be the criterion, are there not myriads upon myriads of nations ready to dispute the point with you, who are only two cities

[639] Meg I shall gladly welcome any method of enquiry which is right.

Ath Let me put the matter thus —Suppose a person to praise the keeping of goats, and the creatures themselves as capital things to have, and then some one who had seen goats feeding without a goatherd in cultivated spots and doing mischief, were to censure a goat or any other animal who has no keeper or a bad keeper would there be any sense or justice in such censure?

Meg Certainly not.

Ath Does a captain require only to have nautical knowledge in order to be a good captain, whether he is sea sick or not? What do you say?

Meg I say that he is not a good captain if, although he have nautical skill he is liable to sea-sickness.

Ath And what would you say of the commander of an army? Will he be able to command merely because he has military skill if he be a coward, who, when danger comes, is sick and drunk with fear?

Meg Impossible.

Ath And what if besides being a coward he has no skill?

Meg He is a miserable fellow not fit to be a commander of men, but only of old women

Ath And what would you say of some one who blames or praises any sort of meeting which is intended by nature to have a ruler and is well enough when under his presidency? The critic, however has never seen the society meeting together at an orderly feast under the control of a president but always without a ruler or with a bad one —when observers of this class praise or blame such meetings, are we to suppose that what they say is of any value?

Meg Certainly not, if they have never seen or been present at such a meeting when rightly ordered

Ath Reflect may not banqueters and banquets be said to constitute a kind of meeting?

Meg Of course

Ath And did any one ever see this sort of convivial meeting rightly ordered? Of course you two will answer that you have never seen them at all because they are not customary or lawful in your country but I have come across many of them in many different places, and moreover I have made enquiries about them wherever I went as I may say and never did I see or hear of anything of the kind which was carried on altogether rightly in some few particulars they might be right, but in general they were utterly wrong

Cle What do you mean, Stranger by this remark? Explain. For we, as you say from our inexperience in such matters might very likely not know even if they came in our way what was right or wrong in such societies.

[640] Ath Likely enough then let me try to be your instructor You would acknowledge, would you not, that in all gatherings of mankind, of whatever sort, there ought to be a leader?

Cle Certainly I should.

Ath And we were saying just now that when men are at war the leader ought to be a brave man?

Cle We were.

Ath The brave man is less likely than the coward to be disturbed by fears?

Cle That again is true.

Ath And if there were a possibility of having a general of an army who was absolutely fearless and imperturbable, should we not by all means appoint him?

Cle Assuredly

Ath Now however we are speaking not of a general who is to command an army when foe meets foe in time of war but of one who is to regulate meetings of another sort, when friend meets friend in time of peace.

Cle True.

Ath And that sort of meeting, if attended the level not only of man but of the beasts The charge may be fairly brought against your cities above all others and is true also of most other states which especially cultivate gymnastics Whether such matters are to be regarded jestingly or seriously I think that the pleasure is to be deemed natural which arises out of the intercourse between men and women but that the intercourse of men with men, or of women with women, is contrary to nature and that the bold attempt was originally due to unbridled lust The Cretans are always accused of having invented the story of Ganymede and Zeus because they wanted to justify themselves in the enjoyment of unnatural pleasures by the practice of the god whom they believe to have been their lawgiver Leaving the story we may observe that any speculation about laws turns almost entirely on pleasure and pain both in states and in individuals these are two fountains which nature lets flow and he who draws from them where and when and as much as he ought is happy and this holds of men and animals—of individuals as well as states and he who indulges in them ignorantly and at the wrong time is the reverse of happy

Meg I admit Stranger that your words are well spoken and I hardly know what to say in answer to you but still I think that the Spartan lawgiver was quite right in forbidding pleasure Of the Cretan laws I shall leave the defence to my Cnosian friend But the laws of Sparta [637] in as far as they relate to pleasure appear to me to be the best in the world for that which leads mankind in general into the wildest pleasure and licence and every other folly the law has clean driven out and neither in the country nor in towns which are under the control of Sparta will you find revelries and the many incitements of every kind of pleasure which accompany them and any one who meets a drunken and disorderly person will immediately have him most severely punished and will not let him off on any pretence not even at the time of a Dionysiac festival although I have remarked that this may happen at your performances on the cart, as they are called and among our Tarentine colonists I have seen the whole city drunk at a Dionysiac festival but nothing of the sort happens among us

Ath O Lacedaemonian Stranger these festivities are praiseworthy where there is a spirit of endurance, but are very senseless when they are under no regulations In order to retaliate an Athenian has only to point out the licence which exists among your women To all such accusations whether they are brought against the Tarentines or us or you there is one answer which exonerates the practice in question from impropriety When a stranger expresses wonder at the singularity of what he sees any inhabitant will naturally answer him —Wonder not O stranger this is our custom and you may very likely have some other custom about the same things Now we are speaking my friends not about men in general but about the merits and defects of the lawgivers themselves Let us then discourse a little more at length about intoxication which is a very important subject and will seriously task the discrimination of the legislator I am not speaking of drinking or not drinking wine at all but of intoxication Are we to follow the custom of the Scythians and Persians and Carthaginians, and Celts and Iberians and Thracians who are all warlike nations or that of your countrymen for they as you say, altogether abstain? But the Scythians and Thracians both men and women drink unmixed wine which they pour on their garments and this they think a happy and glorious institution The Persians again are much given to other practices of luxury which you reject but they have more moderation in them than the Thracians and Scythians

[638] Meg O best of men we have only to take arms into our hands and we send all these nations flying before us

Ath Nay my good friend do not say that there have been as there always will be flights and pursuits of which no account can be given and therefore we cannot say that victory or defeat in battle affords more than a doubtful proof of the goodness or badness of institutions For when the greater states conquer and enslave the lesser as the Syracusans have done the Locrians who appear to be the best governed people in their part of the world or as the Athenians have done the Ceans (and there are ten thousand other instances of the same sort of thing) all this is not to the point let us endeavour rather to form a conclusion about each institution in itself and say nothing at present, of victories and defeats Let us only say that such and such a custom is honourable and another not And first permit me to tell you how good and bad are to be estimated in reference to these very matters

Meg How do you mean?

Ath All those who are ready at a moment's notice to praise or censure any practice which is matter of discussion seem to me to proceed in became warmly attached to you. And I always like to hear the Athenian tongue spoken the common saying is quite true, that a good Athenian is more than ordinarily good, for he is the only man who is freely and genuinely good by the divine inspiration of his own nature and is not manufactured. Therefore be assured that I shall like to hear you say whatever you have to say.

Cle Yes, Stranger and when you have heard me speak, say boldly what is in your thoughts. Let me remind you of a tie which unites you to Crete. You must have heard here the story of the prophet Epimenides, who was of my family and came to Athens ten years before the Persian war in accordance with the response of the Oracle, and offered certain sacrifices which the God commanded. The Athenians were at that time in dread of the Persian invasion and he said that for ten years they would not come, and that when they came, they would go away again without accomplishing any of their objects, and would suffer more evil than they inflicted. At that time my forefathers formed ties of hospitality with you thus ancient is the friendship which I and my parents have had for you.

[643] Ath You seem to be quite ready to listen, and I am also ready to perform as much as I can of an almost impossible task, which I will nevertheless attempt. At the outset of the discussion, let me define the nature and power of education for this is the way by which our argument must travel onwards to the God Dionysus.

Cle Let us proceed, if you please.

Ath. Well, then, if I tell you what are my notions of education, will you consider whether they satisfy you?

Cle Let us hear

Ath According to my view any one who would be good at anything must practise that thing from his youth upwards both in sport and earnest, in its several branches for example, he who is to be a good builder should play at building children's houses he who is to be a good husbandman, at tilling the ground and those who have the care of their education should provide them when young with mimic tools. They should learn beforehand the knowledge which they will afterwards require for their art. For example the future carpenter should learn to measure or apply the line in play and the future warrior should learn riding, or some other exercise for amusement, and the teacher should endeavour to direct the children's inclinations and pleasures, by the help of amusements, to their final aim in life. The most important part of education is right training in the nursery The soul of the child in his play should be guided to the love of that sort of excellence in which when he grows up to manhood he will have to be perfected Do you agree with me thus far?

Cle Certainly

Ath Then let us not leave the meaning of education ambiguous or ill-defined At present, when we speak in terms of praise or blame about the bringing up of each person, we call one man educated and another uneducated although the uneducated man may be sometimes very well educated for the calling of a retail trader or of a captain of a ship and the like For we are not speaking of education in this narrower sense, but of that other education in virtue from youth upwards, which makes a man eagerly pursue the ideal perfection of citizenship and teaches him how rightly to rule and how to obey [644] This is the only education which upon our view deserves the name that other sort of training which aims at the acquisition of wealth or bodily strength, or mere cleverness apart from intelligence and justice, is mean and illiberal, and is not worthy to be called education at all But let us not quarrel with one another about a word provided that the proposition which has just been granted hold good to wit, that those who are rightly educated generally become good men. Neither must we cast a slight upon education, which is the first and fairest thing that the best of men can ever have, and which, though liable to take a wrong direction is capable of reformation And this work of reformation is the great business of every man while he lives.

Cle Very true and we entirely agree with you

Ath And we agreed before that they are good men who are able to rule themselves, and bad men who are not.

Cle You are quite right.

Ath Let me now proceed if I can to clear up the subject a little further by an illustration which I will offer you.

Cle Proceed.

Ath Do we not consider each of ourselves to be one?

Cle We do

Ath And each one of us has in his bosom two counsellors, both foolish and also antagonistic of which we call the one pleasure, and the other pain.

with drunkenness is apt to be unquiet

Cle Certainly the reverse of quiet.

Ath In the first place, then the revellers as well as the soldiers will require a ruler?

Cle To be sure no men more so

Ath And we ought if possible to provide them with a quiet ruler?

Cle Of course

Ath And he should be a man who understands society for his duty is to preserve the friendly feelings which exist among the company at the time and to increase them for the future by his use of the occasion

Cle Very true

Ath Must we not appoint a sober man and a wise to be our master of the revels? For if the ruler of drinkers be himself young and drunken and not over wise only by some special good fortune will he be saved from doing some great evil

Cle It will be by a singular good fortune that he is saved

Ath Now suppose such associations to be framed in the best way possible in states and that some one blames the very fact of their existence—he may very likely be right But if he blames a practice which he only sees very much mismanaged he shows in the first place that he is not aware of the mismanagement and also not aware that everything done in this way will turn out to be wrong because done without the superintendence of a sober ruler Do you not see that a drunken pilot or a drunken ruler of any sort will ruin ship [641] chariot army—anything in short of which he has the direction?

Cle The last remark is very true Stranger and I see quite clearly the advantage of an army having a good leader—he will give victory in war to his followers which is a very great advantage and so of other things But I do not see any similar advantage which either individuals or states gain from the good management of a feast and I want you to tell me what great good will be effected supposing that this drinking ordinance is duly established

Ath If you mean to ask what great good accrues to the state from the right training of a single youth or of a single chorus—when the question is put in that form we cannot deny that the good is not very great in any particular instance But if you ask what is the good of education in general the answer is easy—that education makes good men and that good men act nobly and conquer their enemies in battle because they are good Education certainly gives victory although victory sometimes produces forgetfulness of education for many have grown insolent from victory in war and this insolence has engendered in them innumerable evils and many a victory has been and will be suicidal to the victors but education is never suicidal

Cle You seem to imply my friend that convivial meetings when rightly ordered are an important element of education

Ath Certainly I do

Cle And can you show that what you have been saying is true?

Ath To be absolutely sure of the truth of matters concerning which there are many opinions is an attribute of the Gods not given to man Stranger but I shall be very happy to tell you what I think especially as we are now proposing to enter on a discussion concerning laws and constitutions

Cle Your opinion Stranger about the questions which are now being raised is precisely what we want to hear

Ath Very good I will try to find a way of explaining my meaning and you shall try to have the gift of understanding me But first let me make an apology The Athenian citizen is reputed among all the Hellenes to be a great talker whereas Sparta is renowned for brevity [642] and the Cretans have more wit than words Now I am afraid of appearing to elicit a very long discourse out of very small materials For drinking indeed may appear to be a slight matter and yet is one which cannot be rightly ordered according to nature without correct principles of music these are necessary to any clear or satisfactory treatment of the subject and music again runs up into education generally and there is much to be said about all this What would you say then to leaving these matters for the present and passing on to some other question of law?

Meg O Athenian Stranger let me tell you what perhaps you do not know that our family is the proxenus of your state I imagine that from their earliest youth all boys when they are told that they are the proxeni of a particular state feel kindly towards their second country and this has certainly been my own feeling I can well remember from the days of my boyhood how when any Lacedaemonians praised or blamed the Athenians they used to say to me— See Megillus how ill or how well as the case might be has your state treated us and having always had to fight your battles against detractors when I heard you assailed, I became warmly attached to you. And I always like to hear the Athenian tongue spoken the common saying is quite true that a good Athenian is more than ordinarily good for he is the only man who is freely and genuinely good by the divine inspiration of his own nature and is not manufactured. Therefore be assured that I shall like to hear you say whatever you have to say

Cle Yes, Stranger and when you have heard me speak, say boldly what is in your thoughts Let me remind you of a tie which unites you to Crete You must have heard here the story of the prophet Epimenides, who was of my family and came to Athens ten years before the Persian war in accordance with the response of the Oracle, and offered certain sacrifices which the God commanded The Athenians were at that time in dread of the Persian invasion and he said that for ten years they would not come, and that when they came, they would go away again without accomplishing any of their objects, and would suffer more evil than they inflicted. At that time my forefathers formed ties of hospitality with you thus ancient is the friendship which I and my parents have had for you.

[643] Ath You seem to be quite ready to listen and I am also ready to perform as much as I can of an almost impossible task, which I will nevertheless attempt. At the outset of the discussion let me define the nature and power of education for this is the way by which our argument must travel onwards to the God Dionysus

Cle Let us proceed, if you please.

Ath. Well then, if I tell you what are my notions of education will you consider whether they satisfy you?

Cle Let us hear

Ath According to my view any one who would be good at anything must practise that thing from his youth upwards both in sport and earnest, in its several branches for example, he who is to be a good builder should play at building children's houses he who is to be a good husbandman, at tilling the ground and those who have the care of their education should provide them when young with mimic tools. They should learn beforehand the knowledge which they will afterwards require for their art For example, the future carpenter should learn to measure or apply the line in play and the future warrior should learn riding or some other exercise, for amusement, and the teacher should endeavour to direct the children's inclinations and pleasures by the help of amusements, to their final aim in life The most important part of education is right training in the nursery The soul of the child in his play should be guided to the love of that sort of excellence in which when he grows up to manhood he will have to be perfected Do you agree with me thus far?

Cle Certainly

Ath Then let us not leave the meaning of education ambiguous or ill-defined At present, when we speak in terms of praise or blame about the bringing up of each person, we call one man educated and another uneducated although the uneducated man may be sometimes very well educated for the calling of a retail trader or of a captain of a ship and the like. For we are not speaking of education in this narrower sense but of that other education in virtue from youth upwards, which makes a man eagerly pursue the ideal perfection of citizenship and teaches him how rightly to rule and how to obey [644] This is the only education which upon our view deserves the name that other sort of training which aims at the acquisition of wealth or bodily strength, or mere cleverness apart from intelligence and justice, is mean and illiberal, and is not worthy to be called education at all But let us not quarrel with one another about a word, provided that the proposition which has just been granted hold good to wit that those who are rightly educated generally become good men. Neither must we cast a slight upon education, which is the first and fairest thing that the best of men can ever have and which though liable to take a wrong direction, is capable of reformation And this work of reformation is the great business of every man while he lives

Cle Very true and we entirely agree with you

Ath And we agreed before that they are good men who are able to rule themselves and bad men who are not.

Cle You are quite right.

Ath Let me now proceed if I can to clear up the subject a little further by an illustration which I will offer you.

Cle Proceed

Ath Do we not consider each of ourselves to be one?

Cle We do

Ath And each one of us has in his bosom two counsellors, both foolish and also antagonistic of which we call the one pleasure, and the other pain.

Cle Exactly

Ath Also there are opinions about the future which have the general name of expectations, and the specific name of fear when the expectation is of pain, and of hope when of pleasure and further, there is reflection about the good or evil of them and this when embodied in a decree by the State is called Law

Cle I am hardly able to follow you proceed however as if I were

Meg I am in the like case

Ath Let us look at the matter thus May we not conceive each of us living beings to be a puppet of the Gods either their plaything only, or created with a purpose—which of the two we cannot certainly know? But we do know that these affections in us are like cords and strings which pull us different and opposite ways and to opposite actions and herein lies the difference between virtue and vice According to the argument there is one among these cords which every man ought to grasp and never let go but to pull with it against all the rest [645] and this is the sacred and golden cord of reason called by us the common law of the State there are others which are hard and of iron but this one is soft because golden and there are several other kinds Now we ought always to cooperate with the lead of the best which is law For inasmuch as reason is beautiful and gentle and not violent her rule must needs have ministers in order to help the golden principle in vanquishing the other principles And thus the moral of the tale about our being puppets will not have been lost and the meaning of the expression superior or inferior to a man s self will become clearer and the individual attaining to right reason in this matter of pulling the strings of the puppet should live according to its rule while the city receiving the same from some god or from one who has knowledge of these things should embody it in a law to be her guide in her dealings with herself and with other states In this way virtue and vice will be more clearly distinguished by us And when they have become clearer education and other institutions will in like manner become clearer and in particular that question of convivial entertainment which may seem perhaps to have been a very trifling matter and to have taken a great many more words than were necessary

Cle Perhaps however the theme may turn out not to be unworthy of the length of discourse

Ath Very good let us proceed with any enquiry which really bears on our present object

Cle Proceed

Ath Suppose that we give this puppet of ours drink—what will be the effect on him?

Cle Having what in view do you ask that question?

Ath Nothing as yet but I ask generally when the puppet is brought to the drink what sort of result is likely to follow I will endeavour to explain my meaning more clearly what I am now asking is this—Does the drinking of wine heighten and increase pleasures and pains, and passions and loves?

Cle Very greatly

Ath And are perception and memory and opinion and prudence heightened and increased? Do not these qualities entirely desert a man if he becomes saturated with drink?

Cle Yes they entirely desert him

Ath Does he not return to the state of soul in which he was when a young child?

Cle He does

Ath Then at that time he will have the least control over himself?

Cle The least

[646] Ath And will he not be in a most wretched plight?

Cle Most wretched

Ath Then not only an old man but also a drunkard becomes a second time a child?

Cle Well said Stranger

Ath Is there any argument which will prove to us that we ought to encourage the taste for drinking instead of doing all we can to avoid it?

Cle I suppose that there is you at any rate were just now saying that you were ready to maintain such a doctrine

Ath True I was and I am ready still seeing that you have both declared that you are anxious to hear me

Cle To be sure we are if only for the strangeness of the paradox which asserts that a man ought of his own accord to plunge into utter degradation

Ath Are you speaking of the soul?

Cle Yes

Ath And what would you say about the body my friend? Are you not surprised at any one of his own accord bringing upon himself deformity leanness ugliness decrepitude?

Cle Certainly

Ath Yet when a man goes of his own accord to a doctor s shop and takes medicine, is he not quite aware that soon and for many days afterwards he will be in a state of body which he would die rather than accept as the permanent condition of his life? Are not those who train in gymnasia, at first beginning reduced to a state of weakness?

Cle Yes, all that is well known.

Ath Also that they go of their own accord for the sake of the subsequent benefit?

Cle Very good.

Ath And we may conceive this to be true in the same way of other practices?

Cle Certainly

Ath And the same view may be taken of the pastime of drinking wine, if we are right in supposing that the same good effect follows?

Cle To be sure.

Ath If such convivialities should turn out to have any advantage equal in importance to that of gymnastic, they are in their very nature to be preferred to mere bodily exercise, inasmuch as they have no accompaniment of pain.

Cle True but I hardly think that we shall be able to discover any such benefits to be derived from them.

Ath That is just what we must endeavour to show And let me ask you a question —Do we not distinguish two kinds of fear which are very different?

Cle What are they?

Ath There is the fear of expected evil.

Cle Yes.

Ath And there is the fear of an evil reputation we are afraid of being thought evil [647] because we do or say some dishonourable thing, which fear we and all men term shame.

Cle Certainly

Ath These are the two fears, as I called them one of which is the opposite of pain and other fears, and the opposite also of the greatest and most numerous sort of pleasures.

Cle Very true.

Ath And does not the legislator and every one who is good for anything, hold this fear in the greatest honour This is what he terms reverence, and the confidence which is the reverse of this he terms insolence and the latter he always deems to be a very great evil both to individuals and to states.

Cl True.

Ath Does not this kind of fear preserve us in many important ways? What is there which so surely gives victory and safety in war? For there are two things which give victory—confidence before enemies, and fear of disgrace before friends

Cle There are

Ath Then each of us should be fearless and also fearful and why we should be either has now been determined

Cle Certainly

Ath And when we want to make any one fearless, we and the law bring him face to face with many fears.

Cle Clearly

Ath And when we want to make him rightly fearful must we not introduce him to shameless pleasures, and train him to take up arms against them, and to overcome them? Or does this principle apply to courage only and must he who would be perfect in valour fight against and overcome his own natural character—since if he be unpractised and inexperienced in such conflicts, he will not be half the man which he might have been—and are we to suppose that with temperance it is otherwise, and that he who has never fought with the shameless and unrighteous temptations of his pleasures and lusts, and conquered them, in earnest and in play by word, deed and act, will still be perfectly temperate?

Cle A most unlikely supposition

Ath Suppose that some God had given a fear potion to men, and that the more a man drank of this the more he regarded himself at every draught as a child of misfortune and that he feared everything happening or about to happen to him and that at last the most courageous of men utterly lost his presence of mind for a time, and only came to himself again when he had slept off the influence [648] of the draught.

Cle But has such a draught, Stranger ever really been known among men?

Ath No but, if there had been, might not such a draught have been of use to the legislator as a test of courage? Might we not go and say to him, O legislator whether you are legislating for the Cretan, or for any other state, would you not like to have a touchstone of the courage and cowardice of your citizens?"

Cle "I should," will be the answer of every one.

Ath "And you would rather have a touchstone in which there is no risk and no great danger than the reverse

Cle In that proposition every one may safely agree.

Ath "And in order to make use of the draught, you would lead them amid these imaginary terrors, and prove them, when the affection of fear was working upon them, and compel them to be fearless, exhorting and admonishing them and also honouring them, but dishonouring any one who will not be persuaded by you to be in all respects such as you command him and if he underwent the trial well and manfully you would let him go unscathed but if ill you would inflict a punishment upon him? Or would you abstain from using the potion altogether although you have no reason for abstaining?

Cle He would be certain Stranger to use the potion

Ath This would be a mode of testing and training which would be wonderfully easy in comparison with those now in use, and might be applied to a single person or to a few or indeed to any number and he would do well who provided himself with the potion only rather than with any number of other things whether he preferred to be by himself in solitude and there contend with his fears because he was ashamed to be seen by the eye of man until he was perfect or trusting to the force of his own nature and habits and believing that he had been already disciplined sufficiently he did not hesitate to train himself in company with any number of others and display his power in conquering the irresistible change effected by the draught—his virtue being such, that he never in any instance fell into any great unseemliness but was always himself and left off before he arrived at the last cup, fearing that he, like all other men, might be overcome by the potion.

Cle Yes, Stranger in that last case, too, he might equally show his self-control

[649] Ath Let us return to the lawgiver and say to him — Well lawgiver there is certainly no such fear potion which man has either received from the Gods or himself discovered, for witchcraft has no place at our board But is there any potion which might serve as a test of overboldness and excessive and indiscreet boasting?

Cle I suppose that he will say Yes—meaning that wine is such a potion

Ath Is not the effect of this quite the opposite of the effect of the other? When a man drinks wine he begins to be better pleased with himself and the more he drinks the more he is filled full of brave hopes and conceit of his power, and at last the string of his tongue is loosened and fancying himself wise he is brimming over with lawlessness and has no more fear or respect and is ready to do or say anything

Cle I think that every one will admit the truth of your description

Meg Certainly

Ath Now let us remember as we were saying that there are two things which should be cultivated in the soul first the greatest courage secondly the greatest fear—

Cle Which you said to be characteristic of reverence if I am not mistaken

Ath Thank you for reminding me But now, as the habit of courage and fearlessness is to be trained amid fears, let us consider whether the opposite quality is not also to be trained among opposites

Cle That is probably the case

Ath There are times and seasons at which we are by nature more than commonly valiant and bold now we ought to train ourselves on these occasions to be as free from impudence and shamelessness as possible and to be afraid to say or suffer or do anything that is base

Cle True

Ath Are not the moments in which we are apt to be bold and shameless such as these?—when we are under the influence of anger love, pride, ignorance avarice cowardice? or when wealth beauty strength and all the intoxicating workings of pleasure madden us? What is better adapted than the festive use of wine in the first place to test and in the second place to train the character of a man if care be taken in the use of it? What is there cheaper or more innocent? For do but consider which is the greater risk —Would you rather test a man of a morose and savage nature which is the source of ten thousand acts of injustice by making bargains with him at a risk to yourself [650] or by having him as a companion at the festival of Dionysus? Or would you if you wanted to apply a touchstone to a man who is prone to love entrust your wife, or your sons or daughters to him perilling your dearest interests in order to have a view of the condition of his soul? I might mention numberless cases in which the advantage would be manifest of getting to know a character in sport and without paying dearly for experience And I do not believe that either a Cretan or any other man will doubt that such a test is a fair test, and safer cheaper, and speedier than any other

Cle That is certainly true

Ath And this knowledge of the natures and habits of men s souls will be of the greatest use in that art which has the management of them and that art if I am not mistaken, is politics

Cle Exactly so

BOOK II

[652] Athenian Stranger AND now we have to consider whether the insight into human nature is the only benefit derived from well ordered potations, or whether there are not other advantages great and much to be desired. The argument seems to imply that there are. But how and in what way these are to be attained, will have to be considered attentively or we may be entangled in error

Clenias Proceed.

Ath Let me once more recall our doctrine of right education which [653] if I am not mistaken, depends on the due regulation of convivial intercourse

Cle You talk rather grandly

Ath Pleasure and pain I maintain to be the first perceptions of children, and I say that they are the forms under which virtue and vice are originally present to them. As to wisdom and true and fixed opinions, happy is the man who acquires them, even when declining in years, and we may say that he who possesses them, and the blessings which are contained in them, is a perfect man. Now I mean by education that training which is given by suitable habits to the first instincts of virtue in children,—when pleasure, and friendship and pain, and hatred, are rightly implanted in souls not yet capable of understanding the nature of them, and who find them, after they have attained reason, to be in harmony with her This harmony of the soul, taken as a whole, is virtue but the particular training in respect of pleasure and pain, which leads you always to hate what you ought to hate, and love what you ought to love from the beginning of life to the end, may be separated off and, in my view will be rightly called education.

Cle I think Stranger that you are quite right in all that you have said and are saying about education.

Ath. I am glad to hear that you agree with me for indeed, the discipline of pleasure and pain which, when rightly ordered is a principle of education has been often relaxed and corrupted in human life And the Gods, pitying the toils which our race is born to undergo have appointed holy festivals, wherein men alternate rest with labour and have given them the Muses and Apollo, the leader of the Muses, and Dionysus, to be companions in their revels that they may improve their education by taking part in the festivals of the Gods, and with their help I should like to know whether a common saying is in our opinion true to nature or not For men say that the young of all creatures cannot be quiet in their bodies or in their voices they are always wanting to move and cry out some leaping and skipping and overflowing with sportiveness and delight at something others uttering all sorts of cries But, whereas the animals have no perception of order or disorder in their movements, that is, of rhythm or harmony as they are called to us, the Gods who, as we say have been appointed to be our companions in the dance [654] have given the pleasurable sense of harmony and rhythm and so they stir us into life and we follow them joining hands together in dances and songs and these they call choruses which is a term naturally expressive of cheerfulness. Shall we begin, then, with the acknowledgment that education is first given through Apollo and the Muses? What do you say?

Cle I assent.

Ath And the uneducated is he who has not been trained in the chorus and the educated is he who has been well trained?

Cle Certainly

Ath And the chorus is made up of two parts, dance and song?

Cle True.

Ath Then he who is well educated will be able to sing and dance well?

Cle I suppose that he will

Ath Let us see what are we saying?

Cle What?

Ath He sings well and dances well now must we add that he sings what is good and dances what is good?

Cle Let us make the addition

Ath We will suppose that he knows the good to be good and the bad to be bad, and makes use of them accordingly which now is the better trained in dancing and music—he who is able to move his body and to use his voice in what is understood to be the right manner but has no delight in good or hatred of evil or he who is incorrect in gesture and voice, but is right in his sense of pleasure and pain, and welcomes what is good, and is offended at what is evil?

Cle There is a great difference, Stranger in the two kinds of education.

Ath If we three know what is good in song and dance, then we truly know also who is educated and who is uneducated but if not, then we certainly shall not know wherein lies the safeguard of education, and whether there is any or not.

Cle True

Ath Let us follow the scent like hounds and go in pursuit of beauty of figure and melody and song and dance if these escape us there will be no use in talking about true education whether Hellenic or barbarian

Cle Yes

Ath And what is beauty of figure or beautiful melody? When a manly soul is in trouble [655] and when a cowardly soul is in similar case are they likely to use the same figures and gestures, or to give utterance to the same sounds?

Cle How can they when the very colours of their faces differ?

Ath Good my friend I may observe however in passing that in music there certainly are figures and there are melodies and music is concerned with harmony and rhythm so that you may speak of a melody or figure having good rhythm or good harmony—the term is correct enough but to speak metaphorically of a melody or figure having a good colour as the masters of choruses do is not allowable although you can speak of the melodies or figures of the brave and the coward praising the one and censuring the other And not to be tedious let us say that the figures and melodies which are expressive of virtue of soul or body or of images of virtue are without exception good and those which are expressive of vice are the reverse of good

Cle Your suggestion is excellent and let us answer that these things are so

Ath Once more are all of us equally delighted with every sort of dance?

Cle Far otherwise

Ath What then leads us astray? Are beautiful things not the same to us all or are they the same in themselves but not in our opinion of them? For no one will admit that forms of vice in the dance are more beautiful than forms of virtue or that he himself delights in the forms of vice and others in a muse of another character And yet most persons say that the excellence of music is to give pleasure to our souls But this is intolerable and blasphemous there is however a much more plausible account of the delusion

Cle What?

Ath The adaptation of art to the characters of men Choric movements are imitations of manners occurring in various actions fortunes dispositions—each particular is imitated and those to whom the words or songs or dances are suited either by nature or habit or both cannot help feeling pleasure in them and applauding them and calling them beautiful But those whose natures or ways, or habits are unsuited to them cannot delight in them or applaud them and they call them base There are others again whose natures are right and their habits wrong or whose habits are right and their natures wrong and they praise one thing but are pleased at another [656] For they say that all these imitations are pleasant but not good And in the presence of those whom they think wise they are ashamed of dancing and singing in the baser manner or of deliberately lending any countenance to such proceedings and yet, they have a secret pleasure in them

Cle Very true

Ath And is any harm done to the lover of vicious dances or songs or any good done to the approver of the opposite sort of pleasure?

Cle I think that there is

Ath I think is not the word but I would say rather I am certain For must they not have the same effect as when a man associates with bad characters whom he likes and approves rather than dislikes and only censures playfully because he has a suspicion of his own badness? In that case he who takes pleasure in them will surely become like those in whom he takes pleasure even though he be ashamed to praise them And what greater good or evil can any destiny ever make us undergo?

Cle I know of none

Ath Then in a city which has good laws or in future ages is to have them bearing in mind the instruction and amusement which are given by music can we suppose that the poets are to be allowed to teach in the dance any thing which they themselves like in the way of rhythm or melody or words to the young children of any well conditioned parents? Is the poet to train his choruses as he pleases without reference to virtue or vice?

Cle That is surely quite unreasonable and is not to be thought of

Ath And yet he may do this in almost any state with the exception of Egypt

Cle And what are the laws about music and dancing in Egypt?

Ath You will wonder when I tell you Long ago they appear to have recognized the very principle of which we are now speaking—that their young citizens must be habituated to forms and strains of virtue These they fixed and exhibited the patterns of them in their temples and no painter or artist is allowed to mao ate upon them or to lea e the traditional forms and invent ne v ones To this day no alteration is allo ed e ther in these arts, or in music at all And you will find that their works of art are painted or moulded in the same forms which they had ten thousand years ago —this is literally true and no exaggeration—their ancient paintings and sculptures are not a whit better or worse than the work of to-day [657] but are made with just the same skill

Cle How extraordinary!

Ath I should rather say How state manlike how worthy of a legislator! I know that other things in Egypt are not so well. But what I am telling you about music is true and deserving of consideration, because showing that a law giver may institute melod es which have a natural truth and correctness without any fear of failure To do this, however must be the work of God, or of a divine person in Egypt they ha e a trad tion that their ancient chants which have been preserved for so many ages are the composition of the Goddess Isis And therefore, as I was saying if a person can only find in any way the natural melodies he may confidently embody them in a fixed and legal form. For the love of novelty which arises out of pleasure in the new and weariness of the old, has not strength enough to corrupt the consecrated song and dance under the plea that they have become antiquated At any rate they are far from being corrupted in Egypt.

Cle Your arguments seem to prove your point.

Ath May we not confidently say that the true use of mus c and of choral festivities s as follows We rejoice when we think that we prosper and again we think that we prosper when we rejoice?

Cl Exactly

Ath And when rejo cing in our good fortune, we are unable to be still?

Cle True.

Ath Our young men break forth into dancing and singing and we who are their el ders deem that we are fulfilling our part in life when we look on at them Having l st our agility we del ght in their sports and merry making, because we l ve to th nk of our former selves and gladly institute contests for those who are able to aw ken in us the memory of our y uth

Cle Very true

Ath Is it altogether unmeaning to say as the common people do bout fest vals, that he should be adjudged the wisest of men and the winner of the palm who gives us the greatest amount of pleasure and mirth? For on such occasions and when mirth is the order of the day ought not he to be honoured most and, as I was saying bear the palm [658] who gives most mirth to the greatest number? Now is this a true way of speaking or of acting?

Cle Possibly

Ath But, my dear friend let us distinguish between different cases, and not be hasty in forming a judgment One way of considering the question will be to imagine a festival at which there are entertainments of all sorts, including gymnastic, musical and equestrian contests the citizens are assembled prizes are offered and proclamation is made that any one who likes may enter the lists, and that he is to bear the palm who gives the most pleasure to the spectators—there is to be no regulation about the manner how but he who is most successful in giving pleasure is to be crowned victor and deemed to be the pleasantest of the candidates What is likely to be the result of such a proclamation?

Cle In what respect?

Ath There would be various exhibitions one man l ke Homer will exhibit a rhapsody another a performance on the lute one will ha e a tragedy and another a comedy Nor would there be anything astonishing in some one imagining that he could gain the prize by exhibiting a puppet show Suppose these competitors to meet and not these only but innumerable others as well—can you tell me who ought to be the victor?

Cle I do not see how any one can answer you, or pretend to know unless he has heard with his o vn ears the several competitors the question is al surd

Ath Well, then if ne ther of you can answer shall I answer this question which you deem so absurd?

Cle By all means

Ath If very small children are to determine the question they ill decide for the puppet show

Cle Of course

Ath The older children will be advocates of comedy educated women, and young men and people in general will favour tragedy

Cl Very likely

Ath And I believe that we old men would have the greatest pleasure in hearing a rhapsod st recite well the Iliad and Odyssey or one of the Hes odic poems and would award the v ctory to him But, who would really be the victor?—that is the question

Cle Yes

Ath Clearly you and I will have to declare that those whom we old men adjudge victors ought to win for our ways are far and away better than any which at present exist any where in the world

Cle Certainly

Ath Thus far I too should agree with the many that the excellence of music is to be measured by pleasure But the pleasure must not be that of chance persons the fairest music is that which delights the best and best edu cated [659] and especially that which delights the one man who is pre-eminent in virtue and education And therefore the judges must be men of character, for they will require both wisdom and courage the true judge must not draw his inspiration from the theatre nor ought he to be unnerved by the clamour of the many and his own incapacity nor again know ing the truth ought he through cowardice and unmanliness carelessly to deliver a lying judg ment with the very same lips which have just appealed to the Gods before he judged He is sitting not as the disciple of the theatre but in his proper place as their instructor and he ought to be the enemy of all pandering to the pleasure of the spectators The ancient and common custom of Hellas which still prevails in Italy and Sicily did certainly leave the judg ment to the body of spectators who deter mined the victor by show of hands But this custom has been the destruction of the poets for they are now in the habit of composing with a view to please the bad taste of their judges and the result is that the spectators in struct themselves —and also it has been the ruin of the theatre they ought to be having characters put before them better than their own, and so receiving a higher pleasure but now by their own act the opposite result fol lows What inference is to be drawn from all this? Shall I tell you?

Cle What?

Ath The inference at which we arrive for the third or fourth time is that education is the constraining and directing of youth towards that right reason which the law affirms and which the experience of the eldest and best has agreed to be truly right In order then that the soul of the child may not be habituated to feel joy and sorrow in a manner at variance with the law and those who obey the law but may rather follow the law and rejoice and sorrow at the same things as the aged—in order I say to produce this effect, chants appear to have been invented which really enchant, and are de signed to implant that harmony of which we speak And because the mind of the child is incapable of enduring serious training they are called plays and songs and are performed in play just as when men are sick and ailing in their bodies, their attendants give them whole some diet in pleasant meats and drinks [660] but unwholesome diet in disagreeable things, in order that they may learn as they ought, to like the one, and to dislike the other And similarly the true legislator will persuade and, if he cannot persuade, will compel the poet to express as he ought, by fair and noble words, in his rhythms the figures, and in his melodies, the music of temperate and brave and in every way good men

Cle But do you really imagine Stranger that this is the way in which poets generally compose in States at the present day? As far as I can observe except among us and among the Lacedaemonians there are no regulations like those of which you speak in other places novel ties are always being introduced in dancing and in music, generally not under the authority of any law but at the instigation of lawless pleas ures and these pleasures are so far from being the same as you describe the Egyptian to be or having the same principles that they are never the same

Ath Most true Cleinias and I daresay that I may have expressed myself obscurely and so led you to imagine that I was speaking of some really existing state of things whereas I was only saying what regulations I would like to have about music and hence there occurred a misapprehension on your part For when evils are far gone and irremediable the task of cen suring them is never pleasant, although at times necessary But as we do not really differ will you let me ask you whether you consider such institutions to be more prevalent among the Cretans and Lacedaemonians than among the other Hellenes?

Cle Certainly they are

Ath And if they were extended to the other Hellenes would it be an improvement on the present state of things?

Cle A very great improvement if the cus toms which prevail among them were such as prevail among us and the Lacedaemonians and such as you were just now saying ought to prevail

Ath Let us see whether we understand one another —Are not the principles of education and music which prevail among you as follows you compel your poets to say that the good man, if he be temperate and just, is fortunate and happy and this whether he be great and strong or small and weak and whether he be rich or poor and, on the other hand, if he have a wealth passing that of Cinyras or Midas, and be unjust, he is wretched and lives in misery? As the poet says, and with truth I sing not I care not about him who accomplishes all noble things, not having justice let him who "draws near and stretches out his hand against his enemies be a just man" But if he be unjust, [661] I would not have him look calmly upon bloody death, nor "surpass in swiftness the Thracian Boreas and let no other thing that is called good ever be his For the goods of which the many speak are not really good first in the catalogue is placed health, beauty next, wealth third and then innumerable others, as for example to have a keen eye or a quick ear and in general to have all the senses perfect or again, to be a tyrant and do as you like and the final consummation of happiness is to have acquired all these things and when you have acquired them to become at once immortal. But you and I say that while to the just and holy all these things are the best of possessions to the unjust they are all including even health, the greatest of evils. For in truth, to have sight and hearing and the use of the senses, or to live at all without justice and virtue, even though a man be rich in all the so-called goods of fortune, is the greatest of evils, if life be immortal but not so great, if the bad man lives only a very short time. These are the truths which, if I am not mistaken, you will persuade or compel your poets to utter with suitable accompaniments of harmony and rhythm, and in these they must train up your youth Am I not right? For I plainly declare that evils as they are termed are goods to the unjust, and only evils to the just, and that goods are truly good to the good, but evil to the evil Let me ask again, Are you and I agreed about this?

Cle I think that we partly agree and partly do not.

Ath When a man has health and wealth and a tyranny which lasts, and when he is preeminent in strength and courage and has the gift of immortality and none of the so-called evils which counter balance these goods, but only the injustice and insolence of his own nature—of such an one you are, I suspect, unwilling to believe that he is miserable rather than happy

Cle That is quite true

Ath Once more Suppose that he be valiant and strong and handsome and rich and does throughout his whole life whatever he likes, [662] still if he be unrighteous and insolent, would not both of you agree that he will of necessity live basely? You will surely grant so much?

Cle Certainly

Ath And an evil life too?

Cle I am not equally disposed to grant that.

Ath Will he not live painfully and to his own disadvantage?

Cle How can I possibly say so?

Ath How! Then may Heaven make us to be of one mind for now we are of two To me, dear Cleinias, the truth of what I am saying is as plain as the fact that Crete is an island And, if I were a lawgiver I would try to make the poets and all the citizens speak in this strain and I would inflict the heaviest penalties on any one in all the land who should dare to say that there are bad men who lead pleasant lives, or that the profitable and gainful is one thing and the just another and there are many other matters about which I should make my citizens speak in a manner different from the Cretans and Lacedaemonians of this age and I may say indeed from the world in general For tell me, my good friends, by Zeus and Apollo tell me, if I were to ask these same Gods who were your legislators—Is not the most just life also the pleasantest? or are there two lives one of which is the justest and the other the pleasantest?—and they were to reply that there are two and thereupon I proceeded to ask, (that would be the right way of pursuing the enquiry) Which are the happier—those who lead the justest, or those who lead the pleasantest life? and they replied, Those who lead the pleasantest—that would be a very strange answer which I should not like to put into the mouth of the Gods The words will come with more propriety from the lips of fathers and legislators, and therefore I will repeat my former questions to one of them, and suppose him to say again that he who leads the pleasantest life is the happiest. And to that I rejoin —O my father did you not wish me to live as happily as possible? And yet you also never ceased telling me that I should live as justly as possible. Now here the giver of the rule, whether he be legislator or father will be in a dilemma, and will in vain endeavour to be consistent with himself. But if he were to declare that the justest life is also the happiest, every one hear ing him would enquire [663] if I am not mistaken what is that good and noble principle in life which the law approves and which is superior to pleasure For what good can the just man have which is separated from pleasure? Shall we say that glory and fame coming from Gods and men though good and noble are nevertheless unpleasant and infamy pleasant? Certainly not sweet legislator Or shall we say that the not doing of wrong and there being no wrong done is good and honourable although there is no pleasure in it and that the doing wrong is pleasant but evil and base?

Cle Impossible

Ath The view which identifies the pleasant and the just and the good and the noble has an excellent moral and religious tendency And the opposite view is most at variance with the designs of the legislator and is in his opinion infamous for no one if he can help will be persuaded to do that which gives him more pain than pleasure But as distant prospects are apt to make us dizzy especially in childhood, the legislator will try to purge away the darkness and exhibit the truth he will persuade the citizens in some way or other by customs and praises and words that just and unjust are shadows only and that injustice which seems opposed to justice when contemplated by the unjust and evil man appears pleasant and the just most unpleasant but that from the just man's point of view the very opposite is the appearance of both of them

Cle True

Ath And which may be supposed to be the truer judgment—that of the inferior or of the better soul?

Cle Surely that of the better soul

Ath Then the unjust life must not only be more base and depraved but also more unpleasant than the just and holy life?

Cle That seems to be implied in the present argument

Ath And even supposing this were otherwise and not as the argument has proven still the lawgiver who is worth anything if he ever ventures to tell a lie to the young for their good could not invent a more useful lie than this, or one which will have a better effect in making them do what is right not on compulsion but voluntarily

Cle Truth Stranger is a noble thing and a lasting but a thing of which men are hard to be persuaded

Ath And yet the story of the Sidonian Cadmus, which is so improbable has been readily believed and also innumerable other tales

Cle What is that story?

Ath The story of armed men springing up after the sowing of teeth which the legislator may take as a proof that he can persuade the minds of the young of anything [664] so that he has only to reflect and find out what belief will be of the greatest public advantage, and then use all his efforts to make the whole community utter one and the same word in their songs and tales and discourses all their life long But if you do not agree with me, there is no reason why you should not argue on the other side

Cle I do not see that any argument can fairly be raised by either of us against what you are now saying

Ath The next suggestion which I have to offer is that all our three choruses shall sing to the young and tender souls of children reciting in their strains all the noble thoughts of which we have already spoken or are about to speak and the sum of them shall be that the life which is by the Gods deemed to be the happiest is also the best —we shall affirm this to be a most certain truth and the minds of *our young disciples will be more likely to re*ceive these words of ours than any others which we might address to them

Cle I assent to what you say

Ath First will enter in their natural order the sacred choir composed of children which is to sing lustily the heaven taught lay to the whole city Next will follow the choir of young men under the age of thirty who will call upon the God Paean to testify to the truth of their words and will pray him to be gracious to the youth and to turn their hearts Thirdly the choir of elder men who are from thirty to sixty years of age will also sing There remain those who are too old to sing and they will tell stories illustrating the same virtues, as with the voice of an oracle.

Cle Who are those who compose the third choir *Stranger? for I do not clearly under*stand what you mean to say about them

Ath And yet almost all that I have been saying has been said with a view to them

Cle Will you try to be a little plainer?

Ath I was speaking at the commencement of our discourse as you will remember of the fiery nature of young creatures I said that they were unable to keep quiet either in limb or voice, and that they called out and jumped about in a disorderly manner and that no other animal attained to any perception of order

[665] but man only Now the order of motion is called rhythm, and the order of the voice, in which high and low are duly mingled is called harmony and both together are termed choric song And I said that the Gods had pity on us, and gave us Apollo and the Muses to be our playfellows and leaders in the dance and Dionysus, as I dare say that you will remember was the third

Cle I quite remember

Ath Thus far I have spoken of the chorus of Apollo and the Muses, and I have still to speak of the remaining chorus, which is that of Dionysus.

Cle How is that arranged? There is something strange, at any rate on first hearing in a Dionysiac chorus of old men if you really mean that those who are above thirty and may be fifty or from fifty to sixty years of age are to dance in his honour

Ath Very true and therefore it must be shown that there is good reason for the proposal.

Cle Certainly

Ath Are we agreed thus far?

Cle About what?

Ath That every man and boy slave and free both sexes, and the whole city should never cease charming themselves with the strains of which we have spoken and that there should be every sort of change and variation of them in order to take away the effect of sameness, so that the singers may always receive pleasure from their hymns, and may never weary of them?

Cle Every one will agree

Ath Where, then, will that best part of our city which, by reason of age and intelligence, has the greatest influence sing these fairest of strains, which are to do so much good? Shall we be so foolish as to let them off who would give us the most beautiful and also the most useful of songs?

Cle But, says the argument, we cannot let them off

Ath Then how can we carry out our purpose with decorum? Will this be the way?

Cle What?

Ath When a man is advancing in years he is afraid and reluctant to sing—he has no pleasure in his own performances and if compulsion is used he will be more and more ashamed the older and more discreet he grows —is not this true

Cle Certainly

Ath Well and will he not be yet more ashamed if he has to stand up and sing in the theatre to a mixed audience?—and if moreover when he is required to do so like the other choirs who contend for prizes, and have been trained under a singing master he is pinched and hungry [666] he will certainly have a feeling of shame and discomfort which will make him very unwilling to exhibit.

Cle No doubt.

Ath How then shall we reassure him and get him to sing? Shall we begin by enacting that boys shall not taste wine at all until they are eighteen years of age we will tell them that fire must not be poured upon fire whether in the body or in the soul until they begin to go to work—this is a precaution which has to be taken against the excitableness of youth—afterwards they may taste wine in moderation up to the age of thirty but while a man is young he should abstain altogether from intoxication and from excess of wine when, at length he has reached forty years after dinner at a public mess, he may invite not only the other Gods, but Dionysus above all to the mystery and festivity of the elder men making use of the wine which he has given men to lighten the sourness of old age that in age we may renew our youth and forget our sorrows and also in order that the nature of the soul like iron melted in the fire, may become softer and so more impressible In the first place will not any one who is thus mellowed be more ready and less ashamed to sing—I do not say before a large audience but before a moderate company nor yet among strangers, but among his familiars, and, as we have often said to chant, and to enchant?

Cle He will be far more ready

Ath There will be no impropriety in our using such a method of persuading them to join with us in song

Cle None at all

Ath And what strain will they sing and what muse will they hymn? The strain should clearly be one suitable to them

Cle Certainly

Ath And what strain is suitable for heroes? Shall they sing a choric strain?

Cle Truly Stranger we of Crete and Lacedaemon know no strain other than that which we have learnt and been accustomed to sing in our chorus

Ath I dare say for you have never acquired the knowledge of the most beautiful kind of song in your military way of life which is

ing him would enquire [663] if I am not mistaken what is that good and noble principle in life which the law approves and which is superior to pleasure For what good can the just man have which is separated from pleasure? Ath When a man is advancing in years, he is afraid and reluctant to sing —he has no pleasure in his own performances and if compulsion is used, he will be more and more ashamed the older and more discreet he grows —is not this true?

Cl Certainly

Ath Well and will he not be yet more ashamed if he has to stand up and sing in the theatre to a mixed audience?—and if moreover when he is required to do so like the other choirs who contend for prizes, and have been trained under a singing master he is pinched and hungry [666] he will certainly have a feeling of shame and discomfort which will make him very unwilling to exhibit.

Cle None at all

Ath And what strain will they sing and what muse will they hymn? The strain should clearly be one suitable to them.

Cle Certainly

Ath And what strain is suitable for heroes? Shall they sing a choric strain?

Cle Truly Stranger we of Crete and Lacedaemon know no strain other than that which we have learnt and been accustomed to sing in our chorus

Ath I dare say for you have never acquired the knowledge of the most beautiful kind of song in your military way of life which is modelled after the camp and is not like that of dwellers in cities and you have your young men herding and feeding together like young colts No one takes his own individual colt and drags him away from his fellows against his will, raging and foaming, and gives him a groom to attend to him alone and trains and rubs him down privately and gives him the qualities in education which will make him not only a good soldier but also a governor of a state and of cities Such an one as we said at first would be a greater warrior than he of whom Tyrtaeus sings, [667] and he would honour courage everywhere but always as the fourth and not as the first part of virtue, either in individuals or states

Cle Once more Stranger I must complain that you depreciate our lawgivers

Ath Not intentionally if at all my good friend but whither the argument leads, thither let us follow for if there be indeed some strain of song more beautiful than that of the choruses or the public theatres I should like to impart it to those who as we say are ashamed of these and want to have the best

Cle Certainly

Ath When things have an accompanying charm either the best thing in them is this very charm, or there is some rightness or utility possessed by them —for example I should say that eating and drinking and the use of food in general have an accompanying charm which we call pleasure but that this rightness and utility is just the healthfulness of the things served up to us which is their true rightness

Cle Just so

Ath Thus, too I should say that learning has a certain accompanying charm which is the pleasure but that the right and the profitable the good and the noble are qualities which the truth gives to it

Cle Exactly

Ath And so in the imitative arts—if they succeed in making likenesses and are accompanied by pleasure may not their works be said to have a charm?

Cle Yes

Ath But equal proportions whether of quality or quantity and not pleasure speaking generally would give them truth or rightness

Cle Yes

Ath Then that only can be rightly judged by the standard of pleasure which makes or furnishes no utility or truth or likeness nor on the other hand is productive of any hurtful quality but exists solely for the sake of the accompanying charm and the term pleasure is most appropriately applied to it when these other qualities are absent

Cle You are speaking of harmless pleasure are you not?

Ath Yes and this I term amusement when doing neither harm nor good in any degree worth speaking of

Cle Very true

Ath Then if such be our principles we must assert that imitation is not to be judged of by pleasure and false opinion and this is true of all equality, for the equal is not equal or the symmetrical symmetrical because somebody thinks or likes something but they are to be judged of by the standard of truth and by no other whatever

Cle Quite true

[668] Ath Do we not regard all music as representative and imitative?

Cle Certainly

Ath Then when any one says that music is to be judged of by pleasure his doctrine cannot be admitted and if there be any music of which pleasure is the criterion such music is not to be sought out or deemed to have any real excellence but only that other kind of music which is an imitation of the good

Cle Very true

Ath And those who seek for the best kind of song and music ought not to seek for that which is pleasant but for that which is true and the truth of imitation consists as we were saying in rendering the thing imitated according to quantity and quality

Cle Certainly

Ath And every one will admit that musical compositions are all imitative and representative Will not poets and spectators and actors all agree in this?

Cle They will

Ath Surely then he who would judge correctly must know what each composition is for if he does not know what is the character and meaning of the piece and what it represents he will never discern whether the intention is true or false

Cle Certainly not

Ath And will he who does not know what is true be able to distinguish what is good and bad? My statement is not very clear but perhaps you will understand me better if I put the matter in another way

Cle How?

Ath There are ten thousand likenesses of objects of sight?

Cle Yes.

Ath And can he who does not know what the exact object is which is imitated ever know whether the resemblance is truthfully executed? I mean for example, whether a statue has the proportions of a body and the true situation of the parts what those proportions are and how the parts fit into one another in due order also their colours and conformations or whether this is all confused in the execution do you think that any one can know about this who does not know what the animal is which has been imitated?

Cle Impossible

Ath But even if we know that the thing pictured or sculptured is a man who has received at the hand of the artist all his proper parts and colours and shapes, [669] must we not also know whether the work is beautiful or in any respect deficient in beauty?

Cle If this were not required Stranger we should all of us be judges of beauty

Ath Very true and may we not say that in everything imitated whether in drawing music, or any other art, he who is to be a competent judge must possess three things—he must know in the first place of what the imitation is secondly he must know that it is true and thirdly that it has been well executed in words and melodies and rhythms?

Cle Certainly

Ath Then let us not faint in discussing the peculiar difficulty of music. Music is more celebrated than any other kind of imitation and therefore requires the greatest care of them all For if a man makes a mistake here he may do himself the greatest injury by welcoming evil dispositions, and the mistake may be very difficult to discern, because the poets are artists very inferior in character to the Muses themselves, who would never fall into the monstrous error of assigning to the words of men the gestures and songs of women nor after combining the melodies with the gestures of freemen would they add on the rhythms of slaves and men of the baser sort nor beginning with the rhythms and gestures of freemen, would they assign to them a melody or words which are of an opposite character nor would they mix up the voices and sounds of animals and of men and instruments, and every other sort of noise, as if they were all one. But human poets are fond of introducing this sort of inconsistent mixture, and so make themselves ridiculous in the eyes of those who as Orpheus says, are ripe for true pleasure. The experienced see all this confusion and yet the poets go on and make still further havoc by separating the rhythm and the figure of the dance from the melody setting bare words to metre and also separating the melody and the rhythm from the words, using the lyre or the flute alone. For when there are no words it is very difficult to recognize the meaning of the harmony and rhythm or to see that any worthy object is imitated by them And we must acknowledge that all this sort of thing which aims only at swiftness and smoothness and a brutish noise and uses the flute and the lyre not as the mere accompaniments of the dance and song [670] is exceedingly coarse and tasteless The use of either instrument, when unaccompanied leads to every sort of irregularity and trickery This is all rational enough But we are considering not how our choristers who are from thirty to fifty years of age and may be over fifty are not to use the Muses but how they are to use them. And the considerations which we have urged seem to show in what way these fifty year-old choristers who are to sing may be expected to be better trained For they need to have a quick perception and knowledge of harmonies and rhythms otherwise how can they ever know whether a melody would be rightly sung to the Dorian mode, or to the rhythm which the poet has assigned to it?

Cle Clearly they cannot.

Ath The many are ridiculous in imagining that they know what is in proper harmony and rhythm, and what is not, when they can only be made to sing and step in rhythm by force it never occurs to them that they are ignorant of what they are doing Now every melody is right when it has suitable harmony and rhythm and wrong when unsuitable

Cle That is most certain

Ath But can a man who does not know a thing as we were saying know that the thing is right?

Cle Impossible.

Ath Then now as would appear we are making the discovery that our newly appointed choristers, whom we hereby invite and although they are their own masters, compel to sing must be educated to such an extent as to be able to follow the steps of the rhythm and the notes of the song, that they may know the harmonies and rhythms and be able to select what are suitable for men of their age and character to sing and may sing them, and have innocent pleasure from their own performance, and also lead younger men to welcome with dutiful delight good dispositions Having such training they will attain a more accurate knowledge than fall to the lot of the common people or even of the poets themselves For the poet need not know the third point viz whether the imitation is good or not though he can hardly help knowing the laws of melody and rhythm [671] But the aged chorus must know all the three that they may choose the best and that which is nearest to the best for otherwise they will never be able to charm the souls of young men in the way of virtue And now the original design of the argument which was intended to bring eloquent aid to the Chorus of Dionysus has been accomplished to the best of our ability and let us see whether we were right —I should imagine that a drinking assembly is likely to become more and more tumultuous as the drinking goes on this as we were saying at first will certainly be the case

Cle Certainly

Ath Every man has a more than natural elevation his heart is glad within him and he will say anything and will be restrained by nobody at such a time he fancies that he is able to rule over himself and all mankind

Cle Quite true

Ath Were we not saying that on such occasions the souls of the drinkers become like iron heated in the fire and grow softer and younger and are easily moulded by him who knows how to educate and fashion them just as when they were young and that this fashioner of them is the same who prescribed for them in the days of their youth viz the good legislator and that he ought to enact laws of the banquet which when a man is confident bold and impudent and unwilling to wait his turn and have his share of silence and speech and drinking and music will change his character into the opposite—such laws as will infuse into him a just and noble fear which will take up arms at the approach of insolence being that divine fear which we have called reverence and shame?

Cle True

Ath And the guardians of these laws and fellow workers with them are the calm and sober generals of the drinkers and without their help there is greater difficulty in fighting against drink than in fighting against enemies when the commander of an army is not himself calm and he who is unwilling to obey them and the commanders of Dionysiac feasts who are more than sixty years of age shall suffer a disgrace as great as he who disobeys military leaders or even greater

Cle Right

Ath If then drinking and amusement were regulated in this way would not the companions of our revels be improved? they would part better friends than they were [672] and not as now enemies Their whole intercourse would be regulated by law and observant of it and the sober would be the leaders of the drunken

Cle I think so too if drinking were regulated as you propose

Ath Let us not then simply censure the gift of Dionysus as bad and unfit to be received into the State For wine has many excellences and one pre-eminent one about which there is a difficulty in speaking to the many from a fear of their misconceiving and misunderstanding what is said

Cle To what do you refer?

Ath There is a tradition or story which has somehow crept about the world that Dionysus was robbed of his wits by his stepmother Here and that out of revenge he inspires Bacchic furies and dancing madnesses in others for which reason he gave men wine Such traditions concerning the Gods I leave to those who think that they may be safely uttered I only know that no animal at birth is mature or perfect in intelligence and in the intermediate period in which he has not yet acquired his own proper sense he rages and roars without rhyme or reason and when he has once got on his legs he jumps about without rhyme or reason and this as you will remember has been already said by us to be the origin of music and gymnastic

Cle To be sure I remember

Ath And did we not say that the sense of harmony and rhythm sprang from this beginning among men and that Apollo and the Muses and Dionysus were the Gods whom we had to thank for them?

Cle Certainly

Ath The other story implied that wine was given man out of revenge and in order to make him mad but our present doctrine on the contrary is that wine was given him as a balm and in order to implant modesty in the soul and health and strength in the body

Cle That Stranger is precisely what was said

Ath Then half the subject may now be considered to have been discussed shall we proceed to the consideration of the other half?

Cf Euthyphro 6 ff Republic ii 378 iii 388, 408

Cf 653

Cle What is the other half and how do you ide the subject?

Ath The whole choral art is also in our ew the whole of education and of this art, ythms and harmonies form the part which as to do with the voice.

Cle Yes.

Ath The movement of the body has rhythm n common with the movement of the voice but gesture is peculiar to it, whereas song is simply the mo ement of the voice.

Cle Most true.

[673] Ath And the sound of the voice which reaches and educates the soul we have ventured to term music.

Cle We were right.

Ath And the movement of the body when regarded as an amusement, we termed dancing but when extended and pursued with a ew to the excellence of the body this scientific training may be called gymnastic.

Cle Exactly

Ath Music, wh ch was one half of the choral art, may be said to have been completely discussed Shall we proceed to the other half or not? What would you like?

Cle My good friend when you are talking with a Cretan and Lacedaemonian and we ha e discussed music and not gymnastic, what answer are either of us likely to make to such an enquiry?

Ath An answer is contained in your question and I understand and accept what you say not only as an answer but also as a command to proceed with gymnastic

Cle You quite understand me do as you say

Ath I will and there will not be any difficulty in speaking intell gibly to you about a subject with which both of y u ar far more familiar than w th music

Cle There will not

Ath Is not the origin of gymnastics, too, to be sought in the tendency to rapid motion which exists in all animals man, as we were saying, hav ng attained the sense of rhythm, created and in ented dancing and melody arousing and awakening rhythm, both united f rmed the choral art?

Cle Very true.

Ath And one part of this subject has been already discussed by us, nd there still remains another to be discussed

Cle Exactly

Ath I ha e first a final word to add to my discourse about drink, if you will allow me to do so

Cle What more have you to say?

Ath I should say that if a city seriously means to adopt the practice of drinking under due regulation and with a view to the enforcement of temperance, and in like manner and on the same principle, will allow of other pleasures designing to gain the victory over them—in th s way all of them may be used But if the State makes drinking an amusement only and hoever likes may drink whenever he likes [674] and with whom he likes and add to this any other indulgences, I shall never agree or allow that this city or this man should practise drinking I would go further than the Cretans and Lacedaemonians, and am disposed rather to the law of the Carthaginians, that no one while he is on a campaign should be allowed to taste wine at all but that he should drink water during all that time, and that in the c ty no slave, male or female should ever drink wine and that no magistrates should drink during their year of office, nor should pilots of vessels or judges while on duty taste wine at all nor any one who is going to hold a consultation about any matter of importance nor in the day time at all unless in consequence of exercise or as medicine nor again at night, when any one either man or woman is minded to get children There are numberless other cases also in which those who have good sense and good laws ought not to drink wine so that if what I say is true no city will need many vineyards Their husbandry and their way of life in general will follow an appointed order and their culti ation of the vine w ll be the most limited and the least common of the r employments. And this Stranger shall be the crown of my discourse about wine if you agree.

Cle Excellent we agree

BOOK III

[676] Athenian Stranger Enough of this And hat, then is to be regarded as the origin of g vernment? Will not a man be able to judge of it best from a point of iew in which he may behold the progress of states and their trans t ons to good or evil?

Cleinias What do you mean?

Ath I mean that he might watch them from the point of vie v of time, and observe the changes wh ch take place in them during infinite ages

Cle How so?

Ath Why do you think that you can reckon the time which has elapsed since cities first existed and men were citizens of them?

Cle Hardly

Ath But you are sure that it must be vast and incalculable?

Cle Certainly

Ath And have not thousands and thousands of cities come into being during this period and as many perished? And has not each of them had every form of government many times over now growing larger now smaller and again improving or declining?

Cle To be sure

Ath Let us endeavour to ascertain the cause of these changes for that will probably explain the first origin and development of forms of government

Cle Very good You shall endeavour to impart your thoughts to us and we will make an effort to understand you [677] Ath Do you believe that there is any truth in ancient traditions?

Cle What traditions?

Ath The traditions about the many destructions of mankind which have been occasioned by deluges and pestilences and in many other ways, and of the survival of a remnant?

Cle Every one is disposed to believe them

Ath Let us consider one of them that which was caused by the famous deluge

Cle What are we to observe about it?

Ath I mean to say that those who then escaped would only be hill shepherds—small sparks of the human race preserved on the tops of mountains

Cle Clearly

Ath Such survivors would necessarily be unacquainted with the arts and the various devices which are suggested to the dwellers in cities by interest or ambition and with all the wrongs which they contrive against one another

Cle Very true

Ath Let us suppose then that the cities in the plain and on the sea-coast were utterly destroyed at that time

Cle Very good

Ath Would not all implements have then perished and every other excellent invention of political or any other sort of wisdom have utterly disappeared?

Cle Why yes my friend and if things had always continued as they are at present ordered how could any discovery have ever been made even in the least particular? For it is evident that the arts were unknown during ten thousand times ten thousand years And no more than a thousand or two thousand years have elapsed since the discoveries of Daedalus Orpheus and Palamedes—since Marsyas and Olympus invented music and Amphion the lyre—not to speak of numberless other inventions which are but of yesterday

Ath Have you forgotten Cleinias, the name of a friend who is really of yesterday?

Cle I suppose that you mean Epimenides[1]

Ath The same, my friend he does indeed far overleap the heads of all mankind by his invention for he carried out in practice, as you declare, what of old Hesiod only preached

Cle Yes according to our tradition

Ath After the great destruction may we not suppose that the state of man was something of this sort—In the beginning of things there was a fearful illimitable desert and a vast expanse of land, a herd or two of oxen would be the only survivors of the animal world [678] and there might be a few goats these too hardly enough to maintain the shepherds who tended them?

Cle True

Ath And of cities or governments or legislation about which we are now talking do you suppose that they could have any recollection at all?

Cle None whatever

Ath And out of this state of things has there not sprung all that we now are and have cities and governments and arts and laws and a great deal of vice and a great deal of virtue?

Cle What do you mean?

Ath Why my good friend how can we possibly suppose that those who knew nothing of all the good and evil of cities could have attained their full development whether of virtue or of vice?

Cle I understand your meaning and you are quite right

Ath But as time advanced and the race multiplied the world came to be what the world is

Cle Very true

Ath Doubtless the change was not made all in a moment but little by little, during a very long period of time

Cle A highly probable supposition

Ath At first they would have a natural fear ringing in their ears which would prevent their descending from the heights into the plain

Cle Of course

Ath The fewness of the survivors at that time

[1] Cf i 642

would have made them all the more desirous of seeing one another but then the means of travelling either by land or sea had been almost entirely lost, as I may say with the loss of the arts and there was great difficulty in getting at one another for iron and brass and all metals were jumbled together and had disappeared in the chaos nor was there any possibility of extracting ore from them and they had scarcely any means of felling timber Even if you suppose that some implements might have been preserved in the mountains they must quickly have worn out and vanished and there would be no more of them until the art of metallurgy had again revived

Cle There could not have been

Ath In how many generations would this be attained?

Cle Clearly not for many generations

Ath During this period and for some time afterwards, all the arts which require iron and brass and the like would disappear

Cle Certainly

Ath Faction and war would also have died out in those days and for many reasons

Cle How would that be?

Ath In the first place, the desolation of these primitive men would create in them a feeling of affection and good will towards one another and, secondly they would have no occasion to quarrel about their subsistence, [679] for they would have pasture in abundance, except just at first, and in some particular cases and from their pasture land they would obtain the greater part of their food in a primitive age, having plenty of milk and flesh moreover they would procure other food by the chase not to be despised either in quantity or quality They would also have abundance of clothing and bedding and dwellings, and utensils either capable of standing on the fire or not for the plastic and weaving arts do not require any use of iron and God has given these two arts to man in order to provide him with all such things, that, when reduced to the last extremity the human race may still grow and increase. Hence in those days mankind were not very poor nor was poverty a cause of difference among them, and rich they could not have been having neither gold nor silver —such at that time was their condition And the community which has neither poverty nor riches will always have the noblest principles in it there is no insolence or injustice nor again are there any contentions or envyings. And therefore they were good, and also because they were what is called simple-minded and when they were told about good and evil they in their simplicity believed what they heard to be very truth and practised it. No one had the wit to suspect another of a falsehood as men do now but what they heard about Gods and men they believed to be true, and lived accordingly and therefore they were in all respects such as we have described them

Cle That quite accords with my views, and with those of my friend here

Ath Would not many generations living on in a simple manner although ruder perhaps, and more ignorant of the arts generally and in particular of those of land or naval warfare, and likewise of other arts, termed in cities legal practices and party conflicts, and including all conceivable ways of hurting one another in word and deed —although inferior to those who lived before the deluge, or to the men of our day in these respects, would they not, I say be simpler and more manly, and also more temperate and altogether more just? The reason has been already explained

Cle Very true.

Ath I should wish you to understand that what has preceded and what is about to follow has been and will be said, with the intention of explaining what need the men of that time had of laws, [680] and who was their lawgiver

Cle And thus far what you have said has been very well said

Ath They could hardly have wanted lawgivers as yet nothing of that sort was likely to have existed in their days, for they had no letters at this early period they lived by habit and the customs of their ancestors, as they are called.

Cle Probably

Ath But there was already existing a form of government which if I am not mistaken is generally termed a lordship and this still remains in many places, both among Hellenes and barbarians and is the government which is declared by Homer to have prevailed among the Cyclopes

> They have neither councils nor judgments but they dwell in hollow caves on the tops of high mountains and every one gives law to his wife and children and they do not busy themselves about one another

Cle That seems to be a charming poet of yours I have read some other verses of his, which are very clever but I do not know much of him, for foreign poets are very little read among the Cretans other cities which began to be founded—

Cl. Doubtless.

Ath. These cities made war against Troy—by sea as well as on land—at that time men were daring to be masters of the sea.

Cl. Clearly.

Ath. The Achaeans remained ten years and overthrew Troy.

Cl. True.

Ath. And during the ten years in which the Achaeans were besieging Ilium, the affairs of the besiegers were falling into an evil state. Their youth revolted; and when the soldiers returned to their own cities and families, they did not receive them properly, and as they ought to have done, and numerous deaths, murders, exiles, were the consequence. The exiles came again, under a new name, no longer Achaeans, but Dorians—a name which they derived from Dorieus; for it was he who gathered them together. The rest of the story is told by you Lacedaemonians as part of the history of Sparta.

Meg. To be sure.

Ath. Thus, after digressing from the original subject of laws into music and drinking-bouts, the argument has, providentially, come back to the same point, and presents to us another handle. For we have reached the settlement of Lacedaemon [683] which, as you truly say, is in laws and in institutions the sister of Crete. And we are all the better for the digression, because we have gone through various governments and settlements, and have been present at the foundation of a first, second, and third state, succeeding one another in infinite time. And now there appears on the horizon a fourth state or nation which was once in process of settlement and has continued settled to this day. If out of all this, we are able to discern what is well or ill settled, and what laws are the salvation and what are the destruction of cities, and what changes would make a state happy, O Megillus and Cleinias, we may now begin again, unless we have some fault to find with the previous discussion.

Meg. If some God, Stranger, would promise us that our new enquiry about legislation would be as good and full as the present, I would go a great way to hear such another, and would think that a day as long as this—and we are now approaching the longest day of the year—was too short for the discussion.

Ath. Then I suppose that we must consider this subject?

Meg. Certainly.

Ath. Let us place ourselves in thought at the moment when Lacedaemon and Argos and Messene and the rest of the Peloponnesus were all in complete subjection, Megillus, to your ancestors; for afterwards, as the legend informs us, they divided their army into three portions, and settled three cities, Argos, Messene, Lacedaemon.

Meg. True.

Ath. Temenus was the king of Argos, Cresphontes of Messene, Procles and Eurysthenes of Lacedaemon.

Meg. Certainly.

Ath. To these kings all the men of that day made oath that they would assist them, if any one subverted their kingdom.

Meg. True.

Ath. But can a kingship be destroyed, or was any other form of government ever destroyed, by any but the rulers themselves? No indeed, by Zeus. Have we already forgotten what was said a little while ago.

Meg. No.

Ath. And may we not now further confirm what was then mentioned? For we have come upon facts which have brought us back again to the same principle; so that, in resuming the discussion, we shall not be enquiring about an empty theory [684] but about events which actually happened. The case was as follows:—Three royal heroes made oath to three cities which were under a kingly government, and the cities to the kings, that both rulers and subjects should govern and be governed according to the laws which were common to all of them: the rulers promised that as time and the race went forward they would not make their rule more arbitrary; and the subjects said that, if the rulers observed these conditions, they would never subvert or permit others to subvert those kingdoms; the kings were to assist kings and peoples when injured, and the peoples were to assist peoples and kings in like manner. Is not this the fact?

Meg. Yes.

Ath. And the three states to whom these laws were given, whether their kings or any others were the authors of them, had therefore the greatest security for the maintenance of their constitutions?

Meg. What security?

Ath. That the other two states were always to come to the rescue against a rebellious third.

Meg. True.

Ath. Many persons say that legislators ought

Megillus But they are in La edaemon, and he appears to be the prince of them all the manner of life however which he describes is not Spartan but rather Ionian and he seems quite to confirm what you are saying when he traces up the ancient state of mankind by the help of tradition to barbarism

Ath Yes he does confirm it and we may accept his witness to the fact that such forms of government sometimes arise

Cle We may

Ath And were not such states composed of men who had been dispersed in single habitations and families by the poverty which attended the devastations and did not the eldest then rule among them because with them government originated in the authority of a father and a mother whom, like a flock of birds they followed forming one troop under the patriarchal rule and sovereignty of their parents which of all sovereignties is the most just?

Cle Very true

Ath After this they came together in greater numbers and increased the size of their cities and betook themselves to husbandry first of all at the foot of the mountains [681] and made enclosures of loose walls and works of defence in order to keep off wild beasts thus creating a single large and common habitation

Cle Yes at least we may suppose so

Ath There is another thing which would probably happen

Cle What?

Ath When these larger habitations grew up out of the lesser original ones each of the lesser ones would survive in the larger every family would be under the rule of the eldest, and, owing to their separation from one another would have peculiar customs in things divine and human which they would have received from their several parents who had educated them and these customs would incline them to order when the parents had the element of order in their nature and to courage when they had the element of courage And they would naturally stamp upon their children and upon their children s children their own likings and as we are saying they would find their way into the larger society having already their own peculiar laws

Cle Certainly

Ath And every man surely likes his own laws best and the laws of others not so well

Cle True

Ath Then now we seem to have stumbled upon the beginnings of legislation

Cle Exactly

Ath The next step will be that these perso who have met together will select some arl ters who will review the laws of all of ther and will publicly present such as they appro to the chiefs who lead the tribes and who a in a manner their kings allowing them choose those which they think best. These pe sons will themselves be called legislators an will appoint the magistrates, framing some so of aristocracy or perhaps monarchy out of th dynasties or lordships, and in this altered stat of the government they will live

Cle Yes that would be the natural order c things

Ath Then now let us speak of a third forn of government in which all other forms an conditions of polities and cities concur

Cle What is that?

Ath The form which in fact Homer indi cates as following the second This third forn arose when, as he says Dardanus founded Dar dania

> For not as yet had the holy Ilium been built o the plain to be a city of speaking men but the were still dwelling at the foot of many fountained Ida[1]

For indeed [682] in these verses and in what he said of the Cyclopes, he speaks the words of God and nature for poets are a divine race and often in their strains by the aid of the Muses and the Graces they attain truth

Cle Yes

Ath Then now let us proceed with the rest of our tale which will probably be found to illustrate in some degree our proposed design — Shall we do so?

Cle By all means

Ath Ilium was built when they had descended from the mountain in a large and fair plain on a sort of low hill watered by many rivers descending from Ida

Cle Such is the tradition

Ath And we must suppose this event to have taken place many ages after the deluge?

Ath A marvellous forgetfulness of the former destruction would appear to have come over them when they placed their town right under numerous streams flowing from the heights trusting for their security to not very high hills either

Cle There must have been a long interval clearly

Ath And as population increased many noble interests, than are here presented to his view

Ath Then now we seem to have happily arrived at a real and important question.

Meg Very true.

Ath Did you never remark, sage friend, that all men, and we ourselves at this moment, often fancy that they see some beautiful thing which might have effected wonders if any one had only known how to make a right use of it in some way and yet this mode of looking at things may turn out after all to be a mistake, and not according to nature, either in our own case or in any other?

Meg To what are you referring, and what do you mean?

Ath I was thinking of my own admiration of the aforesaid Heracleid expedition, which was so noble, and might have had such wonderful results for the Hellenes, if only rightly used and I was just laughing at myself.

Meg But were you not right and wise in speaking as you did, and we in assenting to you?

Ath Perhaps and yet I cannot help observing that any one who sees anything great or powerful, immediately has the feeling that—"If the owner only knew how to use his great and noble possession, how happy would he be, and what great results would he achieve!

[687] Meg And would he not be justified?

Ath Reflect in what point of view does this sort of praise appear just First, in reference to the question in hand —If the then commanders had known how to arrange their army properly how would they have attained success? Would not this have been the way? They would have bound them all firmly together and preserved them for ever giving them freedom and dominion at pleasure, combined with the power of doing in the whole world, Hellenic and barbarian whatever they and their descendants desired. What other aim would they have had?

Meg Very good.

Ath Suppose any one were in the same way to express his admiration at the sight of great wealth or family honour or the like, he would praise them under the idea that through them he would attain either all or the greater and chief part of what he desires.

Meg He would

Ath Well now and does not the argument show that there is one common desire of all mankind?

Meg What is it?

Ath The desire which a man has, that all things, if possible—at any rate, things human —may come to pass in accordance with his soul's desire.

Meg Certainly

Ath And having this desire always, and at every time of life, in youth, in manhood in age he cannot help always praying for the fulfilment of it.

Meg No doubt.

Ath And we join in the prayers of our friends, and ask for them what they ask for themselves.

Meg We do

Ath Dear is the son to the father—the younger to the elder

Meg Of course.

Ath And yet the son often prays to obtain things which the father prays that he may not obtain.

Meg When the son is young and foolish, you mean?

Ath Yes, or when the father in the dotage of age or the heat of youth, having no sense of right and justice, prays with fervour under the influence of feelings akin to those of Theseus when he cursed the unfortunate Hippolytus, do you imagine that the son, having a sense of right and justice, will join in his father's prayers?

Meg I understand you to mean that a man should not desire or be in a hurry to have all things according to his wish, for his wish may be at variance with his reason. But every state and every individual ought to pray and strive for wisdom. [688]

Ath Yes and I remember and you will remember what I said at first, that a statesman and legislator ought to ordain laws with a view to wisdom while you were arguing that the good lawgiver ought to order all with a view to war And to this I replied that there were four virtues, but that upon your view one of them only was the aim of legislation whereas you ought to regard all virtue, and especially that which comes first, and is the leader of all the rest—I mean wisdom and mind and opinion, having affection and desire in their train. And now the argument returns to the same point, and I say once more, in jest if you like, or in earnest if you like, that the prayer of a fool is full of danger being likely to end in the opposite of what he desires. And if you would rather receive my words in earnest, I am willing that you should and you will find, I suspect, as I have said already that not cowardice to impose such laws as the mass of the people will be ready to receive but this is just as if one were to command gymnastic masters or physicians to treat or cure their pupils or patients in an agreeable manner

Meg Exactly

Ath Whereas the physician may often be too happy if he can restore health and make the body whole without any very great infliction of pain

Meg Certainly

Ath There was also another advantage possessed by the men of that day, which greatly lightened the task of passing laws[1]

Meg What advantage?

Ath The legislators of that day when they equalized property escaped the great accusation which generally arises in legislation if a person attempts to disturb the possession of land, or to abolish debts because he sees that without this reform there can never be any real equality Now in general when the legislator attempts to make a new settlement of such matters every one meets him with the cry that he is not to disturb vested interests —declaring with imprecations that he is introducing agrarian laws and cancelling of debts, until a man is at his wits end whereas no one could quarrel with the Dorians for distributing the land—there was nothing to hinder them and as for debts they had none which were considerable or of old standing

Meg Very true

Ath But then my good friends why did the settlement and legislation of their country turn out so badly?

[685] Meg How do you mean and why do you blame them?

Ath There were three kingdoms and of these two quickly corrupted their original constitution and laws and the only one which remained was the Spartan

Meg The question which you ask is not easily answered

Ath And yet must be answered when we are enquiring about laws this being our old man s sober game of play whereby we beguile the way as I was saying when we first set out on our journey[2]

Meg Certainly and we must find out why this was

Ath What laws are more worthy of our attention than those which have regulated such cities? or what settlements of states are greater or more famous?

Meg I know of none

Ath Can we doubt that your ancestors intended these institutions not only for the protection of Peloponnesus but of all the Hellenes, in case they were attacked by the barbarian? For the inhabitants of the region about Ilium when they provoked by their insolence the Trojan war relied upon the power of the Assyrians and the Empire of Ninus which still existed and had a great prestige the people of those days fearing the united Assyrian Empire just as we now fear the Great King And the second capture of Troy was a serious offence against them because Troy was a portion of the Assyrian Empire To meet the danger the single army was distributed between three cities by the royal brothers, sons of Heracles—a fair device as it seemed and a far better arrangement than the expedition against Troy For, firstly, the people of that day had as they thought in the Heraclidae better leaders than the Pelopidae in the next place they considered that their army was superior in valour to that which went against Troy for although the latter conquered the Trojans they were themselves conquered by the Heraclidae—Achaeans by Dorians May we not suppose that this was the intention with which the men of those days framed the constitutions of their states?

Meg Quite true

[686] Ath And would not men who had shared with one another many dangers, and were governed by a single race of royal brothers and had taken the advice of oracles and in particular of the Delphian Apollo be likely to think that such states would be firmly and lastingly established?

Meg Of course they would

Ath Yet these institutions of which such great expectations were entertained seem to have all rapidly vanished away with the exception as I was saying of that small part of them which existed in your land And this third part has never to this day ceased warring against the two others whereas if the original idea had been carried out and they had agreed to be one their power would have been invincible in war

Meg No doubt

Ath But what was the ruin of this glorious confederacy? Here is a subject well worthy of consideration

Meg Certainly no one will ever find more striking instances of laws or governments being the salvation or destruction of great and

Ath Then now we seem to have happily arrived at a real and important question

And now the argument returns to the same point, and I say once more, in jest if you like, or in earnest if you like, that the prayer of a fool is full of danger being likely to end in the opposite of what he desires. And if you would rather receive my words in earnest, I am willing that you should and you will find, I suspect, as I have said already that not cowardice to impose such laws as the mass of the people will be ready to receive but this is just as if one were to command gymnastic masters or physicians to treat or cure their pupils or patients in an agreeable manner

Meg Exactly

Ath Whereas the physician may often be too happy if he can restore health and make the body whole without any very great infliction of pain

Meg Certainly

Ath There was also another advantage possessed by the men of that day, which greatly lightened the task of passing laws[1]

Meg What advantage?

Ath The legislators of that day when they equalized property escaped the great accusation which generally arises in legislation if a person attempts to disturb the possession of land or to abolish debts because he sees that without this reform there can never be any real equality Now, in general when the legislator attempts to make a new settlement of such matters, every one meets him with the cry that he is not to disturb vested interests —declaring with imprecations that he is introducing agrarian laws and cancelling of debts until a man is at his wits end whereas no one could quarrel with the Dorians for distributing the land—there was nothing to hinder them and as for debts they had none which were considerable or of old standing

Meg Very true

Ath But then my good friends why did the settlement and legislation of their country turn out so badly?

[685] Meg How do you mean and why do you blame them?

Ath There were three kingdoms, and of these two quickly corrupted their original constitution and laws and the only one which remained was the Spartan

Meg The question which you ask is not easily answered

Ath And yet must be answered when we are enquiring about laws this being our old man s sober game of play whereby we beguile the way as I was saying when we first set out on our journey[2]

Meg Certainly and we must find out why this was

Ath What laws are more worthy of our attention than those which have regulated such cities? or what settlements of states are greater or more famous?

Meg I know of none.

Ath Can we doubt that your ancestors intended the e institutions not only for the protection of Peloponnesus but of all the Hellenes, in case they were attacked by the barbarian? For the inhabitants of the region about Ilium when they provoked by their insolence the Trojan war relied upon the power of the Assyrians and the Empire of Ninus which still existed and had a great prestige the people of those days fearing the united Assyrian Empire just as we now fear the Great King And the second capture of Troy was a serious offence against them because Troy was a portion of the Assyrian Empire To meet the danger the single army was distributed between three cities by the royal brothers sons of Heracles—a fair device as it seemed and a far better arrangement than the expedition against Troy For firstly the people of that day had, as they thought in the Heraclidae better leaders than the Pelopidae in the next place they considered that their army was superior in valour to that which went against Troy for although the latter conquered the Trojans they were themselves conquered by the Heraclidae—Achaeans by Dorians May we not suppose that this was the intention with which the men of those days framed the constitutions of their states?

Meg Quite true

[686] Ath And would not men who had shared with one another many dangers and were governed by a single race of royal brothers and had taken the advice of oracles and in particular of the Delphian Apollo be likely to think that such states would be firmly and lastingly established?

Meg Of course they would

Ath Yet these institutions of which such great expectations were entertained seem to have all rapidly vanished away with the exception as I was saying of that small part of them which existed in your land And this third part has never to this day ceased warring against the two others whereas if the original idea had been carried out, and they had agreed to be one their power would have been invincible in war

Meg No doubt

Ath But what was the ruin of this glorious confederacy? Here is a subject well worthy of consideration

Meg Certainly no one will ever find more striking instances of laws or governments being the salvation or destruction of great and

[1] Cf. v 736

[2] Cf i 625

Ath There is a seventh kind of rule which is [illegible]arded by lot, and is dear to the Gods and a [illegible]ken of good fortune he on whom the lot falls a ruler and he who fails in obtaining the lot [illegible]es away and is the subject and this we af[illegible]rm to be quite just.

Cle Certainly

Ath "Then now" as we say playfully to any [o]f those who lightly undertake the making of [la]ws, you see, legislator the principles of gov[er]nment, how many they are, and that they are [n]aturally opposed to each other There we have [d]iscovered a fountain head of seditions to which you must attend And, first, we will ask [y]ou to consider with us, how and in what re[s]pect the kings of Argos and Messene violated these our maxims and ruined themselves and the great and famous Hellenic power of the olden time Was it because they did not know how wisely Hesiod spoke when he said that the half is often more than the whole? His meaning was that when to take the whole would be dangerous and to take the half would be the safe and moderate course then the moderate or better was more than the immoderate or worse."

Cle Very true

Ath And may we suppose this immoderate spirit to be more fatal when found among kings than when among peoples?

[691] Cle The probability is that ignorance will be a disorder especially prevalent among kings, because they lead a proud and luxurious life

Ath Is it not palpable that the chief aim of the kings of that time was to get the better of the established laws, and that they were not in harmony with the principles which they had agreed to observe by word and oath? This want of harmony may have had the appearance of wisdom but was really as we assert, the greatest ignorance, and utterly overthrew the whole empire by dissonance and harsh discord

Cle Very likely

Ath Good and what measures ought the legislator to have then taken in order to avert this calamity? Truly there is no great wisdom [i]n kn[owi]ng and no great difficulty in telling after the e[vi]l has happened but to have fore[]seen the remedy at the time [w]ould have taken a much wiser head than ours

Meg What do you mean?

Ath Any one who looks at what has occurred with you Lacedaemonians Megillus, may easily know and may easily say what ought to have been done at that time

Meg Speak a little more clearly

Ath Nothing can be clearer than the observation which I am about to make.

Meg What is it?

Ath That if any one gives too great a power to anything too large a sail to a vessel too much food to the body too much authority to the mind, and does not observe the mean, everything is overthrown, and in the wantonness of excess runs in the one case to disorders and in the other to injustice, which is the child of excess I mean to say my dear friends that there is no soul of man young and irresponsible who will be able to sustain the temptation of arbitrary power—no one who will not, under such circumstances, become filled with folly that worst of diseases, and be hated by his nearest and dearest friends when this happens his kingdom is undermined and all his power vanishes from him And great legislators who know the mean should take heed of the danger As far as we can guess at this distance of time, what happened was as follows —

Meg What?

Ath A God, who watched over Sparta, seeing into the future, gave you two families of kings instead of one and thus brought you more within the limits of moderation In the next place, some human wisdom mingled with divine power observing that the constitution of your government was still feverish and excited tempered your inborn strength and pride of birth with the moderation which comes of age, [692] making the power of your twenty eight elders equal with that of the kings in the most important matters. But your third saviour perceiving that your government was still swelling and foaming and desirous to impose a curb upon it, instituted the Ephors, whose power he made to resemble that of magistrates elected by lot and by this arrangement the kingly office, being compounded of the right elements and duly moderated was preserved and was the means of preserving all the rest. Since if there had been only the original legislators Temenus Cresphontes and their contemporaries as far as they were concerned not even the portion of Aristodemus would have been preserved for they had no proper experience in legislation or they would surely not have imagined that oaths would moderate a youthful spirit invested with a power which might be converted into a tyranny Now that God has instructed us what sort of government would have been or will be lasting there is no wisdom as I have already said in judging after

was the cause of the ruin of the Dorian kings and of their whole design nor ignorance of military matters, either on the part of the rulers or of their subjects but their misfortunes were due to their general degeneracy and especially to their ignorance of the most important human affairs That was then and is still and always will be the case as I will endeavour if you will allow me to make out and demonstrate as well as I am able to you who are my friends in the course of the argument

Cle Pray go on Stranger —compliments are troublesome but we will show not in word but in deed how greatly we prize your words for we will give them our best attention and that is the way in which a freeman best shows his approval or disapproval

Meg Excellent Cleinias let us do as you say

Cle By all means if Heaven wills Go on

Ath Well then proceeding in the same train of thought I say that the greatest ignorance was the ruin of the Dorian power and that now as then ignorance is ruin And if this be true the legislator must endeavour to implant wisdom in states, and banish ignorance to the utmost of his power

Cle That is evident

[689] Ath Then now consider what is really the greatest ignorance I should like to know whether you and Megillus would agree with me in what I am about to say for my opinion is——

Cle What?

Ath That the greatest ignorance is when a man hates that which he nevertheless thinks to be good and noble and loves and embraces that which he knows to be unrighteous and evil This disagreement between the sense of pleasure and the judgment of reason in the soul is in my opinion the worst ignorance and also the greatest because affecting the great mass of the human soul for the principle which feels pleasure and pain in the individual is like the mass or populace in a state And when the soul is opposed to knowledge or opinion or reason which are her natural lords that I call folly just as in the state when the multitude refuses to obey their rulers and the laws or again in the individual when fair reasonings have their habitation in the soul and yet do no good but rather the reverse of good All these cases I term the worst ignorance whether in individuals or in states You will understand Stranger that I am speaking of something which is very different from the ignorance of handicraftsmen

Cle Yes my friend we understand and agree

Ath Let us then in the first place declare and affirm that the citizen who does not know these things ought never to have any kind of authority entrusted to him he must be stigmatized as ignorant even though he be versed in calculation and skilled in all sorts of accomplishments and feats of mental dexterity and the opposite are to be called wise, even although, in the words of the proverb they know neither how to read nor how to swim and to them as to men of sense authority is to be committed For O my friends how can there be the least shadow of wisdom when there is no harmony? *There is none but the noblest and great*est of harmonies may be truly said to be the greatest wisdom and of this he is a partaker who lives according to reason whereas he who is devoid of reason is the destroyer of his house and the very opposite of a saviour of the state he is utterly ignorant of political wisdom Let this then as I was saying be laid down by us

Cle Let it be so laid down

Ath I suppose that there must be rulers and subjects in states?

Cle Certainly

[690] Ath And what are the principles on which men rule and obey in cities whether great or small and similarly in families? What are they and how many in number? Is there not one claim of authority which is always just —that of fathers and mothers and in general of progenitors to rule over their offspring?

Cle There is

Ath Next follows the principle that the noble should rule over the ignoble and thirdly that the elder should rule and the younger obey?

Cle To be sure

Ath And fourthly that slaves should be ruled and their masters rule?

Cle Of course

Ath Fifthly if I am not mistaken comes the principle that the stronger shall rule and the weaker be ruled?

Cle That is a rule not to be disobeyed

Ath Yes and a rule which prevails very widely among all creatures and is according to nature as the Theban poet Pindar once said and the sixth principle and the greatest of all is that the wise should lead and command and the ignorant follow and obey and yet O thou most wise Pindar as I should reply to him this surely is not contrary to nature but according to nature being the rule of law over willing subjects and not a rule of compulsion

Cle Most true

Ath. There is a seventh kind of rule which is awarded by lot, and is dear to the Gods and a token of good fortune: he on whom the lot falls is a ruler, and he who fails in obtaining the lot goes away and is the subject; and this we affirm to be quite just.

Cle. Certainly.

Ath. "Then now," as we say playfully to any of those who lightly undertake the making of laws, "you see, legislator, the principles of government, how many they are, and that they are naturally opposed to each other." There we have discovered a fountain-head of seditions, to which you must attend. And, first, we will ask you to consider with us, how and in what respect the kings of Argos and Messene violated these our maxims, and ruined themselves and the great and famous Hellenic power of the olden time. Was it because they did not know how wisely Hesiod spoke when he said that the half is often more than the whole? His meaning was, that when to take the whole would be dangerous, and to take the half would be the safe and moderate course, then the moderate or better was more than the immoderate or worse.

Cle. Very true.

Ath. And may we suppose this immoderate spirit to be more fatal when found among kings than when among peoples?

[691] Cle. The probability is that ignorance will be a disorder especially prevalent among kings, because they lead a proud and luxurious life.

Ath. Is it not palpable that the chief aim of the kings of that time was to get the better of the established laws, and that they were not in harmony with the principles which they had agreed to observe by word and oath? This want of harmony may have had the appearance of wisdom, but was really, as we assert, the greatest ignorance, and utterly overthrew the whole empire by dissonance and harsh discord.

Cle. Very likely.

Ath. Good; and what measures ought the legislator to have then taken in order to avert this calamity? Truly there is no great wisdom in knowing, and no great difficulty in telling, after the evil has happened; but to have foreseen the remedy at the time would have taken a much wiser head than ours.

Meg. What do you mean?

Ath. Any one who looks at what has occurred with you Lacedaemonians, Megillus, may easily know and may easily say what ought to have been done at that time.

Meg. Speak a little more clearly.

Ath. Nothing can be clearer than the observation which I am about to make.

Meg. What is it?

Ath. That if any one gives too great a power to anything, too large a sail to a vessel, too much food to the body, too much authority to the mind, and does not observe the mean, everything is overthrown, and, in the wantonness of excess runs in the one case to disorders, and in the other to injustice, which is the child of excess. I mean to say, my dear friends, that there is no soul of man, young and irresponsible, who will be able to sustain the temptation of arbitrary power—no one who will not, under such circumstances, become filled with folly, that worst of diseases, and be hated by his nearest and dearest friends: when this happens, his kingdom is undermined, and all his power vanishes from him. And great legislators who know the mean should take heed of the danger. As far as we can guess at this distance of time, what happened was as follows:—

Meg. What?

Ath. A God, who watched over Sparta, seeing into the future, gave you two families of kings instead of one; and thus brought you more within the limits of moderation. In the next place, some human wisdom mingled with divine power, observing that the constitution of your government was still feverish and excited, tempered your inborn strength and pride of birth with the moderation which comes of age, [692] making the power of your twenty-eight elders equal with that of the kings in the most important matters. But your third saviour, perceiving that your government was still swelling and foaming, and desirous to impose a curb upon it, instituted the Ephors, whose power he made to resemble that of magistrates elected by lot; and by this arrangement the kingly office, being compounded of the right elements and duly moderated, was preserved, and was the means of preserving all the rest. Since, if there had been only the original legislators, Temenus, Cresphontes, and their contemporaries, as far as they were concerned not even the portion of Aristodemus would have been preserved; for they had no proper experience in legislation, or they would surely not have imagined that oaths would moderate a youthful spirit invested with a power which might be converted into a tyranny. Now that God has instructed us what sort of government would have been or will be lasting, there is no wisdom, as I have already said, in judging after the event there is no difficulty in learning from an example which has already occurred But if any one could have foreseen all this at the time, and had been able to moderate the government of the three kingdoms and unite them into one he might have saved all the excellent institutions which were then conceived and no Persian or any other armament would have dared to attack us, or would have regarded Hellas as a power to be despised

Ath There was small credit to us Cleinias in defeating them and the discredit was not that the conquerors did not win glorious victories both by land and sea, but what, in my opinion, brought discredit was first of all the circumstance that of the three cities one only fought on behalf of Hellas, and the two others were so utterly good for nothing that the one was waging a mighty war against Lacedaemon, and was thus preventing her from rendering assistance while the city of Argos which had the precedence at the time of the distribution when asked to aid in repelling the barbarian would not answer to the call, or give aid Many things might be told about Hellas in connection with that war which are far from honourable nor indeed can we rightly say that Hellas repelled the invader for the truth is that unless the Athenians and Lacedaemonians [693] acting in concert had warded off the impending yoke all the tribes of Hellas would have been fused in a chaos of Hellenes mingling with one another of barbarians mingling with Hellenes and Hellenes with barbarians just as nations who are now subject to the Persian power owing to unnatural separations and combinations of them are dispersed and scattered and live miserably These Cleinias and Megillus are the reproaches which we have to make against statesmen and legislators as they are called past and present if we would analyse the causes of their failure and find out what else might have been done We said for instance just now that there ought to be no great and unmixed powers and this was under the idea that a state ought to be free and wise and harmonious and that a legislator ought to legislate with a view to this end Nor is there any reason to be surprised at our continually proposing aims for the legislator which appear not to be always the same but we should consider when we say that temperance is to be the aim or wisdom is to be the aim or friendship is to be the aim that all these aims are really the same and if so a variety in the modes of expression ought not to disturb us

Cle Let us resume the argument in that spirit And now, speaking of friendship and wisdom and freedom I wish that you would tell me at what, in your opinion, the legislator should aim

Ath Hear me then there are two mother forms of states from which the rest may be truly said to be derived and one of them may be called monarchy and the other democracy the Persians have the highest form of the one, and we of the other almost all the rest as I was saying are variations of these. Now, if you are to have liberty and the combination of friendship with wisdom you must have both these forms of government in a measure the argument emphatically declares that no city can be well governed which is not made up of both[1]

Cle Impossible

Ath Neither the one if it be exclusively and excessively attached to monarchy nor the other if it be similarly attached to freedom observes moderation but your states the Laconian and Cretan have more of it and the same was the case with the Athenians and Persians of old time but now they have less Shall I tell you why?

[694] Cle By all means if it will tend to elucidate our subject

Ath Hear then —There was a time when the Persians had more of the state which is a mean between slavery and freedom In the reign of Cyrus they were freemen and also lords of many others the rulers gave a share of freedom to the subjects and being treated as equals, the soldiers were on better terms with their generals and showed themselves more ready in the hour of danger And if there was any wise man among them who was able to give good counsel he imparted his wisdom to the public for the king was not jealous but allowed him full liberty of speech and gave honour to those who could advise him in any matter And the nation waxed in all respects because there was freedom and friendship and communion of mind among them

Cle That certainly appears to have been the case

Ath How then was this advantage lost under Cambyses and again recovered under Darius? Shall I try to divine?

Cle The enquiry no doubt has a bearing upon our subject

Ath I imagine that Cyrus though a great and patriotic general had never given his mind

[1] Cf. vi 756 Aristotle Politics ii. 6 1266 17

to education, and never attended to the order of his household.

Cle What makes you say so?

Ath I think that from his youth upwards he was a soldier and entrusted the education of his children to the women and they brought them up from their childhood as the favourites of fortune, who were blessed already and needed no more blessings. They thought that they were happy enough, and that no one should be allowed to oppose them in any way and they compelled every one to praise all that they said or did This was how they brought them up

Cle A splendid education truly!

Ath. Such an one as women were likely to give them, and especially princesses who had recently grown rich and in the absence of the men, too, who were occupied in wars and dangers, and had no time to look after them.

Cle What would you expect?

Ath Their father had possessions of cattle and sheep, and many herds of men and other animals [695] but he did not consider that those to whom he was about to make them over were not trained in his own calling which was Persian for the Persians are shepherds—sons of a rugged land, which is a stern mother and well fitted to produce a sturdy race able to live in the open air and go without sleep and also to fight, if fighting is required He did not observe that his sons were trained differently through the so-called blessing of being royal they were educated in the Median fashion by women and eunuchs, which led to their becoming such as people do become when they are brought up unreproved And so after the death of Cyrus, his sons, in the fulness of luxury and licence, took the kingdom and first one slew the other because he could not endure a rival and, afterwards the slayer himself mad with wine and brutality lost his kingdom through the Medes and the Eunuch, as they called him, who despised the folly of Cambyses.

Cle So runs the tale and such probably were the facts

Ath Yes and the tradition says, that the empire came back to the Persians, through Darius and the seven chiefs.

Cle True

Ath Let us note the rest of the story Observe, that Darius was not the son of a king, and had not received a luxurious education. When he came to the throne, being one of the seven, he divided the country into seven portions and of this arrangement there are some shadowy traces still remaining he made laws upon the principle of introducing universal equality in the order of the state, and he embodied in his laws the settlement of the tribute which Cyrus promised—thus creating a feeling of friendship and community among all the Persians and attaching the people to him with money and gifts Hence his armies cheerfully acquired for him countries as large as those which Cyrus had left behind him. Darius was succeeded by his son Xerxes and he again was brought up in the royal and luxurious fashion Might we not most justly say "O Darius, how came you to bring up Xerxes in the same way in which Cyrus brought up Cambyses, and not to see his fatal mistake?" For Xerxes, being the creation of the same education met with much the same fortune as Cambyses and from that time until now there has never been a really great king among the Persians although they are all called Great. And their degeneracy is not to be attributed to chance as I maintain the reason is rather the evil life which is generally led by the sons of very rich and royal persons [696] for never will boy or man young or old, excel in virtue, who has been thus educated And this, I say is what the legislator has to consider and what at the present moment has to be considered by us Justly may you O Lacedaemonians, be praised in that you do not give special honour or a special education to wealth rather than to poverty or to a royal rather than to a private station, where the divine and inspired lawgiver has not originally commanded them to be given. For no man ought to have pre-eminent honour in a state because he surpasses others in wealth, any more than because he is swift of foot or fair or strong unless he have some virtue in him nor even if he have virtue, unless he have this particular virtue of temperance.

Meg What do you mean, Stranger?

Ath I suppose that courage is a part of virtue?

Meg To be sure

Ath Then now hear and judge for yourself —Would you like to have for a fellow-lodger or neighbour a very courageous man, who had no control over himself?

Meg Heaven forbid!

Ath Or an artist, who was clever in his profession but a rogue?

Meg Certainly not

Ath And surely justice does not grow apart from temperance?

Cf. Aristotle, Politics ii, 2, 1324 10-15.

Meg Impossible

Ath Any more than our pattern wise man whom we exhibited as having his pleasures and pains in accordance with and corresponding to true reason can be intemperate? [1]

Meg No

Ath There is a further consideration relating to the due and undue award of honours in states

Meg What is it?

Ath I should like to know whether temperance without the other virtues existing alone in the soul of man is rightly to be praised or blamed?

Meg I cannot tell

Ath And that is the best answer for whichever alternative you had chosen I think that you would have gone wrong

Meg I am fortunate

Ath Very good a quality, which is a mere appendage of things which can be praised or blamed does not deserve an expression of opinion but is best passed over in silence

Meg You are speaking of temperance?

Ath Yes but of the other virtues that which having this appendage is also most beneficial will be most deserving of honour and next that which is beneficial in the next degree and so each of them will be rightly honoured according to a regular order [697] Ath And ought not the legislator to determine these classes?

Meg True

Meg Certainly he should

Ath Suppose that we leave to him the arrangement of details But the general division of laws according to their importance into a first and second and third class we who are lovers of law may make ourselves

Meg Very good

Ath We maintain then that a State which would be safe and happy as far as the nature of man allows must and ought to distribute honour and dishonour in the right way And the right way is to place the goods of the soul first and highest in the scale, always assuming temperance to be the condition of them and to assign the second place to the goods of the body and the third place to money and property And if any legislator or state departs from this rule by giving money the place of honour or in any way preferring that which is really last may we not say that he or the state is doing an unholy and unpatriotic thing?

Meg Yes let that be plainly declared

Ath The consideration of the Persian governments led us thus far to enlarge We remarked that the Persians grew worse and worse And we affirm the reason of this to have been that they too much diminished the freedom of the people and introduced too much of despotism and so destroyed friendship and community of feeling And when there is an end of these no longer do the governors govern on behalf of their subjects or of the people but on behalf of themselves and if they think that they can gain ever so small an advantage for themselves they devastate cities and send fire and desolation among friendly races And as they hate ruthlessly and horribly so are they hated and when they want the people to fight for them they find no community of feeling or willingness to risk their lives on their behalf their untold myriads are useless to them on the field of battle and they think that their salvation depends on the employment of mercenaries and strangers whom they hire as if they were in want of more men And they cannot help being stupid since they proclaim by their actions that the ordinary distinctions of right and wrong which are made in a state are a trifle, [698] when compared with gold and silver

Meg Quite true

Ath And now enough of the Persians and their present maladministration of their government which is owing to the excess of slavery and despotism among them

Meg Good

Ath Next we must pass in review the government of Attica in like manner and from this show that entire freedom and the absence of all superior authority is not by any means so good as government by others when properly limited which was our ancient Athenian constitution at the time when the Persians made their attack on Hellas or speaking more correctly on the whole continent of Europe There were four classes, arranged according to a property census and reverence was our queen and mistress and made us willing to live in obedience to the laws which then prevailed Also the vastness of the Persian armament both by sea and on land caused a helpless terror which made us more and more the servants of our rulers and of the laws and for all these reasons an exceeding harmony prevailed among us About ten years before the naval engagement at Salamis Datis came leading a Persian host by command of Darius which was expressly directed against the Athenians and Eretrians having orders to carry them away captive and

[1] Cf 689

these orders he was to execute under pain of death. Now Datis and his myriads soon became complete masters of Eretria, and he sent a fearful report to Athens that no Eretrian had escaped him for the soldiers of Datis had joined hands and netted the whole of Eretria. And this report, whether well or ill founded, was terrible to all the Hellenes, and above all to the Athenians, and they dispatched embassies in all directions, but no one was willing to come to their relief with the exception of the Lacedaemonians and they either because they were detained by the Messenian war which was then going on, or for some other reason of which we are not told, came a day too late for the battle of Marathon. After a while, the news arrived of mighty preparations being made, and innumerable threats came from the king Then, as time went on, a rumour reached us that Darius had died, and that his son, who was young and hot headed, [699] had come to the throne and was persisting in his design. The Athenians were under the impression that the whole expedition was directed against them, in consequence of the battle of Marathon and hearing of the bridge over the Hellespont, and the canal of Athos, and the host of ships considering that there was no salvation for them either by land or by sea, for there was no one to help them, and remembering that in the first expedition, when the Persians destroyed Eretria, no one came to their help, or would risk the danger of an alliance with them, they thought that this would happen again, at least on land nor when they looked to the sea, could they descry any hope of salvation for they were attacked by a thousand vessels and more. One chance of safety remained, slight indeed and desperate, but their only one. They saw that on the former occasion they had gained a seemingly impossible victory and borne up by this hope, they found that their only refuge was in themselves and in the Gods. All these things created in them the spirit of friendship there was the fear of the moment, and there was that higher fear which they had acquired by obedience to their ancient laws, and which I have several times in the preceding discourse called reverence, of which the good man ought to be a willing servant, and of which the coward is independent and fearless. If this fear had not possessed them, they would never have met the enemy or defended their temples and sepulchres and their country and everything that was near and dear to them, as they did but little by little they would have been all scattered and dispersed

Meg Your words, Athenian are quite true and worthy of yourself and of your country

Ath They are true, Megillus and to you who have inherited the virtues of your ancestors, I may properly speak of the actions of that day And I would wish you and Cleinias to consider whether my words have not also a bearing on legislation for I am not discoursing only for the pleasure of talking but for the argument's sake. Please to remark that the experience both of ourselves and the Persians was, in a certain sense, the same for as they led their people into utter servitude, so we too led ours into all freedom And now how shall we proceed? for I would like you to observe that our previous arguments have a good deal to say for themselves.

[700] Meg True but I wish that you would give us a fuller explanation.

Ath I will. Under the ancient laws, my friends, the people was not as now the master but rather the willing servant of the laws.

Meg What laws do you mean?

Ath In the first place, let us speak of the laws about music—that is to say such music as then existed—in order that we may trace the growth of the excess of freedom from the beginning Now music was early divided among us into certain kinds and manners One sort consisted of prayers to the Gods, which were called hymns and there was another and opposite sort called lamentations, and another termed paeans, and another celebrating the birth of Dionysus, called, I believe, "dithyrambs." And they used the actual word "laws," or νόμοι, for another kind of song and to this they added the term "citharoedic." All these and others were duly distinguished nor were the performers allowed to confuse one style of music with another And the authority which determined and gave judgment, and punished the disobedient, was not expressed in a hiss, nor in the most unmusical shouts of the multitude, as in our days, nor in applause and clapping of hands. But the directors of public instruction insisted that the spectators should listen in silence to the end and boys and their tutors, and the multitude in general, were kept quiet by a hint from a stick. Such was the good order which the multitude were willing to observe they would never have dared to give judgment by noisy cries. And then as time went on the poets themselves introduced the reign of vulgar and lawless innovation They were men of genius, but they had no perception of what is just and lawful in music raging like Bacchanals and possessed with inordinate delights—mingling lamentations with hymns, and paeans with dithyrambs imitating the sounds of the flute on the lyre and making one general confusion ignorantly affirming that music has no truth and whether good or bad can only be judged of rightly by the pleasure of the hearer And by composing such licentious works and adding to them words as licentious they have inspired the multitude with lawlessness and boldness and made them fancy that they can judge for themselves about melody and song [701] And in this way the theatres from being mute have become vocal as though they had understanding of good and bad in music and poetry, and instead of an aristocracy an evil sort of theatrocracy has grown up For if the democracy which judged had only consisted of educated persons no fatal harm would have been done, but in music there first arose the universal conceit of omniscience and general lawlessness —freedom came following afterwards and men fancying that they knew what they did not know had no longer any fear and the absence of fear begets shamelessness For what is this shamelessness which is so evil a thing but the insolent refusal to regard the opinion of the better by reason of an over-daring sort of liberty?

Meg Very true

Ath Consequent upon this freedom comes the other freedom of disobedience to rulers [2] and then the attempt to escape the control and exhortation of father mother elders and when near the end the control of the laws also and at the very end there is the contempt of oaths and pledges and no regard at all for the Gods —herein they exhibit and imitate the old so-called Titanic nature and come to the same point as the Titans when they rebelled against God leading a life of endless evils But why have I said all this? I ask because the argument ought to be pulled up from time to time and not be allowed to run away, but held with bit and bridle and then we shall not as the proverb says fall off our ass Let us then once more ask the question, To what end has all this been said?

Meg Very good

Ath This then has been said for the sake—

Meg Of what?

Ath We were maintaining that the lawgiver ought to have three things in view first that the city for which he legislates should be free and secondly be at unity with herself and thirdly should have understanding —these were our principles were they not?

Meg Certainly

Ath With a view to this we selected two kinds of government, the one the most despotic, and the other the most free and now we are considering which of them is the right form we took a mean in both cases of despotism in the one and of liberty in the other and we saw that in a mean they attained their perfection but that when they were carried to the extreme of either slavery or licence neither party were the gainers

[702] Meg Very true

Ath And that was our reason for considering the settlement of the Dorian army and of the city built by Dardanus at the foot of the mountains and the removal of cities to the sea shore and of our mention of the first men, who were the survivors of the deluge And all that was previously said about music and drinking and what preceded was said with the view of seeing how a state might be best administered and how an individual might best order his own life. And now Megillus and Cleinias how can we put to the proof the value of our words?

Cle Stranger I think that I see how a proof of their value may be obtained This discussion of ours appears to me to have been singularly fortunate, and just what I at this moment want most auspiciously have you and my friend Megillus come in my way For I will tell you what has happened to me and I regard the coincidence as a sort of omen The greater part of Crete is going to send out a colony and they have entrusted the management of the affair to the Cnosians and the Cnosian government to me and nine others And they desire us to give them any laws which we please whether taken from the Cretan model or from any other and they do not mind about their being foreign if they are better Grant me then this favour which will also be a gain to yourselves —Let us make a selection from what has been said and then let us imagine a State of which we will suppose ourselves to be the original founders Thus we shall proceed with our enquiry and at the same time I may have the use of the framework which you are constructing for the city which is in contemplation

Ath Good news Cleinias if Megillus has no objection you may be sure that I will do all in my power to please you

Cle. Thank you.

Meg. And so will I.

Cle. Excellent: and now let us begin to frame the State.

BOOK IV

[704] Athenian Stranger. And now, what will this city be? I do not mean to ask what is or will hereafter be the name of the place; that may be determined by the accident of locality or of the original settlement—a river or fountain, or some local deity may give the sanction of a name to the newly founded city; but I do want to know what the situation is, whether maritime or inland.

Cleinias. I should imagine, Stranger, that the city of which we are speaking is about eighty stadia distant from the sea.

Ath. And are there harbours on the seaboard?

Cle. Excellent harbours, Stranger; there could not be better.

Ath. Alas! what a prospect! And is the surrounding country productive, or in need of importations?

Cle. Hardly in need of anything.

Ath. And is there any neighbouring State?

Cle. None whatever, and that is the reason for selecting the place; in days of old, there was a migration of the inhabitants, and the region has been deserted from time immemorial.

Ath. And has the place a fair proportion of hill, and plain, and wood?

Cle. Like the rest of Crete in that.

Ath. You mean to say that there is more rock than plain?

Cle. Exactly.

Ath. Then there is some hope that your citizens may be virtuous: had you been on the sea, and well provided with harbours, and an importing rather than a producing country, some mighty saviour would have been needed, and lawgivers more than mortal, if you were ever to have a chance of preserving your state from degeneracy and discordance of manners. But there is comfort in the eighty stadia; although the sea is too near, especially if, as you say, the harbours are so good. [705] Still we may be content. The sea is pleasant enough as a daily companion, but has indeed also a bitter and brackish quality; filling the streets with merchants and shopkeepers, and begetting in the souls of men uncertain and unfaithful ways—making the state unfriendly and unfaithful both to her own citizens, and also to other nations. There is a consolation, therefore, in the country producing all things at home; and yet, owing to the ruggedness of the soil, not providing anything in great abundance. Had there been abundance, there might have been a great export trade, and a great return of gold and silver; which, as we may safely affirm, has the most fatal results on a State whose aim is the attainment of just and noble sentiments: this was said by us, if you remember, in the previous discussion.

Cle. I remember, and am of opinion that we both were and are in the right.

Ath. Well, but let me ask, how is the country supplied with timber for ship-building?

Cle. There is no fir of any consequence, nor pine, and not much cypress; and you will find very little stone pine or plane wood, which shipwrights always require for the interior of ships.

Ath. These are also natural advantages.

Cle. Why so?

Ath. Because no city ought to be easily able to imitate its enemies in what is mischievous.

Cle. How does that bear upon any of the matters of which we have been speaking?

Ath. Remember, my good friend, what I said at first about the Cretan laws, that they looked to one thing only, and this, as you both agreed, was war; and I replied that such laws, in so far as they tended to promote virtue, were good; but in that they regarded a part only, and not the whole of virtue, I disapproved of them. And now I hope that you in your turn will follow and watch me if I legislate with a view to anything but virtue, or with a view to a part of virtue only. For I consider that the true lawgiver, like an archer, aims only at that on which some eternal beauty is always attending, [706] and dismisses everything else, whether wealth or any other benefit, when separated from virtue. I was saying that the imitation of enemies was a bad thing; and I was thinking of a case in which a maritime people are harassed by enemies, as the Athenians were by Minos (I do not speak from any desire to recall past grievances); but he, as we know, was a great naval potentate, who compelled the inhabitants of Attica to pay him a cruel tribute; and in those days they had no ships of war as they now have, nor was the country filled with ship-timber, and therefore they could not readily build them. Hence they could not learn how to imitate their enemy at sea, and in this way, becoming sailors themselves, directly repel their enemies. Better for them to have lost many times over the seven youths than that heavy armed and stationary troops should have been turned into sailors and accustomed to be often leaping on shore, and again to come running back to their ships or should have fancied that there was no disgrace in not awaiting the attack of an enemy and dying boldly and that there were good reasons and plenty of them for a man throwing away his arms and betaking himself to flight—which is not dishonourable as people say, at certain times This is the language of naval warfare and is anything but worthy of extraordinary praise For we should not teach bad habits least of all to the best part of the citizens You may learn the evil of such a practice from Homer by whom Odysseus is introduced rebuking Agamemnon because he desires to draw down the ships to the sea at a time when the Achaeans are hard pressed by the Trojans—he gets angry with him and says

Who at a time when the battle is in full cry biddest to drag the well benched ships into the sea that the prayers of the Trojans may be accomplished yet more and high ruin fall upon us For the Achaeans will not maintain the battle when the ships are drawn into the sea but they will look behind and will cease from strife in that the counsel which you give will prove injurious [707]

You see that he quite knew triremes on the sea in the neighbourhood of fighting men to be an evil —lions might be trained in that way to fly from a herd of deer Moreover naval powers which owe their safety to ships do not give honour to that sort of warlike excellence which is most deserving of it For he who owes his safety to the pilot and the captain and the oarsman and all sorts of rather inferior persons cannot rightly give honour to whom honour is due But how can a state be in a right condition which cannot justly award honour?

Cle It is hardly possible I admit and yet Stranger we Cretans are in the habit of saying that the battle of Salamis was the salvation of Hellas

Ath Why yes and that is an opinion which is widely spread both among Hellenes and barbarians But Megillus and I say rather that the battle of Marathon was the beginning and the battle of Plataea the completion of the great deliverance and that these battles by land made the Hellenes better whereas the sea fights of Salamis and Artemisium—for I may as well put them both together—made them no better if I may say so without offence about the battles which helped to save us And in estimating the goodness of a state we regard both the situation of the country and the order of the laws considering that the mere preservation and continuance of life is not the most honourable thing for men as the vulgar think but the continuance of the best life while we live and that again if I am not mistaken is a remark which has been made already [1]

Cle Yes

Ath Then we have only to ask whether we are taking the course which we acknowledge to be the best for the settlement and legislation of states

Cle The best by far

Ath And now let me proceed to another question Who are to be the colonists? May any one come out of all Crete and is the idea that the population in the several states is too numerous for the means of subsistence? For I suppose that you are not going to send out a general invitation to any Hellene who likes to come And yet I observe that to your country settlers have come from Argos and [708] Aegina and other parts of Hellas Tell me then whence do you draw your recruits in the present enterprise?

Cle They will come from all Crete and of other Hellenes Peloponnesians will be most acceptable For as you truly observe there are Cretans of Argive descent and the race of Cretans which has the highest character at the present day is the Gortynian and this has come from Gortys in the Peloponnesus

Ath Cities find colonization in some respects easier if the colonists are one race which like a swarm of bees is sent out from a single country either when friends leave friends owing to some pressure of population or other similar necessity or when a portion of a state is driven by factions to emigrate And there have been whole cities which have taken flight when utterly conquered by a superior power in war This however which is in one way an advantage to the colonist or legislator in another point of view creates a difficulty There is an element of friendship in the community of race and language and laws and in common temples and rites of worship but colonies which are of this homogeneous sort are apt to kick against any laws or any form of constitution differing from that which they had at home and although the badness of their own laws may have been the cause of the factions which prevailed among them yet from the force of habit they would fain preserve the very customs which were then run, and the leader of the colony who is their legislator finds them troublesome and rebellious. On the other hand the conflux of several populations might be more disposed to listen to new laws but then, to make them combine and pull together as they say of horses, is a most difficult task, and the work of years. And yet there is nothing which tends more to the improvement of mankind than legislation and colonization.

[1] Cf ii 661

Cle No doubt but I should like to know why you say so.

Ath My good friend, I am afraid that the course of my speculations is leading me to say something depreciatory of legislators but if the word be to the purpose, there can be no harm. And yet, why am I disquieted, for I believe that the same principle applies equally to all human things.

[709] Cle To what are you referring?

Ath I was going to say that man never legislates, but accidents of all sorts, which legislate for us in all sorts of ways. The violence of war and the hard necessity of poverty are constantly overturning governments and changing laws. And the power of disease has often caused innovations in the state, when there have been pestilences, or when there has been a succession of bad seasons continuing during many years. Any one who sees all this, naturally rushes to the conclusion of which I was speaking, that no mortal legislates in anything, but that in human affairs chance is almost everything And this may be said of the arts of the sailor and the pilot, and the physician, and the general, and may seem to be well said and yet there is another thing which may be said with equal truth of all of them.

Cle What is it?

Ath That God governs all things, and that chance and opportunity co-operate with him in the government of human affairs. There is, however a third and less extreme view that art should be there also for I should say that in a storm there must surely be a great advantage in having the aid of the pilot's art. You would agree

Cle Yes.

Ath And does not a like principle apply to legislation as well as to other things, even supposing all the conditions to be favourable which are needed for the happiness of the state, yet the true legislator must from time to time appear on the scene

Cle Most true.

Ath In each case the artist would be able to pray rightly for certain conditions, and if these were granted by fortune, he would then only require to exercise his art?

Cle Certainly

Ath And all the other artists just now mentioned, if they were bidden to offer up each their special prayer would do so?

Cle Of course.

Ath And the legislator would do likewise?

Cle I believe that he would.

Ath "Come, legislator" we will say to him "what are the conditions which you require in a state before you can organize it?" How ought he to answer this question? Shall I give his answer?

Cle Yes.

Ath He will say— Give me a state which is governed by a tyrant, and let the tyrant be young and have a good memory let him be quick at learning and of a courageous and noble nature let him have that quality which, as I said before, is the inseparable companion of all the other parts of virtue, [710] if there is to be any good in them."

Cle I suppose, Megillus, that this companion virtue of which the Stranger speaks, must be temperance?

Ath Yes, Cleinias, temperance in the vulgar sense not that which in the forced and exaggerated language of some philosophers is called prudence but that which is the natural gift of children and animals, of whom some live continently and others incontinently but when isolated, was as we said, hardly worth reckoning in the catalogue of goods. I think that you must understand my meaning

Cle Certainly

Ath Then our tyrant must have this as well as the other qualities, if the state is to acquire in the best manner and in the shortest time the form of government which is most conducive to happiness; for there neither is nor ever will be a better or speedier way of establishing a polity than by a tyranny

Cle By what possible arguments, Stranger can any man persuade himself of such a monstrous doctrine?

Ath There is surely no difficulty in seeing, Cleinias, what is in accordance with the order of nature?

Cle You would assume, as you say a tyrant who was young, temperate, quick at learning, having a good memory courageous, of a noble nature?

Ath Yes and you must add fortunate and

Cf. iii 696.

his good fortune must be that he is the contemporary of a great legislator and that some happy chance brings them together When this has been accomplished God has done all that he ever does for a state which he desires to be eminently prosperous He has done second best for a state in which there are two such rulers and third best for a state in which there are three The difficulty increases with the increase and diminishes with the diminution of the number

Cle You mean to say I suppose, that the best government is produced from a tyranny and originates in a good lawgiver and an orderly tyrant and that the change from such a tyranny into a perfect form of government takes place most easily less easily when from an oligarchy and in the third degree from a democracy is not that your meaning?

Ath Not so I mean rather to say that the change is best made out of a tyranny and secondly out of a monarchy and thirdly out of some sort of democracy fourth in the capacity for improvement comes oligarchy which has the greatest difficulty in admitting of such a change because the government is in the hands of a number of potentates I am supposing that the legislator is by nature of the true sort and that his strength is united with that of the chief men of the state and when the ruling element is numerically small, and at the same time very strong [711] as in a tyranny there the change is likely to be easiest and most rapid

Cle How? I do not understand

Ath And yet I have repeated what I am saying a good many times but I suppose that you have never seen a city which is under a tyranny?

Cle No and I cannot say that I have any great desire to see one

Ath And yet where there is a tyranny you might certainly see that of which I am now speaking

Cle What do you mean?

Ath I mean that you might see how without trouble and in no very long period of time the tyrant if he wishes can change the manners of a state he has only to go in the direction of virtue or of vice whichever he prefers he himself indicating by his example the lines of conduct praising and rewarding some actions and reproving others and degrading those who disobey

Cle But how can we imagine that the citizens in general will at once follow the example set to them and how can he have this power both of persuading and of compelling them?

Ath Let no one my friends persuade us that there is any quicker and easier way in which states change their laws than when the rulers lead such changes never have, nor ever will come to pass in any other way The real impossibility or difficulty is of another sort and is rarely surmounted in the course of ages but when once it is surmounted ten thousand or rather all blessings follow

Cle Of what are you speaking?

Ath The difficulty is to find the divine love of temperate and just institutions existing in any powerful forms of government whether in a monarchy or oligarchy of wealth or of birth You might as well hope to reproduce the character of Nestor who is said to have excelled all men in the power of speech and yet more in his temperance. This however according to the tradition was in the times of Troy in our own days there is nothing of the sort but if such an one either has or ever shall come into being or is now among us blessed is he and blessed are they who hear the wise words that flow from his lips And this may be said of power in general When the supreme power in man coincides with the greatest wisdom and temperance [712] then the best laws and the best constitution come into being but in no other way And let what I have been saying be regarded as a kind of sacred legend or oracle and let this be our proof that in one point of view there may be a difficulty for a city to have good laws but that there is another point of view in which nothing can be easier or sooner effected granting our supposition

Cle How do you mean?

Ath Let us try to amuse ourselves old boys as we are by moulding in words the laws which are suitable to your state

Cle Let us proceed without delay

Ath Then let us invoke God at the settlement of our state may he hear and be propitious to us and come and set in order the State and the laws!

Cle May he come!

Ath But what form of polity are we going to give the city?

Cle Tell us what you mean a little more clearly Do you mean some form of democracy, or oligarchy or aristocracy or monarchy? For we cannot suppose that you would include tyranny

Ath Which of you will first tell me to which

[1] Cf v 746

of these classes his own government is to be referred?

Megillus Ought I to answer first, since I am the elder?

Cle Perhaps you should

Meg And yet, Stranger I perceive that I cannot say without more thought, what I should call the government of Lacedaemon for it seems to me to be like a tyranny—the power of our Ephors is marvellously tyrannical and some times it appears to me to be of all cities the most democratical and who can reasonably deny that it is an aristocracy? We have also a monarchy which is held for life, and is said by all mankind, and not by ourselves only to be the most ancient of all monarchies and therefore when asked on a sudden I cannot precisely say which form of government the Spartan is.

Cle I am in the same difficulty Megillus for I do not feel confident that the polity of Cnosus is any of these.

Ath The reason is, my excellent friends, that you really have polities, but the states of which we were just now speaking are merely aggregations of men dwelling in cities who are the subjects and servants of a part of their own state, [713] and each of them is named after the dominant power they are not polities at all. But if states are to be named after their rulers, the true state ought to be called by the name of the God who rules over wise men

Cle And who is this God?

Ath May I still make use of fable to some extent, in the hope that I may be better able to answer your question shall I?

Cle By all means

Ath In the primeval world and a long while before the cities came into being whose settlements we have described there is said to have been in the time of Cronos a blessed rule and life, of which the best-ordered of existing states is a copy

Cle It will be very necessary to hear about that.

Ath I quite agree with you and therefore I have introduced the subject.

Cle Most appropriately and since the tale is to the point, you will do well in giving us the whole story

Ath I will do as you suggest. There is a tradition of the happy life of mankind in days when all things were spontaneous and abundant And of this the reason is said to have been as follows —Cronos knew what we ourselves were declaring that no human nature invested with supreme power is able to order human affairs and not overflow with insolence and wrong Which reflection led him to appoint not men but demigods, who are of a higher and more divine race, to be the kings and rulers of our cities he did as we do with flocks of sheep and other tame animals For we do not appoint oxen to be the lords of oxen or goats of goats but we ourselves are a superior race and rule over them In like manner God in his love of mankind placed over us the demons who are a superior race, and they with great ease and pleasure to themselves, and no less to us taking care of us and giving us peace and reverence and order and justice never failing, made the tribes of men happy and united And this tradition which is true, declares that cities of which some mortal man and not God is the ruler have no escape from evils and toils. Still we must do all that we can to imitate the life which is said to have existed in the days of Cronos, and as far as the principle of immortality dwells in us, to that we must hearken both in private and public life, and regulate our cities and houses according to law [714] meaning by the very term law the distribution of mind But if either a single person or an oligarchy or a democracy has a soul eager after pleasures and desires—wanting to be filled with them, yet retaining none of them, and perpetually afflicted with an endless and insatiable disorder and this evil spirit having first trampled the laws under foot, becomes the master either of a state or of an individual—then as I was saying, salvation is hopeless And now Cleinias we have to consider whether you will or will not accept this tale of mine

Cle Certainly we will

Ath You are aware—are you not?—that there are often said to be as many forms of laws as there are of governments and of the latter we have already mentioned all those which are commonly recognized Now you must regard this as a matter of first rate importance. For what is to be the standard of just and unjust, is once more the point at issue. Men say that the law ought not to regard either military virtue, or virtue in general but only the interests and power and preservation of the established form of government this is thought by them to be the best way of expressing the natural definition of justice.

Cle How?

Cf. Statesman 71
Cf. Aristotle, Pol 6, 1265 41.

Cf. iii. 691
Supra 712.

Ath Justice is said by them to be the interest of the stronger

Cle Speak plainer

Ath I will — Surely they say the governing power makes whatever laws have authority in any state?

Cle True

Ath Well they would add and do you suppose that tyranny or democracy or any other conquering power does not make the continuance of the power which is possessed by them the first or principal object of their laws?

Cle How can they have any other?

Ath And whoever transgresses these laws is punished as an evil doer by the legislator, who calls the laws just?

Cle Naturally

Ath This then is always the mode and fashion in which justice exists

Cle Certainly if they are correct in their view

Ath Why yes this is one of those false principles of government to which we were referring

Cle Which do you mean?

Ath Those which we were examining when we spoke of who ought to govern whom Did we not arrive at the conclusion that parents ought to govern their children and the elder the younger and the noble the ignoble? And there were many other principles if you remember and they were not always consistent One principle was this very principle of might, and we said that Pindar considered violence natural and justified it

[715] Cle Yes I remember

Ath Consider then to whom our state is to be entrusted For there is a thing which has occurred times without number in states——

Cle What thing?

Ath That when there has been a contest for power those who gain the upper hand so entirely monopolize the government as to refuse all share to the defeated party and their descendants—they live watching one another the ruling class being in perpetual fear that some one who has a recollection of former wrongs will come into power and rise up against them Now according to our view such governments are not polities at all nor are laws right which are passed for the good of particular classes and not for the good of the whole state States which have such laws are not polities but parties and their notions of justice are simply unmeaning I say this, because I am going to assert that we must not entrust the government in your state to any one because he is rich or because he possesses any other advantage such as strength or stature, or again birth but he who is most obedient to the laws of the state he shall win the palm and to him who is victorious in the first degree shall be given the highest office and chief ministry of the gods and the second to him who bears the second palm and on a similar principle shall all the other offices be assigned to those who come next in order And when I call the rulers servants or ministers of the law I give them this name not for the sake of novelty but because I certainly believe that upon such service or ministry depends the well or ill being of the state For that state in which the law is subject and has no authority I perceive to be on the highway to ruin but I see that the state in which the law is above the rulers and the rulers are the inferiors of the law has salvation and every blessing which the Gods can confer

Cle Truly Stranger you see with the keen vision of age

Ath Why yes every man when he is young has that sort of vision dullest and when he is old keenest

Cle Very true

Ath And now what is to be the next step? May we not suppose the colonists to have arrived and proceed to make our speech to them?

Cle Certainly

Ath Friends we say to them — God as the old tradition declares holding in his hand the beginning middle and end of all that is, [716] travels according to his nature in a straight line towards the accomplishment of his end Justice always accompanies him and is the punisher of those who fall short of the divine law To justice he who would be happy holds fast and follows in her company with all humility and order but he who is lifted up with pride or elated by wealth or rank or beauty who is young and foolish and has a soul hot with insolence and thinks that he has no need of any guide or ruler but is able himself to be the guide of others he I say is left deserted of God and being thus deserted he takes to him others who are like himself and dances about throwing all things into confusion and many think that he is a great man but in a short time he pays a penalty which justice cannot but approve and is utterly destroyed and his family and city with him Wherefore seeing that human things are thus ordered what should a

[1] Republic i 338 ii 367

[2] Cf iii 690

wise man do or think, or not do or think

Cle. Every man ought to make up his mind that he will be one of the followers of God there can be no doubt of that.

Ath. Then what life is agreeable to God, and becoming in his followers? One only expressed once for all in the old saying that "like agrees with like, with measure measure," but things which have no measure agree neither with themselves nor with the things which have. Now God ought to be to us the measure of all things, and not man as men commonly say (Protagoras) the words are far more true of him. And he who would be dear to God must, as far as is possible, be like him and such as he is. Wherefore the temperate man is the friend of God, for he is like him and the intemperate man is unlike him, and different from him, and unjust. And the same applies to other things, and this is the conclusion, which is also the noblest and truest of all sayings—that for the good man to offer sacrifice to the Gods, and hold converse with them by means of prayers and offerings and every kind of service, is the noblest and best of all things, and also the most conducive to a happy life, and very fit and meet. But with the bad man, the opposite of this is true for the bad man has an impure soul, whereas the good is pure and from one who is polluted, neither a good man nor God can without impropriety receive gifts. [717] Wherefore the unholy do only waste their much service upon the Gods, but when offered by any holy man, such service is most acceptable to them. This is the mark at which we ought to aim. But what weapons shall we use, and how shall we direct them? In the first place, we affirm that next after the Olympian Gods and the Gods of the State, honour should be given to the Gods below they should receive everything in even numbers, and of the second choice, and ill omen, while the odd numbers, and the first choice, and the things of lucky omen, are given to the Gods above, by him who would rightly hit the mark of piety. Next to these Gods, a wise man will do service to the demons or spirits, and then to the heroes, and after them will follow the private and ancestral Gods, who are worshipped as the law prescribes in the places which are sacred to them. Next comes the honour of living parents, to whom, as is meet, we have to pay the first and greatest and oldest of all debts, considering that all which a man has belongs to those who gave him birth and brought him up, and that he must do all that he can to minister to them, first, in his property secondly in his person, and thirdly in his soul in return for the endless care and travail which they bestowed upon him of old, in the days of his infancy and which he is now to pay back to them when they are old and in the extremity of their need. And all his life long he ought never to utter or to have uttered, an unbecoming word to them for of light and fleeting words the penalty is most severe Nemesis, the messenger of justice, is appointed to watch over all such matters. When they are angry and want to satisfy their feelings in word or deed he should give way to them for a father who thinks that he has been wronged by his son may be reasonably expected to be very angry At their death, the most moderate funeral is best, neither exceeding the customary expense, nor yet falling short of the honour which has been usually shown by the former generation to their parents And let a man not forget to pay the yearly tribute of respect to the dead, honouring them chiefly by omitting nothing that conduces to a perpetual remembrance of them [718] and giving a reasonable portion of his fortune to the dead. Doing this, and living after this manner we shall receive our reward from the Gods and those who are above us [i.e., the demons] and we shall spend our days for the most part in good hope. And how a man ought to order what relates to his descendants and his kindred and friends and fellow-citizens, and the rites of hospitality taught by Heaven, and the intercourse which arises out of all these duties, with a view to the embellishment and orderly regulation of his own life—these things, I say the laws, as we proceed with them, will accomplish, partly persuading, and partly when natures do not yield to the persuasion of custom, chastising them by might and right, and will thus render our state, if the Gods co-operate with us, prosperous and happy But of what has to be said, and must be said by the legislator who is of my way of thinking and yet, if said in the form of law would be out of place—of this I think that he may give a sample for the instruction of himself and of those for whom he is legislating and then when, as far as he is able, he has gone through all the preliminaries, he may proceed to the work of legislation Now what will be the form of such prefaces? There may be a difficulty in including or describing them all under a single form, but I think that we may get some notion of them if we can guarantee one thing

Cle. What is that?

Cf. ... Theaetetus 15...

Ath I should wish the citizens to be as readily persuaded to virtue as possible, this will surely be the aim of the legislator in all his laws

Cle Certainly

Ath The proposal appears to me to be of some value and I think that a person will listen with more gentleness and good will to the precepts addressed to him by the legislator, when his soul is not altogether unprepared to receive them Even a little done in the way of conciliation gains his ear, and is always worth having For there is no great inclination or readiness on the part of mankind to be made as good or as quickly good as possible The case of the many proves the wisdom of Hesiod who says that the road to wickedness is smooth and can be travelled without perspiring because it is so very short

But before virtue the immortal Gods have placed the sweat of labour and long and steep is the way thither [719] and rugged at first but when you have reached the top although difficult before it is then easy

Cle Yes and he certainly speaks well

Ath Very true and now let me tell you the effect which the preceding discourse has had upon me

Cle Proceed

Ath Suppose that we have a little conversation with the legislator and say to him— O, legislator, speak, if you know what we ought to say and do you can surely tell

Cle Of course he can

Ath Did we not hear you just now saying[1] that the legislator ought not to allow the poets to do what they liked? For that they would not know in which of their words they went against the laws to the hurt of the state

Cle That is true

Ath May we not fairly make answer to him on behalf of the poets?

Cle What answer shall we make to him?

Ath That the poet according to the tradition which has ever prevailed among us and is accepted of all men when he sits down on the tripod of the muse is not in his right mind like a fountain he allows to flow out freely whatever comes in and his art being imitative, he is often compelled to represent men of opposite dispositions and thus to contradict himself neither can he tell whether there is more truth in one thing that he has said than in another But this is not the case in a law the legislator must give not two rules about the same thing, but one only Take an example from what you have just been saying[2] Of three kinds of funerals there is one which is too extravagant another is too niggardly the third is a mean and you choose and approve and order the last without qualification But if I had an extremely rich wife and she bade me bury her and describe her burial in a poem I should praise the extravagant sort and a poor miserly man who had not much money to spend would approve of the niggardly, and the man of moderate means who was himself moderate, would praise a moderate funeral Now you in the capacity of legislator must not barely say a moderate funeral but you must define what moderation is and how much unless you are definite, you must not suppose that you are speaking a language that can become law

Cle Certainly not

Ath And is our legislator to have no preface to his laws but to say at once Do this avoid that—and then holding the penalty in terrorem, to go on to another law offering never a word of advice or exhortation to those for whom he is legislating [720] after the manner of some doctors? For of doctors as I may remind you, some have a gentler others a ruder method of cure and as children ask the doctor to be gentle with them, so we will ask the legislator to cure our disorders with the gentlest remedies What I mean to say is that besides doctors there are doctors servants who are also styled doctors.

Cle Very true

Ath And whether they are slaves or freemen makes no difference they acquire their knowledge of medicine by obeying and observing their masters empirically and not according to the natural way of learning as the manner of freemen is who have learned scientifically themselves the art which they impart scientifically to their pupils You are aware that there are these two classes of doctors?

Cle To be sure

Ath And did you ever observe that there are two classes of patients in states slaves and freemen and the slave doctors run about and cure the slaves or wait for them in the dispensaries —practitioners of this sort never talk to their patients individually or let them talk about their own individual complaints? The slave doctor prescribes what mere experience suggests as if he had exact knowledge and when he has given his orders like a tyrant, he rushes off with equal assurance to some other servant who is ill and so he relieves the master of the house of the care of his invalid slaves But the other doctor who is a freeman attends and practises upon freemen and he carries his enquiries far back, and goes into the nature of the disorder he enters into discourse with the patient and with his friends and is at once getting information from the sick man and also instructing him as far as he is able, and he will not prescribe for him until he has first convinced him at last, when he has brought the patient more and more under his persuasive influences and set him on the road to health he attempts to effect a cure Now which is the better way of proceeding in a physician and in a trainer? Is he the better who accomplishes his ends in a double way or he who works in one way and that the ruder and inferior?

[1] Cf ii 656 ff

[2] Cf 717

Cle I should say Stranger that the double way is far better

Ath Should you like to see an example of the double and single method in legislation?

Cle Certainly I should

[721] Ath What will be our first law? Will not the legislator observing the order of nature, begin by making regulations for states about births?

Cle He will

Ath In all states the birth of children goes back to the connection of marriage?

Cle Very true.

Ath And according to the true order the laws relating to marriage should be those which are first determined in every state?

Cle Quite so

Ath Then let me first give the law of marriage in a simple form it may run as follows —A man shall marry between the ages of thirty and thirty five or if he does not he shall pay such and such a fine or shall suffer the loss of such and such privileges. This would be the simple law about marriage The double law would run thus —A man shall marry between the ages of thirty and thirty five, considering that in a manner the human race naturally partakes of immortality which every man is by nature inclined to desire to the utmost for the desire of every man that he may become famous, and not lie in the grave without a name, is only the love of continuance Now mankind are coeval with all time and are ever following and will ever follow the course of time and so they are immortal because they leave children's children behind them, and partake of immortality in the unity of generation And for a man voluntarily to deprive himself of this gift, as he deliberately does who will not have a wife or children, is impiety He who obeys the law shall be free and shall pay no fine but he who is disobedient, and does not marry when he has arrived at the age of thirty five shall pay a yearly fine of a certain amount in order that he may not imagine his celibacy to bring ease and profit to him and he shall not share in the honours which the young men in the state give to the aged Comparing now the two forms of the law you will be able to arrive at a judgment about any other laws—whether they should be double in length even when shortest, because they have to persuade as well as threaten, or whether they shall only threaten and be of half the length

Meg The shorter form Stranger would be more in accordance with Lacedaemonian custom although for my own part if any one were to ask me which I myself prefer in the state, I should certainly determine in favour of the longer [722] and I would have every law made after the same pattern if I had to choose. But I think that Cleinias is the person to be consulted for his is the state which is going to use these laws

Cle Thank you, Megillus

Ath Whether in the abstract, words are to be many or few is a very foolish question the best form and not the shortest, is to be approved nor is length at all to be regarded Of the two forms of law which have been recited the one is not only twice as good in practical usefulness as the other but the case is like that of the two kinds of doctors, which I was just now mentioning And yet legislators never ap*pear to have considered* that they have two instruments which they might use in legislation —persuasion and force for in dealing with the rude and uneducated multitude they use the one only as far as they can they do not mingle persuasion with coercion but employ force pure and simple Moreover there is a third point, sweet friends which ought to be, and never is regarded in our existing laws

Cle What is it?

Ath A point arising out of our previous discussion which comes into my mind in some mysterious way All this time, from early dawn until noon have we been talking about laws in this charming retreat now we are going to promulgate our laws and what has preceded was only the prelude of them Why do I mention this? For this reason —Because all discourses and vocal exercises have preludes and overtures, which are a sort of artistic beginnings intended to help the strain which is to be per formed lyric measures and music of every other kind have preludes framed with wonderful care But of the truer and higher strain of law and politics no one has ever yet uttered any prelude or composed or published any as though there was no such thing in nature Whereas our present discussion seems to me to imply that there is —these double laws of which we were speaking are not exactly double but they are in two parts, [723] the law and the prelude of the law The arbitrary command which was compared to the commands of doctors whom we described as of the meaner sort was the law pure and simple and that which preceded and was described by our friend here as being hortatory only was although in fact an exhortation likewise analogous to the preamble of a discourse For I imagine that all this language of conciliation, which the legislator has been uttering in the preface of the law was intended to create good will in the person whom he addressed in order that by reason of this good will he might more intelligently receive his command that is to say the law And therefore in my way of speaking this is more rightly described as the preamble than as the matter of the law And I must further proceed to observe that to all his laws and to each separately the legislator should prefix a preamble he should remember how great will be the difference between them, according as they have or have not such preambles as in the case already given

Cle The lawgiver if he asks my opinion will certainly legislate in the form which you advise

Ath I think that you are quite right Cleinias in affirming that all laws have preambles and that throughout the whole of this work of legislation every single law should have a suitable preamble at the beginning for that which is to follow is most important and it makes all the difference whether we clearly remember the preambles or not Yet we should be wrong in requiring that all laws small and great alike should have preambles of the same kind any more than all songs or speeches although they may be natural to all they are not always necessary and whether they are to be employed or not has in each case to be left to the judgment of the speaker or the musician or in the present instance, of the lawgiver

Cle That I think is most true And now Stranger without delay let us return to the argument, and as people say in play make a second and better beginning if you please with the principles which we have been laying down which we never thought of regarding as a preamble before but of which we may now make a preamble and not merely consider them to be chance topics of discourse Let us acknowledge then that we have a preamble About the honour of the Gods and the respect of parents enough has been already said and we may proceed to the topics which follow next in order until the preamble is deemed by you to be complete and after that you shall go through the laws themselves

[724] Ath I understand you to mean that we have made a sufficient preamble about Gods and demi gods and about parents living or dead and now you would have us bring the rest of the subject into the light of day?

Cle Exactly

Ath After this, as is meet and for the interest of us all, I the speaker and you the listeners will try to estimate all that relates to the souls and bodies and properties of the citizens as regards both their occupations and amusements and thus arrive as far as in us lies at the nature of education These then are the topics which follow next in order

Cle Very good

BOOK V

[726] Athenian Stranger Listen all ye who have just now heard the laws about Gods and about our dear forefathers —Of all the things which a man has next to the Gods his soul is the most divine and most truly his own Now in every man there are two parts the better and superior which rules and the worse and inferior which serves [727] and the ruling part of him is always to be preferred to the subject Wherefore I am right in bidding every one next to the Gods who are our masters and those who in order follow them [i e the demons] to honour his own soul which every one seems to honour but no one honours as he ought for honour is a divine good and no evil thing is honourable and he who thinks that he can honour the soul by word or gift or any sort of compliance without making her in any way better seems to honour her but honours her not at all For example every man from his very boyhood fancies that he is able to know everything and thinks that he honours his soul by praising her and he is very ready to let her do whatever she may like But I mean to say that in acting thus he injures his soul and is far from honouring her whereas, in our opinion, he ought to honour her as second only to the Gods Again when a man thinks that others are to be blamed and not himself for the errors which he has committed from time to time, and the many and great evils which befell him in consequence, and is always fancying himself to be exempt and innocent he is under the idea that he is honouring his soul whereas the very reverse is the fact, for he is really injuring her And when, disregarding the word and approval of the legislator he indulges in pleasure, then again he is far from honouring her he only dishonours her and fills her full of evil and remorse or when he does not endure to the end the labours and fears and sorrows and pains which the legislator approves but gives way before them then by yielding he does not honour the soul but by all such conduct he makes her to be dishonourable nor when he thinks that life at any price is a good does he honour her but yet once more he dishonours her for the soul having a notion that the world below is all evil he yields to her and does not resist and teach or convince her that, for aught she knows the world of the Gods below instead of being evil may be the greatest of all goods Again, when any one prefers beauty to virtue, what is this but the real and utter dishonour of the soul? For such a preference implies that the body is more honourable than the soul and this is false for there is nothing of earthly birth which is more honourable than the heavenly and he who thinks otherwise of the soul has no idea how greatly he undervalues this wonderful possession [728] nor again, when a person is willing or not unwilling to acquire dishonest gains does he then honour his soul with gifts—far otherwise he sells her glory and honour for a small piece of gold but all the gold which is under or upon the earth is not enough to give in exchange for virtue In a word I may say that he who does not estimate the base and evil the good and noble, according to the standard of the legislator and abstain in every possible way from the one and practise the other to the utmost of his power does not know that in all these respects he is most foully and disgracefully abusing his soul which is the divinest part of man for no one, as I may say ever considers that which is declared to be the greatest penalty of evil-doing—namely to grow into the likeness of bad men and growing like them to fly from the conversation of the good and be cut off from them, and cleave to and follow after the company of the bad And he who is joined to them must do and suffer what such men by nature do and say to one another—a suffering which is not justice but retribution for justice and the just are noble whereas retribution is the suffering which waits upon injustice and whether a man escape or endure this, he is miserable—in the former case because he is not cured while in the latter he perishes in order that the rest of mankind may be saved

Speaking generally our glory is to follow the better and improve the inferior which is susceptible of improvement as far as this is possible And of all human possessions, the soul is by nature most inclined to avoid the evil and track out and find the chief good which when a man has found he should take up his abode with it during the remainder of his life Wherefore the soul also is second [or next to God] in honour and third as every one will perceive, comes the honour of the body in natural order Having determined this we have next to consider that there is a natural honour of the body and that of honours some are true and some are counterfeit. To decide which are which is the business of the legislator and he I suspect, would intimate that they are as follows —Honour is not to be given to the fair body or to the strong or the swift or the tall or to the healthy body (although many may think otherwise) any more than to their opposites but the mean states of all these habits are by far the safest and most moderate for the one extreme makes the soul braggart and insolent and the other illiberal and base and money and property and distinction all go to the same tune The excess of any of these things is apt to be a source of hatreds and divisions [729] among states and individuals and the defect of them is commonly a cause of slavery And therefore, I would not have any one fond of heaping up riches for the sake of his children in order that he may leave them as rich as possible For the possession of great wealth is of no use, either to them or to the state The condition of youth which is free from flattery and at the same time not in need of the necessaries of life is the best and most harmonious of all being in accord and agreement with our nature and making life to be most entirely free from sorrow Let parents, then, bequeath to their children not a heap of riches but the spirit of reverence We indeed fancy that they will inherit reverence from us if we rebuke them when they show a want of reverence But this quality is not really imparted to them by the present style of admonition which only tells them that the young ought always to be reverential A sensible legislator will rather exhort the elders to reverence the younger and above all to take heed that no young man sees or hears one of themselves doing or saying anything disgraceful for where old men have no shame there young men will most certainly be devoid of reverence The best way of training the young is to train yourself at the same time not to admonish them, but to be always carrying out your own admonitions in practice He who honours his kindred and reveres those who share in the same Gods and are of the same blood and family may fairly expect that the Gods who preside over generation will be propitious to him and will quicken his seed And he who deems the services which his friends and acquaintances do for him greater and more important than they themselves deem them and his own favours to them less than theirs to him will have their good will in the intercourse of life And surely in his relations to the state and his fellow-citizens he is by far the best who rather than the Olympic or any other victory of peace or war desires to win the palm of obedience to the laws of his country and who of all mankind, is the person reputed to have obeyed them best through life In his relations to strangers a man should consider that a contract is a most holy thing and that all concerns and wrongs of strangers are more directly dependent on the protection of God than wrongs done to citizens for the stranger having no kindred and friends is more to be pitied by Gods and men Wherefore also he who is most able to avenge him is most zealous in his cause and he who is most able is the genius and the god of the stranger [730] who follow in the train of Zeus the god of strangers And for this reason he who has a spark of caution in him will do his best to pass through life without sinning against the stranger And of offences committed, whether against strangers or fellow countrymen that against suppliants is the greatest For the God who witnessed to the agreement made with the suppliant becomes in a special manner the guardian of the sufferer and he will certainly not suffer unavenged

Thus we have fairly described the manner in which a man is to act about his parents and himself, and his own affairs and in relation to the state and his friends and kindred both in what concerns his own countrymen and in what concerns the stranger We will now consider what manner of man he must be who would best pass through life in respect of those other things which are not matters of law but of praise and blame only in which praise and blame educate a man and make him more tractable and amenable to the laws which are about to be imposed

Truth is the beginning of every good thing, both to Gods and men and he who would be blessed and happy should be from the first a partaker of the truth that he may live a true man as long as possible, for then he can be trusted but he is not to be trusted who loves voluntary falsehood and he who loves involuntary falsehood is a fool Neither condition is enviable for the untrustworthy and ignorant has no friend and as time advances he becomes known and lays up in store for himself isolation in crabbed age when life is on the wane so that whether his children or friends are alive or not, he is equally solitary—Worthy of honour is he who does no injustice, and of more than twofold honour if he not only does no injustice himself but hinders others from doing any the first may count as one man the second is worth many men because he informs the rulers of the injustice of others And yet more highly to be esteemed is he who co-operates with the rulers in correcting the citizens as far as he can—he shall be proclaimed the great and perfect citizen and bear away the palm of virtue. The same praise may be given about temperance and wisdom and all other goods which may be imparted to others as well as acquired by a man for himself he who imparts them shall be honoured as the man of men and he who is willing [731] yet is not able may be allowed the second place but he who is jealous and will not if he can help allow others to partake in a friendly way of any good is deserving of blame the good however which he has is not to be undervalued by us because it is possessed by him but must be acquired by us also to the utmost of our pow r Let every man then freely strive for the prize of virtue and let there be no envy For the unenvious nature increases the greatness of states—he himself contends in the race, blasting the fair fame of no man but the envious who thinks that he ought to get the better by defaming others is less energetic himself in the pursuit of true virtue and reduces his rivals to despair by his unjust slanders of them And so he makes the whole city to enter the arena untrained in the practice of virtue and diminishes her glory as far as in him lies Now every man should be valiant but he should also be gentle From the cruel or hardly curable, or altogether incurable acts of injustice done to him by others a man can only escape by fighting and defending him self and conquering, and by never ceasing to punish them and no man who is not of a noble spirit is able to accomplish this As to the actions of those who do evil but whose evil is curable, in the first place, let us remember that the unjust man is not unjust of his own free will. For no man of his own free will would choose to possess the greatest of evils and least of all in the most honourable part of himself And the soul, as we said is of a truth deemed by all men the most honourable In the soul then, which is the most honourable part of him, no one, if he could help would admit, or allow to continue the greatest of evils The unrighteous and vicious are always to be pitied in any case and one can afford to forgive as well as pity him who is curable, and refrain and calm one's anger not getting into a passion like a woman, and nursing ill feeling But upon him who is incapable of reformation and wholly evil the vials of our wrath should be poured out, wherefore I say that good men ought, when occasion demands, to be both gentle and passionate.

Of all evils the greatest is one which in the souls of most men is innate and which a man is always excusing in himself and never correcting· I mean, what is expressed in the saying that Every man by nature is and ought to be his own friend. Whereas the excessive love of self is in reality the source to each man of all offences for the lover is blinded about the beloved, so that he judges wrongly of the just, [732] the good and the honourable, and thinks that he ought always to prefer himself to the truth. But he who would be a great man ought to regard not himself or his interests but what is just, whether the just act be his own or that of another Through a similar error men are induced to fancy that their own ignorance is wisdom and thus we who may be truly said to know nothing, think that we know all things and because we will not let others act for us in what we do not know we are compelled to act amiss ourselves. Wherefore let every man avoid excess of self love and condescend to follow a better man than himself not allowing any false shame to stand in the way There are also minor precepts which are often repeated and are quite as useful a man should recollect them and remind himself of them. For when a stream is flowing out, there should be water flowing in too and recollection flows in while wisdom is departing Therefore I say that a man should refrain from excess either of laughter or tears, and should exhort his neighbour to do the same he should veil his immoderate sorrow or joy and seek to behave with propriety whether the genius of his good fortune remains with him or whether at the crisis of his fate, when he seems to be mounting high and steep places, the Gods oppose him in some of his enterprises. Still he may ever hope, in the case of good men, that whatever afflictions are to befall them in the future God will lessen and that present evils he will change for the better and as to the goods which are the opposite of these evils, he will not doubt that they will be added to them and that they will be fortunate Such should be men's hopes, and such should be the exhortations with which they admonish one another never losing an opportunity but on every occasion distinctly reminding themselves and others of all these things both in jest and earnest.

Cf. Rep. bk ... i. 282.

Enough has now been said of divine matters, both as touching the practices which men ought to follow and as to the sort of persons who they ought severally to be But of human things we have not as yet spoken, and we must for to men we are discoursing and not to Gods. Pleasures and pains and desires are a part of human nature, and on them every mortal being must of necessity hang and depend with the most eager interest. And therefore we must praise the noblest life not only as the fairest in appearance, but as being one which if a man will only taste, and not while still in his youth desert for another [733] he will find to surpass also in the very thing which we all of us desire —I mean in having a greater amount of pleasure and less of pain during the whole of life. And this will be plain if a man has a true taste of them as will be quickly and clearly seen. But what is a true taste? That we have to learn from the argument—the point being what is according to nature, and what is not according to nature One life must be compared with another the more pleasurable with the more painful after this manner —We desire to have pleasure, but we neither desire nor choose pain and the neutral state we are ready to take in exchange, not for pleasure but for pain and we also wish for less pain and greater pleasure but less pleasure and greater pain we do not wish for and an equal balance of either we cannot venture to assert that we should desire And all these differ or do not differ severally in number which only tells them that the young ought always to be reverential A sensible legislator will rather exhort the elders to reverence the younger and above all to take heed that no young man sees or hears one of themselves doing or saying anything disgraceful for where old men have no shame there young men will most certainly be devoid of reverence The best way of training the young is to train yourself at the same time not to admonish them, but to be always carrying out your own admonitions in practice He who honours his kindred and reveres those who share in the same Gods and are of the same blood and family may fairly expect that the Gods who preside over generation will be propitious to him and will quicken his seed And he who deems the services which his friends and acquaintances do for him greater and more important than they themselves deem them and his own favours to them less than theirs to him will have their good will in the intercourse of life And surely in his relations to the state and his fellow-citizens he is by far the best who rather than the Olympic or any other victory of peace or war desires to win the palm of obedience to the laws of his country and who of all mankind is the person reputed to have obeyed them best through life In his relations to strangers, a man should consider that a contract is a most holy thing and that all concerns and wrongs of strangers are more directly dependent on the protection of God than wrongs done to citizens for the stranger having no kindred and friends is more to be pitied by Gods and men Wherefore also he who is most able to avenge him is most zealous in his cause and he who is most able is the genius and the god of the stranger [730] who follow in the train of Zeus the god of strangers And for this reason he who has a spark of caution in him will do his best to pass through life without sinning against the stranger And of offences committed whether against strangers or fellow countrymen that against suppliants is the greatest For the God who witnessed to the agreement made with the suppliant becomes in a special manner the guardian of the sufferer and he will certainly not suffer unavenged

introducing, for the sake of illustration. but what relates to man is of the highest importance and the legislator should make enquiries, and indicate what is proper for each one in the way of purification and of any other procedure. Take, for example, the purification of a city—there are many kinds of purification, some easier and others more difficult, and some of them, and the best and most difficult of them, the legislator, if he be also a despot, may be able to effect, but the legislator who, not being a despot, sets up a new government and laws, even if he attempt the mildest of purgations, may think himself happy if he can complete his work. The best kind of purification is painful, like similar cures in medicine, involving righteous punishment and inflicting death or exile in the last resort. For in this way we commonly dispose of great sinners who are incurable, and are the greatest injury of the whole state. But the milder form of purification is as follows:—when men who have nothing, and are in want of food, show a disposition to follow their leaders in an attack on the property of the rich—these, [736] who are the natural plague of the state, are sent away by the legislator in a friendly spirit as far as he is able; and this dismissal of them is euphemistically termed a colony. And every legislator should contrive to do this at once. Our present case, however, is peculiar. For there is no need to devise any colony or purifying separation under the circumstances in which we are placed. But as, when many streams flow together from many sources, whether springs or mountain torrents, into a single lake, we ought to attend and take care that the confluent waters should be perfectly clear, and in order to effect this, should pump and draw off and divert impurities, so in every political arrangement there may be trouble and danger. But, seeing that we are now only discoursing and not acting, let our selection be supposed to be completed, and the desired purity attained. Touching evil men, who want to join and be citizens of our state, after we have tested them by every sort of persuasion and for a sufficient time, we will prevent them from coming; but the good we will to the utmost of our ability receive as friends with open arms.

Another piece of good fortune must not be forgotten, which, as we were saying, the Heraclid colony had, and which is also ours—that we have escaped division of land and the abolition of debts; for these are always a source of dangerous contention, and a city which is driven by necessity to legislate upon such matters can neither allow the old ways to continue, nor yet venture to alter them. We must have recourse to prayers, so to speak, and hope that a slight change may be cautiously effected in a length of time. And such a change can be accomplished by those who have abundance of land, and having also many debtors, are willing, in a kindly spirit, to share with those who are in want, sometimes remitting and sometimes giving, holding fast in a path of moderation, and deeming poverty to be the increase of a man's desires and not the diminution of his property. For this is the great beginning of salvation to a state, and upon this lasting basis may be erected afterwards whatever political order is suitable under the circumstances; but if the change be based upon an unsound principle, the future administration of the country will be full of difficulties. [737] That is a danger which, as I am saying, is escaped by us, and yet we had better say how, if we had not escaped, we might have escaped; and we may venture now to assert that no other way of escape, whether narrow or broad, can be devised but freedom from avarice and a sense of justice—upon this rock our city shall be built; for there ought to be no disputes among citizens about property. If there are quarrels of long standing among them, no legislator of any degree of sense will proceed a step in the arrangement of the state until they are settled. But that they to whom God has given, as he has to us, to be the founders of a new state as yet free from enmity—that they should create themselves enmities by their mode of distributing lands and houses, would be superhuman folly and wickedness.

How then can we rightly order the distribution of the land? In the first place, the number of the citizens has to be determined, and also the number and size of the divisions into which they will have to be formed; and the land and the houses will then have to be apportioned by us as fairly as we can. The number of citizens can only be estimated satisfactorily in relation to the territory and the neighbouring states. The territory must be sufficient to maintain a certain number of inhabitants in a moderate way of life—more than this is not required; and the number of citizens should be sufficient to defend themselves against the injustice of their neighbours, and also to give them the power of rendering efficient aid to their neighbours when they are wronged. After having taken a survey of theirs and their neighbours' territory, we will determine the limits of them and magnitude and intensity and equality and in the opposites of these when regarded as objects of choice in relation to desire And such being the necessary order of things we wish for that life in which there are many great and intense elements of pleasure and pain and in which the pleasures are in excess and do not wish for that in which the opposites exceed nor again do we wish for that in which the elements of either are small and few and feeble and the pains exceed And when as I said before there is a balance of pleasure and pain in life this is to be regarded by us as the balanced life while other lives are preferred by us *because they exceed in what we like or are re*jected by us because they exceed in what we dislike All the lives of men may be regarded by us as bound up in these and we must also consider what sort of lives we by nature desire And if we wish for any others I say that we desire them only through some ignorance and inexperience of the lives which actually exist

Now what lives are they and how many in which having searched out and beheld the objects of will and desire and their opposites and making of them a law choosing I say the dear and the pleasant and the best and noblest a man may live in the happiest way possible? Let us say that the temperate life is one kind of life and the rational another and the courageous another and the healthful another and to these four let us oppose four other lives—the foolish the cowardly the intemperate the diseased He who knows the temperate life will describe it as in all things gentle having gentle pains and gentle pleasures and placid desires and loves not insane [734] whereas the intemperate life is impetuous in all things and has violent pains and pleasures and vehement and stinging desires and loves utterly insane and in the temperate life the pleasures exceed the pains but in the intemperate life the pains exceed the pleasures in greatness and number and frequency Hence one of the two lives is naturally and necessarily more pleasant and the other more painful and he who would live pleasantly cannot possibly choose to live intemperately And if this is true the inference clearly is that no man is voluntarily intemperate but that the whole multitude of men lack temperance in their lives either from ignorance or from want of self-control or both And the same holds of the diseased and healthy life they both have pleasures and pains but in health the pleasure exceeds the pain and in sickness the pain exceeds the pleasure Now our intention in choosing the lives is not that the painful should exceed but the life in which pain is exceeded by pleasure we have determined to be the more pleasant life And we should say that the temperate life has the elements both of pleasure and pain fewer and smaller and less frequent than the intemperate and the wise life than the foolish life and the life of courage than the life of cowardice one of each pair exceeding in pleasure and the other in pain the courageous surpassing the cowardly and the wise exceeding the foolish And so the one class of lives exceeds the other class in pleasure the temperate and courageous and wise and healthy exceed the cowardly and foolish and intemperate and diseased lives, and generally speaking, that which has any virtue whether of body or soul is pleasanter than the vicious life, and far superior in beauty and rectitude and excellence and reputation and causes him who lives accordingly to be infinitely happier than the opposite

Enough of the preamble and now the laws should follow or to speak more correctly an outline of them As then in the case of a web or any other tissue the warp and the woof cannot be made of the same materials [735] but the warp is necessarily superior as being stronger and having a certain character of firmness, whereas the woof is softer and has a proper degree of elasticity —in a similar manner those who are to hold great offices in states should be distinguished truly in each case from those who have been but slenderly proven by education Let us suppose that there are two parts in the constitution of a state—one the creation of offices the other the laws which are assigned to them to administer

But before all this comes the following consideration —The shepherd or herdsman or breeder of horses or the like when he has received his animals will not begin to train them until he has first purified them in a manner which befits a community of animals he will divide the healthy and unhealthy and the good breed and the bad breed and will send away the unhealthy and badly bred to other herds, and tend the rest reflecting that his labours will be vain and have no effect either on the souls or bodies of those whom nature and ill nurture have corrupted and that they will involve in destruction the pure and healthy nature and being of every other animal if he should neglect to purify them Now the case of other animals is not so important—they are only worth [illegible] in this manner dwell there-in, therefore to this we are to look for the pattern of the state, and to cling to this, and to seek with all our might for one which is like this. The state which we have now in hand, when created, will be nearest to immortality and the only one which takes the second place; and after that, by the grace of God, we will complete the third one. And we will begin by speaking of the nature and origin of the second.

Let the citizens at once distribute their land and houses, and not till the land in common, [740] since a community of goods goes beyond their proposed origin, and nurture, and education. But in making the distribution, let the several possessors feel that their particular lots also belong to the whole city; and seeing that the earth is their parent, let them tend her more carefully than children do their mother. For she is a goddess and their queen, and they are her mortal subjects. Such also are the feelings which they ought to entertain to the Gods and demigods of the country. And in order that the distribution may always remain, they ought to consider further that the present number of families should be always retained, and neither increased nor diminished. This may be secured for the whole city in the following manner:—Let the possessor of a lot leave the one of his children who is his best beloved, and one only, to be the heir of his dwelling, and his successor in the duty of ministering to the Gods, the state and the family, as well the living members of it as those who are departed when he comes into the inheritance; but of his other children, if he have more than one, he shall give the females in marriage according to the law to be hereafter enacted, and the males he shall distribute as sons to those citizens who have no children, and are disposed to receive them; or if there should be none such, and particular individuals have too many children, male or female, or too few, as in the case of barrenness—in all these cases let the highest and most honourable magistracy created by us judge and determine what is to be done with the redundant or deficient, and devise a means that the number of 5040 houses shall always remain the same. There are many ways of regulating numbers; for they in whom generation is affluent may be made to refrain, and, on the other hand, special care may be taken to increase the number of births by rewards and stigmas, or we may meet the evil by the elder men giving advice and administering rebuke to the younger—in this way the object may be attained. And if after all there be very great difficulty about the equal preservation of the 5040 houses, and there be an excess of citizens, owing to the too great love of those who live together, and we are at our wits' end, there is still the old device often mentioned by us of sending out a colony, which will part friends with us, and be composed of suitable persons. [741] If, on the other hand, there come a wave bearing a deluge of disease, or a plague of war, and the inhabitants become much fewer than the appointed number by reason of bereavement, we ought not to introduce citizens of spurious birth and education, if this can be avoided; but even God is said not to be able to fight against necessity.

Wherefore let us suppose this high argument[1] of ours to address us in the following terms:—Best of men, cease not to honour according to nature similarity and equality and sameness and agreement, as regards number and every good and noble quality. And, above all, observe the aforesaid number 5040 throughout life; in the second place, do not disparage the small and modest proportions of the inheritances which you received in the distribution, by buying and selling them to one another. For then neither will the God who gave you the lot be your friend, nor will the legislator; and indeed the law declares to the disobedient that these are the terms upon which he may or may not take the lot. In the first place, the earth as he is informed is sacred to the Gods; and in the next place, priests and priestesses will offer up prayers over a first, and second, and even a third sacrifice, that he who buys or sells the houses or lands which he has received, may suffer the punishment which he deserves; and these their prayers they shall write down in the temples, on tablets of cypress-wood, for the instruction of posterity. Moreover they will set a watch over all these things, that they may be observed;—the magistracy which has the sharpest eyes shall keep watch that any infringement of these commands may be discovered and punished as offences both against the law and the God. How great is the benefit of such an ordinance to all those cities, which obey and are administered accordingly, no bad man can ever know, as the old proverb says; but only a man of experience and good habits. For in such an order of things there will not be much opportunity for making money; no man either ought, or indeed will be allowed, to exercise any ignoble occupation, of which the vulgarity is a matin fact as well as in theory And now let us proceed to legislate with a view to perfecting the form and outline of our state The number of our citizens shall be 5040—this will be a convenient number, and these shall be owners of the land and protectors of the allotment The houses and the land will be divided in the same way so that every man may correspond to a lot Let the whole number be first divided into two parts and then into three and the number is further capable of being divided into four or five parts or any number of parts up to ten Every legislator ought to know so much arithmetic as to be able to tell what number is most likely to be useful to all cities [738] and we are going to take that number which contains the greatest and most regular and unbroken series of divisions The whole of number has every possible division and the number 5040 can be divided by exactly fifty nine divisors and ten of these proceed without interval from one to ten this will furnish numbers for war and peace and for all contracts and dealings including taxes and divisions of the land These properties of number should be ascertained at leisure by those who are bound by law to know them for they are true, and should be proclaimed at the foundation of the city, with a view to use. Whether the legislator is establishing a new state or restoring an old and decayed one in respect of Gods and temples—the temples which are to be built in each city and the Gods or demi gods after whom they are to be called—if he be a man of sense he will make no change in anything which the oracle of Delphi or Dodona or the God Ammon or any ancient tradition has sanctioned in whatever manner whether by apparitions or reputed inspiration of Heaven in obedience to which mankind have established sacrifices in connection with mystic rites either originating on the spot, or derived from Tyrrhenia or Cyprus or some other place and on the strength of which traditions they have consecrated oracles and images and altars and temples and portioned out a sacred domain for each of them The least part of all these ought not to be disturbed by the legislator but he should assign to the several districts some God or demi god or hero and, in the distribution of the soil should give to these first their chosen domain and all things fitting that the inhabitants of the several districts may meet at fixed times and that they may readily supply their various wants and entertain one another with sacrifices and become friends and acquaintances for there is no greater good in a state than that the citizens should be known to one another When not light but darkness and ignorance of each other s characters prevails among them, no one will receive the honour of which he is deserving or the power or the justice to which he is fairly entitled wherefore in every state, above all things, every man should take heed that he have no deceit in him but that he be always true and simple and that no deceitful person take any advantage of him

[739] The next move in our pastime of legislation like the withdrawal of the stone from the holy line in the game of draughts, being an unusual one will probably excite wonder when mentioned for the first time. And yet, if a man will only reflect and weigh the matter with care, he will see that our city is ordered in a manner which if not the best is the second best Perhaps also some one may not approve this form because he thinks that such a constitution is ill adapted to a legislator who has not despotic power The truth is, that there are three forms of government the best, the second and the third best which we may just mention, and then leave the selection to the ruler of the settlement Following this method in the present instance let us speak of the states which are respectively first second and third in excellence, and then we will leave the choice to Cleinias now or to any one else who may hereafter have to make a similar choice among constitutions and may desire to give to his state some feature which is congenial to him and which he approves in his own country

The first and highest form of the state and of the government and of the law is that in which there prevails most widely the ancient saying that Friends have all things in common Whether there is anywhere now or will ever be this communion of women and children and of property in which the private and individual is altogether banished from life and things which are by nature private such as eyes and ears and hands have become common and in some way see and hear and act in common and all men express praise and blame and feel joy and sorrow on the same occasions, and whatever laws there are unite the city to the utmost —whether all this is possible or not, I say that no man acting upon any other principle will ever constitute a state which will be truer or better or more exalted in virtue Whether such a state is governed by Gods or sons of Gods one or more than one, happy are the body and, first of all that of the soul and the state which we are describing will have been rightly constituted if it ordains honours according to this scale [744] But if in any of the laws which have been ordained health has been preferred to temperance or wealth to health and temperate habits that law must clearly be wrong Wherefore, also, the legislator ought often to impress upon himself the question— What do I want? and Do I attain my aim, or do I miss the mark? In this way and in this way only he may acquit himself and free others from the work of legislation

Let the allottee then hold his lot upon the conditions which we have mentioned

It would be well that every man should come to the colony having all things equal but seeing that this is not possible and one man will have greater possessions than another for many reasons and in particular in order to preserve equality in special crises of the state qualifications of property must be unequal in order that offices and contributions and distributions may be proportioned to the value of each person s wealth and not solely to the virtue of his ancestors or himself nor yet to the strength and beauty of his person but also to the measure of his wealth or poverty and so by a law of inequality which will be in proportion to his wealth, he will receive honours and offices as equally as possible and there will be no quarrels and disputes To which end there should be four different standards appointed according to the amount of property there should be a first and a second and a third and a fourth class, in which the citizens will be placed, and they will be called by these or similar names they may continue in the same rank, or pass into another in any individual case on becoming richer from being poorer or poorer from being richer The form of law which I should propose as the natural sequel would be as follows —In a state which is desirous of being saved from the greatest of all plagues—not faction, but rather distraction—there should exist among the citizens neither extreme poverty nor again, excess of wealth, for both are productive of both these evils. Now the legislator should determine what is to be the limit of poverty or wealth Let the limit of poverty be the value of the lot this ought to be preserved, and no ruler nor any one else who aspires after a reputation for virtue, will allow the lot to be impaired in any case This the legislator gives as a measure, and he will permit a man to acquire double or triple or as much as four times the amount of this But if a person have yet greater riches whether he has found them or they have been given to him or he has made them in business or has acquired by any stroke of fortune that which is in excess of the measure [745] if he give back the surplus to the state and to the Gods who are the patrons of the state he shall suffer no penalty or loss of reputation but if he disobeys this our law any one who likes may inform against him and receive half the value of the excess, and the delinquent shall pay a sum equal to the excess out of his own property and the other half of the excess shall belong to the Gods And let every possession of every man with the exception of the lot be publicly registered before the magistrates whom the law appoints, so that all suits about money may be easy and quite simple

The next thing to be noted is that the city should be placed as nearly as possible in the centre of the country we should choose a place which possesses what is suitable for a city and this may easily be imagined and described Then we will divide the city into twelve portions first founding temples to Hestia to Zeus and to Athene, in a spot which we will call the Acropolis, and surround with a circular wall making the division of the entire city and country radiate from this point The twelve portions shall be equalized by the provision that those which are of good land shall be smaller while those of inferior quality shall be larger The number of the lots shall be 5040 and each of them shall be divided into two and every allotment shall be composed of two such sections one of land near the city the other of land which is at a distance This arrangement shall be carried out in the following manner The section which is near the city shall be added to that which is on the borders, and form one lot and the portion which is next nearest shall be added to the portion which is next farthest and so of the rest. Moreover in the two sections of the lots the same principle of equalization of the soil ought to be maintained the badness and goodness shall be compensated by more and less And the legislator shall divide the citizens into twelve parts and arrange the rest of their property as far as possible so as to form twelve equal parts and there shall be a registration of all After this they shall assign ter of reproach to a freeman and should never want to acquire riches by any such means

[742] Further the law enjoins that no private man shall be allowed to possess gold and silver but only coin for daily use which is almost necessary in dealing with artisans and for payment of hirelings whether slaves or immigrants by all those persons who require the use of them Wherefore our citizens as we say should have a coin passing current among themselves but not accepted among the rest of mankind with a view however to expeditions and journeys to other lands—for embassies or for any other occasion which may arise of sending out a herald the state must also possess a common Hellenic currency If a private person is ever obliged to go abroad let him have the consent of the magistrates and go and if when he returns he has any foreign money remaining let him give the surplus back to the treasury and receive a corresponding sum in the local currency And if he is discovered to appropriate it let it be confiscated and let him who knows and does not inform be subject to curse and dishonour equally with him who brought the money and also to a fine not less in amount than the foreign money which has been brought back In marrying and giving in marriage no one shall give or receive any dowry at all and no one shall deposit money with another whom he does not trust as a friend nor shall he lend money upon interest and the borrower should be under no obligation to repay either capital or interest That these principles are best any one may see who compares them with the first principle and intention of a state The intention as we affirm of a reasonable statesman is not what the many declare to be the object of a good legislator namely that the state for the true interests of which he is advising should be as great and as rich as possible and should possess gold and silver and have the greatest empire by sea and land —this they imagine to be the real object of legislation at the same time adding inconsistently that the true legislator desires to have the city the best and happiest possible But they do not see that some of these things are possible and some of them are impossible and he who orders the state will desire what is possible and will not indulge in vain wishes or attempts to accomplish that which is impossible The citizen must indeed be happy and good and the legislator will seek to make him so but very rich and very good at the same time he cannot be not at least in the sense in which the many speak of riches [743] For they mean by the rich the few who have the most valuable possessions although the owner of them may quite well be a rogue And if this is true I can never assent to the doctrine that the rich man will be happy—he must be good as well as rich And good in a high degree, and rich in a high degree at the same time he cannot be Some one will ask why not? And we shall answer—Because acquisitions which come from sources which are just and unjust indifferently are more than double those which come from just sources only and the sums which are expended neither honourably nor disgracefully are only half as great as those which are expended honourably and on honourable purposes Thus if the one acquires double and spends half the other who is in the opposite case and is a good man cannot possibly be wealthier than he The first—I am speaking of the saver and not of the spender—is not always bad he may indeed in some cases be utterly bad but as I was saying a good man he never is For he who receives money unjustly as well as justly and spends neither justly nor unjustly will be a rich man if he be also thrifty On the other hand the utterly bad is in general profligate and therefore very poor while he who spends on noble objects and acquires wealth by just means only can hardly be remarkable for riches any more than he can be very poor Our statement then, is true that the very rich are not good and if they are not good they are not happy But the intention of our laws was that the citizens should be as happy as may be and as friendly as possible to one another And men who are always at law with one another and amongst whom there are many wrongs done can never be friends to one another but only those among whom crimes and lawsuits are few and slight Therefore we say that gold and silver ought not to be allowed in the city nor much of the vulgar sort of trade which is carried on by lending money or rearing the meaner kinds of live stock but only the produce of agriculture and only so much of this as will not compel us in pursuing it to neglect that for the sake of which riches exist—I mean soul and body which without gymnastics and without education will never be worth anything and therefore, as we have said not once but many times the care of riches should have the last place in our thoughts For there are in all three things about which every man has an interest and the interest about money when rightly regarded is the third and lowest of them midway comes the interest of the

Cleinias Your words, Athenian Stranger are excellent, and I will do as you say

BOOK VI

[751] Athenian Stranger And now having made an end of the preliminaries we will proceed to the appointment of magistracies.

Cleinias Very good.

Ath In the ordering of a state there are two parts first, the number of the magistracies, and the mode of establishing them and, secondly when they have been established, laws again will have to be provided for each of them, suitable in nature and number But before electing the magistrates let us stop a little and say a word in season about the election of them.

Cle What have you got to say?

Ath This is what I have to say —every one can see, that although the work of legislation is a most important matter yet if a well-ordered city superadd to good laws unsuitable offices, not only will there be no use in having the good laws—not only will they be ridiculous and useless, but the greatest political injury and evil will accrue from them.

Cle Of course

Ath Then now my friend, let us observe what will happen in the constitution of our intended state. In the first place, you will acknowledge that those who are duly appointed to magisterial power and their families, should severally have given satisfactory proof of what they are, from youth upward until the time of election in the next place, those who are to elect should have been trained in habits of law and be well educated, that they may have a right judgment, and may be able to select or reject men whom they approve or disapprove, as they are worthy of either But how can we imagine that those who are brought together for the first time, and are strangers to one another and also uneducated, will avoid making mistakes in the choice of magistrates?

Cle Impossible.

Ath The matter is serious, and excuses will not serve the turn. I will tell you, then, what you and I will have to do, since you, as you told me, with nine others, have offered to settle the new state on behalf of the people of Crete, [752] and I am to help you by the invention of the present romance. I certainly would not like to leave the tale wandering all over the world without a head —a headless monster is such a hideous thing

Cle Excellent, Stranger

Ath Yes and I will be as good as my word.

Cle Let us by all means do as you propose.

Ath That we will, by the grace of God, if old age will only permit us.

Cle But God will be gracious.

Ath Yes, and under his guidance let us consider a further point.

Cle What is it?

Ath. Let us remember what a courageously mad and daring creation this our city is.

Cle What had you in your mind when you said that?

Ath I had in my mind the free and easy manner in which we are ordaining that the inexperienced colonists shall receive our laws. Now a man need not be very wise, Cleinias, in order to see that no one can easily receive laws at their first imposition. But if we could anyhow wait until those who have been imbued with them from childhood, and have been nurtured in them, and become habituated to them, take their part in the public elections of the state I say if this could be accomplished, and rightly accomplished by any way or contrivance—then, I think that there would be very little danger at the end of the time, of a state thus trained not being permanent.

Cle A reasonable supposition.

Ath Then let us consider if we can find any way out of the difficulty for I maintain, Cleinias, that the Cnosians, above all the other Cretans, should not be satisfied with barely discharging their duty to the colony but they ought to take the utmost pains to establish the offices which are first created by them in the best and surest manner Above all, this applies to the selection of the guardians of the law who must be chosen first of all, and with the greatest care the others are of less importance.

Cle What method can we devise of electing them?

Ath This will be the method —Sons of the Cretans, I shall say to them, inasmuch as the Cnosians have precedence over the other states, they should, in common with those who join this settlement, choose a body of thirty-seven in all, nineteen of them being taken from the settlers, [753] and the remainder from the citizens of Cnosus. Of those latter the Cnosians shall make a present to your colony and you yourself shall be one of the eighteen, and shall become a citizen of the new state and if you

twelve lots to twelve Gods and call them by their names and dedicate to each God their several portions and call the tribes after them And they shall distribute the twelve divisions of the city in the same way in which they divided the country and every man shall have two habitations one in the centre of the country, and the other at the extremity Enough of the manner of settlement

Now we ought by all means to consider that there can never be such a happy concurrence of circumstances as we have described neither can all things coincide as they are wanted [746] Men who will not take offence at such a mode of living together and will endure all their life long to have their property fixed at a moderate limit and to beget children in accordance with our ordinances and will allow themselves to be deprived of gold and other things which the legislator as is evident from these enactments will certainly forbid them and will endure further the situation of the land with the city in the middle and dwellings round about —all this is as if the legislator were telling his dreams or making a city and citizens of wax There is truth in these objections and therefore every one should take to heart what I am going to say Once more, then the legislator shall appear and address us — O my friends, he will say to us do not suppose me ignorant that there is a certain degree of truth in your words but I am of opinion that in matters which are not present but future he who exhibits a pattern of that at which he aims should in nothing fall short of the fairest and truest, and that if he finds any part of this work impossible of execution he should avoid and not execute it but he should contrive to carry out that which is nearest and most akin to it, you must allow the legislator to perfect his design and when it is perfected you should join with him in considering what part of his legislation is expedient and what will arouse opposition for surely the artist who is to be deemed worthy of any regard at all ought always to make his work self-consistent

Having determined that there is to be a distribution into twelve parts let us now see in what way this may be accomplished There is no difficulty in perceiving that the twelve parts admit of the greatest number of divisions of that which they include or in seeing the other numbers which are consequent upon them, and are produced out of them up to 5040 wherefore the law ought to order phratries and demes and villages and also military ranks and movements as well as coins and measures, dry and liquid and weights so as to be commensurable and agreeable to one another Nor should we fear the appearance of minuteness if the law commands that all the vessels which a man possesses should have a common measure, when we consider generally that the divisions and variations of [747] numbers have a use in respect of all the variations of which they are susceptible both in themselves and as measures of height and depth and in all sounds and in motions as well those which proceed in a straight direction upwards or downwards, as in those which go round and round The legislator is to consider all these things and to bid the citizens as far as possible not to lose sight of numerical order for no single instrument of youthful education has such mighty power both as regards domestic economy and politics and in the arts as the study of arithmetic Above all arithmetic stirs up him who is by nature sleepy and dull, and makes him quick to learn retentive shrewd and aided by art divine he makes progress quite beyond his natural powers All such things if only the legislator by other laws and institutions can banish meanness and covetousness from the souls of men so that they can use them properly and to their own good will be excellent and suitable instruments of education But if he cannot he will unintentionally create in them instead of wisdom the habit of craft which evil tendency may be observed in the Egyptians and Phoenicians and many other races through the general vulgarity of their pursuits and acquisitions whether some unworthy legislator of theirs has been the cause or some impediment of chance or nature For we must not fail to observe O Megillus and Cleinias that there is a difference in places and that some beget better men and others worse and we must legislate accordingly Some places are subject to strange and fatal influences by reason of diverse winds and violent heats some by reason of waters or again from the character of the food given by the earth, which not only affects the bodies of men for good or evil but produces similar results in their souls. And in all such qualities those spots excel in which there is a divine inspiration and in which the demi gods have their appointed lots and are propitious not adverse to the settlers in them To all these matters the legislator if he have any sense in him will attend as far as

Ath In the ordering of a state there are two parts first, the number of the magistracies, and the mode of establishing them and, secondly when they have been established laws again will have to be provided for each of them, suitable in nature and number But before electing the magistrates let us stop a little and say a word in season about the election of them.

Cle What have you got to say?

Ath This is what I have to say —every one can see that although the work of legislation is a most important matter yet if a well-ordered city superadd to good laws unsuitable offices, not only will there be no use in having the good laws—not only will they be ridiculous and useless, but the greatest political injury and evil will accrue from them

Cle Of course

Ath Then now my friend, let us observe what will happen in the constitution of our intended state. In the first place, you will acknowledge that those who are duly appointed to magisterial power and their families should severally have given satisfactory proof of what they are, from youth upward until the time of election in the next place, those who are to elect should have been trained in habits of law and be well educated that they may have a right judgment, and may be able to select or reject men whom they approve or disapprove, as they are worthy of either But how can we imagine that those who are brought together for the first time, and are strangers to one another and also uneducated will avoid making mistakes in the choice of magistrates?

Cle Impossible.

Ath The matter is serious, and excuses will not serve the turn. I will tell you, then what you and I will have to do, since you, as you tell me with nine others, have offered to settle the new state on behalf of the people of Crete [752] and I am to help you by the invention of the present romance. I certainly should not like to leave the tale wandering all over the world without a head —a headless monster is such a hideous thing

Cle Excellent, Stranger

Ath Yes and I will be as good as my word

Cle Let us by all means do as you propose.

Ath That we will by the grace of God, if old age will only permit us.

Cle But God will be gracious

Ath Yes and under his guidance let us consider a further point.

Cle What is it?

Ath Let us remember what a courageously mad and daring creation this our city is.

Cle What had you in your mind when you said that?

Ath I had in my mind the free and easy manner in which we are ordaining that the inexperienced colonists shall receive our laws. Now a man need not be very wise, Cleinias, in order to see that no one can easily receive laws at their first imposition. But if we could anyhow wait until those who have been imbued with them from childhood, and have been nurtured in them and become habituated to them take their part in the public elections of the state I say if this could be accomplished and rightly accomplished by any way or contrivance—then, I think that there would be very little danger at the end of the time of a state thus trained not being permanent.

Cle A reasonable supposition.

Ath Then let us consider if we can find any way out of the difficulty for I maintain Cleinias, that the Cnosians, above all the other Cretans, should not be satisfied with barely discharging their duty to the colony but they ought to take the utmost pains to establish the offices which are first created by them in the best and surest manner Above all this applies to the selection of the guardians of the law who must be chosen first of all, and with the greatest care the others are of less importance.

Cle What method can we devise of electing them?

Ath This will be the method —Sons of the Cretans, I shall say to them, inasmuch as the Cnosians have precedence over the other states, they should in common with those who join this settlement, choose a body of thirty-seven in all, nineteen of them being taken from the settlers, [753] and the remainder from the citizens of Cnosus Of those latter the Cnosians shall make a present to your colony and you yourself shall be one of the eighteen, and shall become a citizen of the new state and if you and they cannot be persuaded to go the Cnosians may fairly use a little violence in order to make you

Cle But why Stranger do not you and Megillus take a part in our new city?

Ath O Cleinias Athens is proud and Sparta too and they are both a long way off But you and likewise the other colonists are conveniently situated as you describe I have been speaking of the way in which the new citizens may be best managed under present circumstances but in after ages if the city continues to exist let the election be on this wise All who are horse or foot soldiers or have seen military service at the proper ages when they were severally fitted for it shall share in the election of magistrates and the election shall be held in whatever temple the state deems most venerable and every one shall carry his vote to the altar of the God writing down on a tablet the name of the person for whom he votes and his father s name and his tribe, and ward and at the side he shall write his own name in like manner Any one who pleases may take away any tablet which he does not think properly filled up and exhibit it in the Agora for a period of not less than thirty days The tablets which are judged to be first to the number of 300, shall be shown by the magistrates to the whole city and the citizens shall in like manner select from these the candidates whom they prefer and this second selection to the number of 100, shall be again exhibited to the citizens in the third let any one who pleases select whom he pleases out of the 100 walking through the parts of victims and let them choose for magistrates and proclaim the seven and thirty who have the greatest number of votes But who Cleinias and Megillus, will order for us in the colony all this matter of the magistrates and the scrutinies of them? If we reflect we shall see that cities which are in process of construction like ours must have some such persons who cannot possibly be elected before there are any magistrates and yet they must be elected in some way and they are not to be inferior men but the best possible For as the proverb says a good beginning is half the business and to have begun well is praised by all and in my opinion is a great deal more than half the business [754] and has never been praised by any one enough

Cle That is very true

Ath Then let us recognize the difficulty and make clear to our own minds how the beginning is to be accomplished There is only one proposal which I have to offer, and that is one which under our circumstances is both necessary and expedient

Cle What is it?

Ath I maintain that this colony of ours has a father and mother who are no other than the colonizing state. Well I know that many colonies have been and will be at enmity with their parents But in early days the child as in a family loves and is beloved even if there come a time later when the tie is broken still while he is in want of education he naturally loves his parents and is beloved by them and flies to his relatives for protection and finds in them his only natural allies in time of need and this parental feeling already exists in the Cnosians, as is shown by their care of the new city and there is a similar feeling on the part of the young city towards Cnosus And I repeat what I was saying—for there is no harm in repeating a good thing—that the Cnosians should take a common interest in all these matters, and choose as far as they can the eldest and best of the colonists to the number of not less than a hundred and let there be another hundred of the Cnosians themselves These I say on their arrival should have a joint care that the magistrates should be appointed according to law and that when they are appointed they should undergo a scrutiny When this has been effected the Cnosians shall return home and the new city do the best she can for her own preservation and happiness I would have the seven and thirty now and in all future time, chosen to fulfil the following duties —Let them in the first place be the guardians of the law and secondly of the registers in which each one registers before the magistrate the amount of his property excepting four minae which are allowed to citizens of the first class three allowed to the second two to the third and a single mina to the fourth And if any one despising the laws for the sake of gain be found to possess anything more which has not been registered let all that he has in excess be confiscated and let him be liable to a suit which shall be the reverse of honourable or fortunate And let any one who will indict him on the charge of loving base gains and proceed against him before the guardians of the law [755] And if he be cast let him lose his share of the public possessions and when there is any public distribution let him have nothing but his original lot and let him be written down a condemned man as long as he lives in some place in which any one who pleases can read about his offences. The guardian of the law shall not hold office longer than twenty years, and shall not be less than fifty years of age when he is elected or if he is elected when he is sixty years of age, he shall hold office for ten years only and upon the same principle, he must not imagine that he will be permitted to hold such an important office as that of guardian of the laws after he is seventy years of age, if he live so long.

[a] Cf. Aristotle Politics ii 6 1265[b] 26-33

These are the three first ordinances about the guardians of the law as the work of legislation progresses, each law in turn will assign to them their further duties. And now we may proceed in order to speak of the election of other officers for generals have to be elected, and these again must have their ministers, commanders, and colonels of horse, and commanders of brigades of foot, who would be more rightly called by their popular name of brigadiers. The guardians of the law shall propose as generals men who are natives of the city and a selection from the candidates proposed shall be made by those who are or have been of the age for military service. And if one who is not proposed is thought by somebody to be better than one who is, let him name whom he prefers in the place of whom, and make oath that he is better and propose him and whichever of them is approved by vote shall be admitted to the final selection and the three who have the greatest number of votes shall be appointed generals, and superintendents of military affairs, after previously undergoing a scrutiny like the guardians of the law And let the generals thus elected propose twelve brigadiers, one for each tribe and there shall be a right of counter proposal as in the case of the generals, and the voting and decision shall take place in the same way Until the prytanes and council are elected, the guardians of the law shall convene the assembly in some holy spot which is suitable to the purpose, placing the hoplites by themselves, and the cavalry by themselves, and in a third division all the rest of the army All are to vote for the generals [and for the colonels of horse] but the brigadiers are to be voted for only by those who carry shields [i.e., the hoplites] [756] Let the body of cavalry choose phylarchs for the general but captains of light troops, or archers, or any other division of the army shall be appointed by the generals for themselves. There only remains the appointment of officers of cavalry these shall be proposed by the same persons who proposed the generals, and the election and the counter proposal of other candidates shall be arranged in the same way as in the case of the generals, and let the cavalry vote and the infantry look on at the election the two who have the greatest number of votes shall be the leaders of all the horse. Disputes about the voting may be raised once or twice but if the dispute be raised a third time, the officers who preside at the several elections shall decide

The council shall consist of 30 x 12 members—360 will be a convenient number for sub-division. If we divide the whole number into four parts of ninety each, we get ninety counsellors for each class First, all the citizens shall select candidates from the first class they shall be compelled to vote and, if they do not, shall be duly fined. When the candidates have been selected, some one shall mark them down this shall be the business of the first day And *on the following day candidates shall be se*lected from the second class in the same manner and under the same conditions as on the previous day and on the third day a selection shall be made from the third class, at which every one may if he likes, vote, and the three first classes shall be compelled to vote but the fourth and lowest class shall be under no com*pulsion, and any member of this class* who does not vote shall not be punished On the fourth day candidates shall be selected from the fourth and smallest class they shall be selected by all but he who is of the fourth class shall suffer no penalty nor he who is of the third, if he be not willing to vote but he who is of the first or second class, if he does not vote shall be punished —he who is of the second class shall pay a fine of triple the amount which was exacted at first, and he who is of the first class quadruple. On the fifth day the rulers shall bring out the names noted down, for all the citizens to see, and every man shall choose out of them, under pain, if he do not, of suffering the first penalty and when they have chosen 180 out of each of the classes, they shall choose one-half of them by lot, who shall undergo a scrutiny — These are to form the council for the year

The mode of election which has been described is in a mean between monarchy and democracy [757] and such a mean the state ought always to observe for servants and masters never can be friends, nor good and bad, merely because they are declared to have equal privileges. For to unequals equals become unequal if they are not harmonized by measure and both by reason of equality and by reason of inequality cities are filled with seditions.

The old saying that equality makes friend ship is happy and also true but there is obscurity and confusion as to what sort of equality is meant For there are two equalities which are called by the same name but are in reality in many ways almost the opposite of one another one of them may be introduced without difficulty by any state or any legislator in the distribution of honours this is the rule of measure weight and number which regulates and apportions them But there is another equality, of a better and higher kind which is not so easily recognized This is the judgment of Zeus among men it avails but little that little however, is the source of the greatest good to individuals and states For it gives to the greater more and to the inferior less and in proportion to the nature of each and above all, greater honour always to the greater virtue and to the less less and to either in proportion to their respective measure of virtue and education And this is justice, and is ever the true principle of states at which we ought to aim and according to this rule order the new city which is now being founded and any other city which may be hereafter founded To this the legislator should look—not to the interests of tyrants one or more or to the power of the people but to justice always which as I was saying is the distribution of natural equality among unequals in each case But there are times at which every state is compelled to use the words just equal in a secondary sense in the hope of escaping in some degree from factions For equity and indulgence are infractions of the perfect and strict rule of justice And this is the reason why we are obliged to use the equality of the lot in order to avoid the discontent of the people and so we invoke God and fortune in our prayers and beg that they themselves will direct the lot with a view to supreme justice And therefore although we are compelled to use both equalities we should use that into which the element of chance enters as seldom as possible [758]

Thus O my friends and for the reasons given should a state act which would endure and be saved But as a ship sailing on the sea has to be watched night and day in like manner a city also is sailing on a sea of politics and is liable to all sorts of insidious assaults and therefore from morning to night, and from night to morning rulers must join hands with rulers and watchers with watchers receiving and giving up their trust in a perpetual succession Now a multitude can never fulfil a duty of this sort with anything like energy Moreover the greater number of the senators will have to be left during the greater part of the year to order their concerns at their own homes They will therefore have to be arranged in twelve portions answering to the twelve months and furnish guardians of the state each portion for a single month Their business is to be at hand and receive any foreigner or citizen who comes to them whether to give information or to put one of those questions, to which when asked by other cities a city should give an answer and to which if she ask them herself she should receive an answer or again when there is a likelihood of internal commotions which are always liable to happen in some form or other they will if they can prevent their occurring or if they have already occurred will lose no time in making them known to the city and healing the evil Wherefore also this which is the presiding body of the state ought always to have the control of their assemblies and of the dissolutions of them ordinary as well as extraordinary All this is to be ordered by the twelfth part of the council which is always to keep watch together with the other officers of the state during one portion of the year and to rest during the remaining eleven portions

Thus will the city be fairly ordered And now who is to have the superintendence of the country and what shall be the arrangement? Seeing that the whole city and the entire country have been both of them divided into twelve portions ought there not to be appointed superintendents of the streets of the city and of the houses and buildings and harbours and the agora and fountains and sacred domains and temples and the like?

Cle To be sure there ought

[759] Ath Let us assume then that there ought to be servants of the temples and priests and priestesses There must also be superintendents of roads and buildings who will have a care of men that they may do no harm and also of beasts both within the enclosure and in the suburbs Three kinds of officers will thus have to be appointed in order that the city may be suitably provided according to her needs Those who have the care of the city shall be called wardens of the city and those who have the care of the agora shall be called wardens of the agora and those who have the care of the temples shall be called priests Those who hold hereditary offices as priests or priestesses shall not be disturbed but if there be few or none such as is probable at the foundation of a new city priests and priestesses shall be appointed to be servants of the Gods who have no servants. Some of our officers shall be elected, and others appointed by lot, those who are of the people and those who are not of the people mingling in a friendly manner in every place and city that the state may be as far as possible of one mind The officers of the temples shall be appointed by lot in this way their election will be committed to God, that he may do what is agreeable to him. And he who obtains a lot shall undergo a scrutiny first, as to whether he is sound of body and of legitimate birth and in the second place, in order to show that he is of a perfectly pure family not stained with homicide or any similar impiety in his own person, and also that his father and mother have led a similar unstained life. Now the laws about all divine things should be brought from Delphi, and interpreters appointed, under whose direction they should be used The tenure of the priesthood should always be for a year and no longer and he who will duly execute the sacred office, according to the laws of religion, must be not less than sixty years of age—the laws shall be the same about priestesses. As for the interpreters, they shall be appointed thus —let the twelve tribes be distributed into groups of four and let each group select four one out of each tribe within the group, three times and let the three who have the greatest number of votes (out of the twelve appointed by each group) after undergoing a scrutiny nine in all, be sent to Delphi, in order that the God may return one out of each triad their age shall be the same as that of the priests, and the scrutiny of them shall be conducted in the same manner let them be interpreters for life, and when any one dies let the four tribes select another from the tribe of the deceased. Moreover besides priests and interpreters, there must be treasurers, who will take charge of the property of the several temples, and of the sacred domains, and shall have authority over the produce and the letting of them and three of them shall be chosen from the highest classes for the greater [760] temples, and two for the lesser and one for the least of all the manner of their election and the scrutiny of them shall be the same as that of the generals. This shall be the order of the temples.

Let everything have a guard as far as possible. Let the defence of the city be committed to the generals, and taxiarchs, and hipparchs, and phylarchs, and prytanes, and the wardens of the city and of the agora when the election of them has been completed The defence of the country shall be provided for as follows —The entire land has been already distributed into twelve as nearly as possible equal parts, and let the tribe allotted to a division provide annually for it five wardens of the country and commanders of the watch and let each body of five have the power of selecting twelve others out of the youth of their own tribe—these shall be not less than twenty five years of age, and not more than thirty And let there be allotted to them severally every month the various districts, in order that they may all acquire knowledge and experience of the whole country The term of service for commanders and for watchers shall continue during two years. After having had their stations allotted to them, they will go from place to place in regular order making their round from left to right as their commanders direct them (when I speak of going to the right, I mean that they are to go to the east) And at the commencement of the second year in order that as many as possible of the guards may not only get a knowledge of the country at any one season of the year but may also have experience of the manner in which different places are affected at different seasons of the year their then commanders shall lead them again towards the left from place to place in succession, until they have completed the second year In the third year other wardens of the country shall be chosen and commanders of the watch, five for each division, who are to be the superintendents of the bands of twelve. While on service at each station, their attention shall be directed to the following points —In the first place, they shall see that the country is well protected against enemies they shall trench and dig wherever this is required, and, as far as they can, they shall by fortifications keep off the evil-disposed, in order to prevent them from doing any harm to the country or the property they shall use the beasts of burden and the labourers whom they find on the spot. these will be their instruments whom they will superintend, [761] taking them, as far as possible, at the times when they are not engaged in their regular business. They shall make every part of the country inaccessible to enemies, and as accessible as possible to friends there shall be ways for man and beasts of burden and for cattle, and they shall take care to have them always as smooth as they can and shall provide

Cf. 755.

Cf. Aristotle, Politics vii. 5, 1326 38.

against the rains doing harm instead of good to the land when they come down from the mountains into the hollow dells and shall keep in the overflow by the help of works and ditches in order that the valleys receiving and drinking up the rain from heaven and providing fountains and streams in the fields and regions which lie underneath may furnish even to the dry places plenty of good water The fountains of water whether of rivers or of springs shall be ornamented with plantations and buildings for beauty and let them bring together the streams in subterraneous channels and make all things plenteous and if there be a sacred grove or dedicated precinct in the neighbourhood they shall conduct the water to the actual temples of the Gods and so beautify them at all seasons of the year Everywhere in such places the youth shall make gymnasia for themselves and warm baths for the aged placing by them abundance of dry wood for the benefit of those labouring under disease—there the weary frame of the rustic worn with toil will receive a kindly welcome far better than he would at the hands of a not over wise doctor

The building of these and the like works will be useful and ornamental they will provide a pleasing amusement but they will be a serious employment too for the sixty wardens will have to guard their several divisions not only with a view to enemies but also with an eye to professing friends When a quarrel arises among neighbours or citizens and any one whether slave or freeman wrongs another let the five wardens decide small matters on their own authority but where the charge against another relates to greater matters the seventeen composed of the fives and twelves shall determine any charges which one man brings against another not involving more than three minae Every judge and magistrate shall be liable to give an account of his conduct in office except those who like kings have the final decision Moreover as regards the aforesaid wardens of the country if they do any wrong to those of whom they have the care whether by imposing upon them unequal tasks [762] or by taking the produce of the soil or implements of husbandry without their consent also if they receive anything in the way of a bribe or decide suits unjustly or if they yield to the influences of flattery let them be publicly dishonoured and in regard to any other wrong which they do to the inhabitants of the country if the question be of a mina let them submit to the decision of the villagers in the neighbourhood but in suits of greater amount or in the case of lesser if they refuse to submit trusting that their monthly removal into another part of the country will enable them to escape—in such cases the injured party may bring his suit in the common court and if he obtain a verdict he may exact from the defendant who refused to submit a double penalty

The wardens and the overseers of the country while on their two years service shall have common meals at their several stations and shall all live together and he who is absent from the common meal or sleeps out if only for one day or night unless by order of his commanders or by reason of absolute necessity, if the five denounce him and inscribe his name in the agora as not having kept his guard let him be deemed to have betrayed the city as far as lay in his power and let him be disgraced and beaten with impunity by any one who meets him and is willing to punish him If any of the commanders is guilty of such an irregularity the whole company of sixty shall see to it and he who is cognizant of the offence and does not bring the offender to trial shall be amenable to the same laws as the younger offender himself and shall pay a heavier fine and be incapable of ever commanding the young The guardians of the law are to be careful inspectors of these matters and shall either prevent or punish offenders Every man should remember the universal rule that he who is not a good servant will not be a good master a man should pride himself more upon serving well than upon commanding well first upon serving the laws which is also the service of the Gods in the second place upon having served ancient and honourable men in the days of his youth Furthermore during the two years in which any one is a warden of the country, his daily food ought to be of a simple and humble kind When the twelve have been chosen [763] let them and the five meet together and determine that they will be their own servants and like servants will not have other slaves and servants for their own use neither will they use those of the villagers and husbandmen for their private advantage but for the public service only and in general they should make up their minds to live independently by themselves servants of each other and of themselves Further at all seasons of the year summer and winter alike let them be under arms and survey minutely the whole country thus they will at once keep guard and at the same time acquire a perfect knowledge of every local ity There can be no more important kind of information than the exact knowledge of a man s own country and for this as well as for more general reasons of pleasure and advantage, hunting with dogs and other kinds of sports should be pursued by the young The service to whom this is committed may be called the secret police or wardens of the country the name does not much signify but every one who has the safety of the state at heart will use his utmost diligence in this service

After the wardens of the country we have to speak of the election of wardens of the agora and of the city The wardens of the country were sixty in number and the wardens of the city will be three, and will divide the twelve parts of the city into three like the former they shall have care of the ways, and of the different high roads hich lead out of the country into the city and of the buildings, that they may be all made according to law —also of the waters, which the guardians of the supply preserve and convey to them, care being taken that they may reach the fountains pure and abundant, and be both an ornament and a benefit to the city These also should be men of influence, and at leisure to take care of the public interest Let every man propose as varden of the city any one whom he likes out of the highest class, and when the vote has been given on them and the number is reduced to the six who ha e the greatest number of votes, let the electing officers choose by lot three out of the six, and when they have undergone a scrutiny let them hold office according to the laws laid down for them. Next let the wardens of the agora be elected in like manner out of the first and second class, fi e in number ten are to be first elected, and out of the ten fi e are to be chosen by lot, as in the election of the wardens of the city —these when they have undergone a scrutiny are to be declared magistr tes. E ery one hall vote for every one and he who will not v te, [764] if he be informed against before the m gistrates, shall be fined fifty drachmae, and shall also be deem d a bad citizen. Let any one who l kes go to the assembly and to the general co ncil t shall be compulsory to go on c tizens f the first and second class, and they shall pay a fine of ten drachmae if they be found not an wer ng to th ir names at the assembly But the th rd and fou th class shall be under no compul on, and shall be let off w tho t a fine, unless the mag st ates have commanded all to be present, in consequence of some urgent necessity The wardens of the agora shall observe the order appointed by law for the agora and shall have the charge of the temples and fountains which are in the agora and they shall see that no one injures anything and punish him who does, with stripes and bonds if he be a slave or stranger but if he be a citizen who misbehaves in this way they shall have the power themselves of inflicting a fine upon him to the amount of a hundred drachmae or with the consent of the wardens of the city up to double that amount And let the wardens of the city have a similar power of imposing punishments and fines in their own department and let them impose fines by their own authority up to a mina, or up to two minae with the consent of the wardens of the agora

In the next place, it will be proper to appoint directors of music and gymnastic, two kinds of each—of the one kind the business will be education, of the other the superintendence of contests In speaking of education, the law means to speak of those who have the care of order and instruction in gymnasia and schools, and of the going to school and of school buildings for boys and girls and in speaking of contests, the law refers to the judges of gymnastics and of music these again are divided into two classes, the one having to do with music, the other with gymnastics and the same who judge of the gymnastic contests of men shall judge of horses but in music there shall be one set of judges of solo s nging and of imitation—I mean of rhapsodists, players on the harp the flute and the like, and another who shall judge of choral song First of all we must choose directors for the choruses of boys, and men and maidens, whom they shall follow in the amusement of the dance, and for our other musical arrangements [765]—one director will be enough for the choruses, and he should be not less than forty years of a e. One director will also be enou h to introduce the solo sin ers, and to give judgment on the competitors, and he ought not to be less than thirty years of age. The director and manager of the choruses shall be elected aft r the following manner —Let any persons who commonly take an interest in such matters go to the meeting and be fined if they do not go (the guardians of the law shall judge of their fault) but those who have no interest shall not be compelled. The elector shall propose as director some one who understands music, and he in the scrutiny may be challenged on the one part by those who say he has no skill and defended on the other hand by those who say that he has Ten are to be elected by vote and he of the ten who is chosen by lot shall undergo a scrutiny and lead the choruses for a year according to law And in like manner the competitor who wins the lot shall be leader of the solo and concert music for that year, and he who is thus elected shall deliver the award to the judges In the next place we have to choose judges in the contests of horses and of men these shall be selected from the third and also from the second class of citizens and the three first classes shall be compelled to go to the election but the lowest may stay away with impunity and let there be three elected by lot out of the twenty who have been chosen previously and they must also have the vote and approval of the examiners But if any one is rejected in the scrutiny at any ballot or decision others shall be chosen in the same manner, and undergo a similar scrutiny

There remains the minister of the education of youth male and female he too will rule according to law one such minister will be sufficient and he must be fifty years old and have children lawfully begotten both boys and girls by preference at any rate, one or the other He who is elected and he who is the elector should consider that of all the great offices of state this is the greatest for the first shoot of any plant if it makes a good start towards the attainment of its natural excellence has the greatest effect on its maturity and this is not only true of plants [766] but of animals wild and tame and also of men Man as we say is a tame or civilized animal nevertheless he requires proper instruction and a fortunate nature and then of all animals he becomes the most divine and most civilized but if he be insufficiently or ill educated he is the most savage of earthly creatures Wherefore the legislator ought not to allow the education of children to become a secondary or accidental matter In the first place he who would be rightly provident about them should begin by taking care that he is elected who of all the citizens is in every way best him the legislator shall do his utmost to appoint guardian and superintendent To this end all the magistrates with the exception of the council and prytanes shall go to the temple of Apollo and elect by ballot him of the guardians of the law whom they severally think will be the best superintendent of education And he who has the greatest number of votes after he has undergone a scrutiny at the hands of all the magistrates who have been his electors, with the exception of the guardians of the law —shall hold office for five years and in the sixth year let another be chosen in like manner to fill his office

If any one dies while he is holding a public office and more than thirty days before his term of office expires let those whose business it is elect another to the office in the same manner as before And if any one who is entrusted with orphans dies let the relations both on the father s and mother s side who are residing at home including cousins appoint another guardian within ten days or be fined a drachma a day for neglect to do so

A city which has no regular courts of law ceases to be a city and again if a judge is silent and says no more in preliminary proceedings than the litigants as is the case in arbitrations he will never be able to decide justly wherefore a multitude of judges will not easily judge well nor a few if they are bad The point in dispute between the parties should be made clear and time and deliberation and repeated examination greatly tend to clear up doubts. For this reason he who goes to law with another should go first of all to his neighbours and friends who know best the questions at issue. And if he be unable to obtain from them a satisfactory decision [767] let him have recourse to another court and if the two courts cannot settle the matter let a third put an end to the suit

Now the establishment of courts of justice may be regarded as a choice of magistrates for every magistrate must also be a judge of some things and the judge though he be not a magistrate yet in certain respects is a very important magistrate on the day on which he is determining a suit Regarding then the judges also as magistrates let us say who are fit to be judges and of what they are to be judges and how many of them are to judge in each suit Let that be the supreme tribunal which the litigants appoint in common for themselves choosing certain persons by agreement And let there be two other tribunals one for private causes when a citizen accuses another of wronging him and wishes to get a decision the other for public causes in which some citizen is of opinion that the public has been wronged by an individual and is willing to vindicate the common interests And we must not forget to mention how the judges are to be qualified and who they are to be In the first place let there be a tribunal open to all private persons who are trying causes one against another for the third time, and let this be composed as follows —All the officers of state, as well annual as those holding office for a longer period when the new year is about to commence, in the month following after the summer solstice, on the last day but one of the year shall meet in some temple, and calling God to witness, shall dedicate one judge from every magistracy to be their first fruits, choosing in each office him who seems to them to be the best, and whom they deem likely to decide the causes of his fellow-citizens during the ensuing year in the best and holiest manner And when the election is completed, a scrutiny shall be held in the presence of the electors themselves, and if any one be rejected another shall be chosen in the same manner Those who have undergone the scrutiny shall judge the causes of those who have declined the inferior courts, and shall give their vote openly The councilors and other magistrates who have elected them shall be required to be hearers and spectators of the causes and any one else may be present who pleases. If one man charges another with having intentionally decided wrong let him go to the guardians of the law and lay his accusation before them, and he who is found guilty in such a case shall pay damages to the injured party equal to half the injury but if he shall appear to deserve a greater penalty the judges shall determine what additional punishment he shall suffer and how much more he ought to pay to the public treasury and to the party who brought the suit.

[768] In the judgment of offences against the state, the people ought to participate, for when any one wrongs the state all are wronged, and may reasonably complain if they are not allowed to share in the decision. Such causes ought to originate with the people, and they ought also to have the final decision of them, but the trial of them shall take place before three of the highest magistrates, upon whom the plaintiff and the defendant shall agree and if they are not able to come to an agreement themselves, the council shall choose one of the two proposed And in private suits, too as far as is possible, all should have a share for he who has no share in the administration of justice, is apt to imagine that he has no share in the state at all And for this reason there shall be a court of law in every tribe and the judges shall be chosen by lot —they shall give their decisions at once and shall be inaccessible to entreaties. The final judgment shall rest with that court which as we maintain has been established in the most incorruptible form of which human things admit this shall be the court established for those who are unable to get rid of their suits either in the courts of neighbours or of the tribes

Thus much of the courts of law which as I was saying cannot be precisely defined either as being or not being offices a superficial sketch has been given of them, in which some things have been told and others omitted For the right place of an exact statement of the laws respecting suits, under their several heads, will be at the end of the body of legislation —let us then expect them at the end Hitherto our legislation has been chiefly occupied with the appointment of offices Perfect unity and exactness, extending to the whole and every particular of political administration, cannot be attained to the full, until the discussion shall have a beginning middle, and end, and is complete in every part. At present we have reached the election of magistrates, and this may be regarded as a sufficient termination of what has preceded. And now there need no longer be any delay or hesitation in beginning the work of legislation.

since we divide the state and assigning to each portion some God or son of a God, let us give them altars and sacred rites, and at the altars let us hold assemblies for sacrifice twice in the month—twelve assemblies for the tribes, and twelve for the city, according to their divisions; the first in honour of the Gods and divine things, and the second to promote friendship and "better acquaintance," as the phrase is, and every sort of good fellowship with one another. For people must be acquainted with those into whose families and whom they marry and with those to whom they give in marriage; in such matters, as far as possible, a man should deem it all important to avoid a mistake, and with this serious purpose let games be instituted in which youths and maidens shall dance together, [772] seeing one another and being seen naked, at a proper age, and on a suitable occasion, not transgressing the rules of modesty.

The directors of choruses will be the superintendents and regulators of these games, and they together with the guardians of the law will legislate in any matters which we have omitted; for, as we said, where there are numerous and minute details, the legislator must leave out something. And the annual officers who have experience, and know what is wanted, must make arrangements and improvements year by year, until such enactments and provisions are sufficiently determined. A ten years' experience of sacrifices and dances, if extending to all particulars, will be quite sufficient; and if the legislator be alive they shall communicate with him, but if he be dead then the several officers shall refer the omissions which come under their notice to the guardians of the law, and correct them, until all is perfect; and from that time there shall be no more change, and they shall establish and use the new laws with the others which the legislator originally gave them, and of which they are never, if they can help, to change aught; or, if some necessity overtakes them, the magistrates must be called into counsel, and the whole people, and they must go to all the oracles of the Gods; and if they are all agreed, in that case they may make the change, but if they are not agreed, by no manner of means, and any one who dissents shall prevail, as the law ordains.

Whenever any one over twenty-five years of age, having seen and been seen by others, believes himself to have found a marriage connection which is to his mind, and suitable for the procreation of children, let him marry if he be still under the age of five-and-thirty years; but let him first hear how he ought to seek after what is suitable and appropriate.[3] For as Clinias says, every law should have a suitable prelude.

Cle. You recollect at the right moment, Stranger, and do not miss the opportunity which the argument affords of saying a word in season.

[773] Ath. I thank you. We will say to him who is born of good parents—O my son, you ought to make such a marriage as wise men would approve. Now they would advise you neither to avoid a poor marriage, nor specially to desire a rich one; but if other things are equal, always to honour inferiors, and with them to form connections;—this will be for the benefit of the city and of the families which are united; for the equable and symmetrical tends infinitely more to virtue than the unmixed. And he who is conscious of being too headstrong, and carried away more than is fitting in all his actions, ought to desire to become the relation of orderly parents; and he who is of the opposite temper ought to seek the opposite alliance. Let there be one word concerning all marriages:—Every man shall follow, not after the marriage which is most pleasing to himself, but after that which is most beneficial to the state. For somehow every one is by nature prone to that which is likest to himself, and in this way the whole city becomes unequal in property and in disposition; and hence there arise in most states the very results which we least desire to happen. Now to add to the law an express provision, not only that the rich man shall not marry into the rich family, nor the powerful into the family of the powerful, but that the slower natures shall be compelled to enter into marriage with the quicker, and the quicker with the slower, may awaken anger as well as laughter in the minds of many; for there is a difficulty in perceiving that the city ought to be well mingled like a cup, in which the maddening wine is hot and fiery, but when chastened by a soberer God, receives a fair associate and becomes an excellent and temperate drink. Yet in marriage no one is able to see that the same result occurs. Wherefore also the law must let alone such matters, but we should manner And especially on the day and night of marriage should a man abstain from such things. For the beginning, which is also a God dwelling in man, [776] preserves all things, if it meet with proper respect from each individual. He who marries is further to consider that one of the two houses in the lot is the nest and nursery of his young and there he is to marry and make a home for himself and bring up his children, going away from his father and mother For in friendships there must be some degree of desire, in order to cement and bind together diversities of character but excessive intercourse not having the desire which is created by time, insensibly dissolves friendships from a feeling of satiety wherefore a man and his wife shall leave to his and her father and mother their own dwelling places, and themselves go as to a colony and dwell there, and visit and be visited by their parents and they shall beget and bring up children, handing on the torch of life from one generation to another and worshipping the Gods according to law for ever

In the next place, we have to consider what sort of property will be most convenient. There is no difficulty either in understanding or acquiring most kinds of property but there is great difficulty in what relates to slaves. And the reason is that we speak about them in a way which is right and which is not right for what we say about our slaves is consistent and also inconsistent with our practice about them

Megillus I do not understand Stranger what you mean.

Ath I am not surprised Megillus, for the state of the Helots among the Lacedaemonians is of all Hellenic forms of slavery the most controverted and disputed about, some approving and some condemning it there is less dispute about the slavery which exists among the Heracleots who have subjugated the Mariandynians, and about the Thessalian Penestae Looking at these and the like examples what ought we to do concerning property in slaves? I made a remark in passing which naturally elicited a question about my meaning from you It was this —We know that all would agree that we should have the best and most attached slaves whom we can get For many a man has found his slaves better in every way than brethren or sons and many times they have saved the lives and property of their masters and their whole house—such tales are well known

Meg To be sure

Ath But may we not also say that the soul of the slave is utterly corrupt and that no man of sense ought to trust them? And the wisest of our poets, speaking of Zeus, says

> Far-seeing Zeus takes away half the understanding of men whom the day of slavery subdues. [—]

Different persons have got these two different notions of slaves in their minds—some of them utterly distrust their servants, and as if they were wild beasts, chastise them with goads and whips, and make their souls three times, or rather many times, as slavish as they were before—and others do just the opposite

Meg True.

Cle Then what are we to do in our own country Stranger seeing that there are such differences in the treatment of slaves by their owners?

Ath Well Cleinias, there can be no doubt that man is a troublesome animal and therefore he is not very manageable nor likely to become so, when you attempt to introduce the necessary division of slave, and freeman and master

Cle That is obvious.

Ath He is a troublesome piece of goods as has been often shown by the frequent revolts of the Messenians, and the great mischiefs which happen in states having many slaves who speak the same language, and the numerous robberies and lawless life of the Italian banditti as they are called A man who considers all this is fairly at a loss Two remedies alone remain to us—not to have the slaves of the same country nor if possible speaking the same language in this way they will more easily be held in subjection secondly we should tend them carefully not only out of regard to them but yet more out of respect to ourselves And the right treatment of slaves is to behave properly to them, and to do to them if possible even more justice than to those who are our equals for he who naturally and genuinely reverences justice and hates injustice is discovered in his dealings with any class of men to whom he can easily be unjust And he who in regard to the natures and actions of his slaves is undefiled by impiety and injustice will best sow the seeds of virtue in them and this may be truly said of every master and tyrant and of every other having authority in relation to his inferiors Slaves ought to be punished as they deserve and not admonished as if they were freemen which will only make them conceited [778] The language used to a servant

try to charm the spirits of men into believing the equability of their children s disposition to be of more importance than equality in excessive fortune when they marry and him who is too desirous of making a rich marriage we should endeavour to turn aside by reproaches not however by any compulsion of written law,

Let this then be our exhortation concerning marriage and let us remember what was said before —that a man should cling to immortality, [774] and leave behind him children s children to be the servants of God in his place for ever All this and much more may be truly said by way of prelude about the duty of marriage. But if a man will not listen and remains unsocial and alien among his fellow-citizens and is still unmarried at thirty five years of age let him pay a yearly fine —he who is of the highest class shall pay a fine of a hundred drachmae and he who is of the second class a fine of seventy drachmae the third class shall pay sixty drachmae and the fourth thirty drachmae and let the money be sacred to Here he who does not pay the fine annually shall owe ten times the sum which the treasurer of the goddess shall exact, and if he fails in doing so let him be answerable and give an account of the money at his audit He who refuses to marry shall be thus punished in money and also be deprived of all honour which the younger show to the elder let no young man voluntarily obey him and if he attempt to punish any one let every one come to the rescue and defend the injured person and he who is present and does not come to the rescue shall be pronounced by the law to be a coward and a bad citizen Of the marriage portion I have already spoken [2] and again I say for the instruction of poor men that he who neither gives nor receives a dowry on account of poverty has a compensation for the citizens of our state are provided with the necessaries of life and wives will be less likely to be insolent and husbands to be mean and subservient to them on account of property And he who obeys this law will do a noble action but he who will not obey and gives or receives more than fifty drachmae as the price of the marriage garments if he be of the lowest or more than a mina or a mina and a half if he be of the third or second classes or two minae if he be of the highest class shall owe to the public treasury a similar sum and that which is given or received shall be sacred to Herè and Zeus and let the treasurers of these Gods exact the money as was said before about the unmarried—that the treasurers of Herè were to exact the money or pay the fine themselves

The betrothal by a father shall be valid in the first degree, that by a grandfather in the second degree and in the third degree, betrothal by brothers who have the same father but if there are none of these alive the betrothal by a mother shall be valid in like manner in cases of unexampled fatality the next of kin and the guardians shall have authority What are to be the rites before marriages or any other sacred acts relating either to future, present or past marriages [775] shall be referred to the interpreters and he who follows their advice may be satisfied Touching the marriage festival they shall assemble not more than five male and five female friends of both families, and a like number of members of the family of either sex and no man shall spend more than his means will allow he who is of the richest class may spend a mina—he who is of the second half a mina and in the same proportion as the census of each decreases all men shall praise him who is obedient to the law but he who is disobedient shall be punished by the guardians of the law as a man wanting in true taste and uninstructed in the laws of bridal song Drunkenness is always improper except at the festivals of the God who gave wine and peculiarly dangerous when a man is engaged in the business of marriage at such a crisis of their lives a bride and bridegroom ought to have all their wits about them—they ought to take care that their offspring may be born of reasonable beings for on what day or night Heaven will give them increase who can say? Moreover they ought not to be begetting children when their bodies are dissipated by intoxication but their offspring should be compact and solid quiet and compounded properly whereas the drunkard is all abroad in all his actions and beside himself both in body and soul Wherefore also the drunken man is bad and unsteady in sowing the seed of increase and is likely to beget offspring who will be unstable and untrustworthy and cannot be expected to walk straight either in body or mind Hence during the whole year and all his life long and especially while he is begetting children he ought to take care and not intentionally do what is injurious to health or what involves insolence and wrong for he cannot help leaving the impression of himself on the souls and bodies of his offspring and he begets children in every way for the public conduct of states, while he leaves the private life of citizens wholly to take care of itself who thinks that individuals may pass the day as they please, and that there is no necessity of order in all things he, I say who gives up the control of their private lives, and supposes that they will conform to law in their common and public life, is making a great mistake. Why have I made this remark? Why because I am going to enact that the bridegrooms should live at the common tables, just as they did before marriage. This was a singularity when first enacted by the legislator in your parts of the world, Megillus and Clinias, as I should suppose, on the occasion of some war or other similar danger which caused the passing of the law and which would be likely to occur in thinly peopled places, and in times of pressure. But when men had once tried and been accustomed to a common table, experience showed that the institution greatly conduced to security and in some such manner the custom of having common tables arose among you.

Cle Likely enough.

Ath. I said that there may have been singularity and danger in imposing such a custom at first, but that now there is not the same difficulty There is, however another institution which is the natural sequel to this, and would be excellent, if it existed anywhere, but at present it does not. The institution of which I am about to speak is not easily described or executed and would be like the legislator "combing wool into the fire," as people say or performing any other impossible and useless feat.

Cle What is the cause, Stranger of this extreme hesitation?

Ath You shall hear without any fruitless loss of time That which has law and order in a state is the cause of every good, but that which is disordered or ill-ordered is often the ruin of that which is well-ordered [781] and at this point the argument is now waiting. For with you, Clinias and Megillus, the common tables of men are, as I said, a heaven-born and admirable institution, but you are mistaken in leaving the women unregulated by law They have no similar institution of public tables in the light of day and just that part of the human race which is by nature prone to secrecy and stealth on account of their weakness—I mean the female sex—has been left without regulation by the legislator which is a great mistake. And, in consequence of this neglect, many things have grown lax among you, which might have been far better if they had been only regulated by law for the neglect of regulations about women may not only be regarded as a neglect of half the entire matter but in proportion as woman's nature is inferior to that of men in capacity for virtue, in that degree the consequence of such neglect is more than twice as important. The careful consideration of this matter and the arranging and ordering on a common principle of all our institutions relating both to men and women, greatly conduces to the happiness of the state. But at present, such is the unfortunate condition of mankind, that no man of sense will even venture to speak of common tables in places and cities in which they have never been established at all and how can any one avoid being utterly ridiculous, who attempts to compel women to show in public how much they eat and drink? There is nothing at which the sex is more likely to take offence. For women are accustomed to creep into dark places, and when dragged out into the light they will exert their utmost powers of resistance, and be far too much for the legislator And therefore, as I said before, in most places they will not endure to have the truth spoken without raising a tremendous outcry but in this state perhaps they may And if we may assume that our whole discussion about the state has not been mere idle talk, I should like to prove to you, if you will consent to listen, that this institution is good and proper but if you had rather not, I will refrain.

Cle There is nothing which we should both of us like better Stranger than to hear what you have to say

Ath Very good and you must not be surprised if I go back a little, for we have plenty of leisure, and there is nothing to prevent us from considering in every point of view the subject of law

Cle True.

Ath Then let us return once more to what we were saying at first. Every man should understand that the human race either had no beginning at all, and will never have an end, but always will be and has been [782] or that it began an immense while ago

Cle Certainly

Ath Well, and have there not been constitutions and destructions of states, and all sorts of pursuits both orderly and disorderly and diverse desires of meats and drinks always, and in all the world, and all sorts of changes of the ought always to be that of a command [1] and we ought not to jest with them whether they are males or females—this is a foolish way which many people have of setting up their slaves and making the life of servitude more disagreeable both for them and for their masters

Cle True

Ath Now that each of the citizens is provided as far as possible with a sufficient number of suitable slaves who can help him in what he has to do we may next proceed to describe their dwellings

Cle Very good

Ath The city being new and hitherto uninhabited, care ought to be taken of all the buildings and the manner of building each of them, and also of the temples and walls These Cleinias were matters which properly came before the marriages but as we are only talking there is no objection to changing the order If however our plan of legislation is ever to take effect then the house shall precede the marriage if God so will and afterwards we will come to the regulations about marriage but at present we are only describing these matters in a general outline

Cle Quite true

Ath The temples are to be placed all round the agora and the whole city built on the heights in a circle for the sake of defence and for the sake of purity Near the temples are to be placed buildings for the magistrates and the courts of law in these plaintiff and defendant will receive their due and the places will be regarded as most holy partly because they have to do with holy things and partly because they are the dwelling places of holy Gods and in them will be held the courts in which cases of homicide and other trials of capital offenses may fitly take place As to the walls Megillus I agree with Sparta in thinking that they should be allowed to sleep in the earth and that we should not attempt to disinter them there is a poetical saying which is finely expressed that walls ought to be of steel and iron and not of earth besides how ridiculous of us to be sending out our young men annually into the country to dig and to trench and to keep off the enemy by fortifications under the idea that they are not to be allowed to set foot in our territory and then that we should surround ourselves with a wall which in the first place is by no means conducive to the health of cities and is also apt to produce a certain effeminacy in the minds of the inhabitants inviting men to run thither instead of repelling their enemies [779] and leading them to imagine that their safety is due not to their keeping guard day and night but that when they are protected by walls and gates then they may sleep in safety as if they were not meant to labour and did not know that true repose comes from labour and that disgraceful indolence and a careless temper of mind is only the renewal of trouble But if men must have walls the private houses ought to be so arranged from the first that the whole city may be one wall having all the houses capable of defence by reason of their uniformity and equality towards the streets [4] The form of the city being that of a single dwelling will have an agreeable aspect and being easily guarded will be infinitely better for security Until the original building is completed these should be the principal objects of the inhabitants and the wardens of the city should superintend the work and should impose a fine on him who is negligent and in all that relates to the city they should have a care of cleanliness and not allow a private person to encroach upon any public property either by buildings or excavations Further they ought to take care that the rains from heaven flow off easily and of any other matters which may have to be administered either within or without the city The guardians of the law shall pass any further enactments which their experience may show to be necessary and supply any other points in which the law may be deficient And now that these matters and the buildings about the agora and the gymnasia and places of instruction and theatres are all ready and waiting for scholars and spectators let us proceed to the subjects which follow marriage in the order of legislation

Cle By all means

Ath Assuming that marriages exist already Cleinias the mode of life during the year after marriage before children are born will follow next in order In what way bride and bridegroom ought to live in a city which is to be superior to other cities is a matter not at all easy for us to determine There have been many difficulties already but this will be the greatest of them and the most disagreeable to the many Still I cannot but say what appears to me to be right and true Cleinias shall choose any of the guardians of the law and them by their permission and appointment. The women who preside over these matters shall enter into the houses of the young, and partly by admonitions and partly by threats make them give over their folly and error: if they persist, let the women go and tell the guardians of the law, and the guardians shall prevent them. But if they too cannot prevent them, they shall bring the matter before the people; and let them write up their names and make oath that they cannot reform such and such an one; and let him who is thus written up, if he cannot in a court of law convict those who have inscribed his name, be deprived of the privileges of a citizen in the following respects:—let him not go to weddings nor to the thanksgivings after the birth of children; and if he go, let any one who pleases strike him with impunity; and let the same regulations hold about women: let not a woman be allowed to appear abroad, or receive honour, or go to nuptial and birthday festivals, if she in like manner be written up as acting disorderly and cannot obtain a verdict. And if, when they themselves have done begetting children according to the law, a man or woman have connection with another man or woman who are still begetting children, let the same penalties be inflicted upon them as upon those who are still having a family; and when the time for procreation has passed let the man or woman who refrains in such matters be held in esteem, and let those who do not refrain be held in the contrary of esteem—that is to say [785] disesteem. Now if the greater part of mankind behave modestly, the enactments of law may be left to slumber; but, if they are disorderly, the enactments having been passed, let them be carried into execution. To every man the first year is the beginning of life, and the time of birth ought to be written down in the temples of their fathers as the beginning of existence to every child, whether boy or girl. Let every phratria have inscribed on a whited wall the names of the successive archons by whom the years are reckoned. And near to them let the living members of the phratria be inscribed, and when they depart life let them be erased. The limit of marriageable ages for a woman shall be from sixteen to twenty years at the longest—for a man, from thirty to thirty-five years; and let a woman hold office at forty, and a man at thirty years. Let a man go out to war from twenty to sixty years, and for a woman, if there appear any need to make use of her in military service, let the time of service be after she shall have brought forth children up to fifty years of age; and let regard be had to what is possible and suitable to each.

BOOK VII

[788] AND now, assuming children of both sexes to have been born, it will be proper for us to consider, in the next place, their nurture and education; this cannot be left altogether unnoticed, and yet may be thought a subject fitted rather for precept and admonition than for law. In private life there are many little things, not always apparent, arising out of the pleasures and pains and desires of individuals, which run counter to the intention of the legislator, and make the characters of the citizens various and dissimilar:—this is an evil in states; for by reason of their smallness and frequent occurrence, there would be an unseemliness and want of propriety in making them penal by law; and if made penal, they are the destruction of the written law because mankind get the habit of frequently transgressing the law in small matters. The result is that you cannot legislate about them, and still less can you be silent. I speak somewhat darkly, but I shall endeavour also to bring my wares into the light of day, for I acknowledge that at present there is a want of clearness in what I am saying.

Clenias. Very true.

Athenian Stranger. Am I not right in maintaining that a good education is that which tends most to the improvement of mind and body?

Cle. Undoubtedly.

Ath. And nothing can be plainer than that the fairest bodies are those which grow up from infancy in the best and straightest manner?

Cle. Certainly.

Ath. And do we not further observe that the first shoot of every living thing is by far the greatest and fullest? Many will even contend that a man at twenty-five does not reach twice the height which he attained at five.

Cl. True.

Ath. Well, and is not rapid growth without proper and abundant exercise the source of endless evils in the body?

Cle. Yes.

[789] Ath. And the body should have the most exercise when it receives most nourishment?

Cle. But, Stranger, are we to impose this great amount of exercise upon newly-born infants?

seasons in which animals may be expected to have undergone innumerable transformations of themselves?

Cle No doubt.

Ath And may we not suppose that vines appeared, which had previously no existence and also olives and the gifts of Demeter and her daughter of which one Triptolemus was the minister and that before these existed animals took to devouring each other as they do still?

Cle True

Ath Again the practice of men sacrificing one another still exists among many nations while on the other hand we hear of other human beings who did not even venture to taste the flesh of a cow and had no animal sacrifices but only cakes and fruits dipped in honey, and similar pure offerings but no flesh of animals from these they abstained under the idea that they ought not to eat them and might not stain the altars of the Gods with blood For in those days men are said to have lived a sort of Orphic life having the use of all lifeless things but abstaining from all living things

Cle Such has been the constant tradition and is very likely true

Ath Some one might say to us What is the drift of all this?

Cle A very pertinent question Stranger

Ath And therefore I will endeavour Cleinias if I can to draw the natural inference

Cle Proceed

Ath I see that among men all things depend upon three wants and desires of which the end is virtue if they are rightly led by them or the opposite if wrongly Now these are eating and drinking which begin at birth—every animal has a natural desire for them and is violently excited and rebels against him who says that he must not satisfy all his pleasures and appetites and get rid of all the corresponding pains —and the third and greatest and [783] sharpest want and desire breaks out last and is the fire of sexual lust which kindles in men every species of wantonness and madness And these three disorders we must endeavour to master by the three great principles of fear and law and right reason turning them away from that which is called pleasantest to the best using the Muses and the Gods who preside over contests to extinguish their increase and influx

But to return —After marriage let us speak of the birth of children and after their birth of their nurture and education In the course of discussion the several laws will be perfected, and we shall at last arrive at the common tables Whether such associations are to be confined to men or extended to women also we shall see better when we approach and take a nearer view of them and we may then determine what previous institutions are required and will have to precede them As I said before, we shall see them more in detail and shall be better able to lay down the laws which are proper or suited to them

Cle Very true

Ath Let us keep in mind the words which have now been spoken for hereafter there may be need of them

Cle What do you bid us keep in mind?

Ath That which we comprehended under the three words—first eating secondly drinking thirdly the excitement of love

Cle We shall be sure to remember Stranger

Ath Very good Then let us now proceed to marriage and teach persons in what way they shall beget children threatening them, if they disobey with the terrors of the law

Cle What do you mean?

Ath The bride and bridegroom should consider that they are to produce for the state the best and fairest specimens of children which they can Now all men who are associated in any action always succeed when they attend and give their mind to what they are doing but when they do not give their mind or have no mind they fail wherefore let the bridegroom give his mind to the bride and to the begetting of children and the bride in like manner give her mind to the bridegroom and particularly at the time when their children are not yet born [784] And let the women whom we have chosen be the overseers of such matters and let them in whatever number large or small and at whatever time the magistrates may command assemble every day in the temple of Eileithyia during a third part of the day and being there assembled, let them inform one another of any one whom they see whether man or woman of those who are begetting children disregarding the ordinances given at the time when the nuptial sacrifices and ceremonies were performed Let the begetting of children and the supervision of those who are begetting them continue ten years and no longer during the time when marriage is fruitful But if any continue without children up to this time, let them take counsel with their kindred and with the women holding the office of overseer and be divorced for their mutual benefit If however any dispute arises about what is proper and for the interest of either party they making the Bacchantes, although they remain awake, to dance to the pipe with the help of the Gods to whom they offer acceptable sacrifices, and producing in them a sound mind which takes the place of their frenzy And to express what I mean in a word there is a good deal to be said in favour of this treatment

Cle Certainly

Ath But if fear has such a power we ought to infer from these facts, that every soul which from youth upward has been familiar with fears, will be made more liable to fear and every one will allow that this is the way to form a habit of cowardice and not of courage

Cle No doubt

Ath And on the other hand the habit of overcoming, from our youth upwards the fears and terrors which beset us, may be said to be an exercise of courage

Cle True.

Ath And we may say that the use of exercise and motion in the earliest years of life greatly contributes to create a part of virtue in the soul

Cle Quite true.

Ath Further a cheerful temper or the reverse, may be regarded as having much to do with high spirit on the one hand or with cowardice on the other

Cle To be sure.

Ath Then now we must endeavour to show how and to what extent we may if we please, without difficulty implant either character in the young

Cle Certainly

Ath There is a common opinion that luxury makes the disposition of youth discontented and irascible and vehemently excited by trifles that on the other hand excessive and savage servitude makes men mean and abject, and haters of their kind, and therefore makes them undesirable associates

Cle But how must the state educate those who do not as yet understand the language of the country and are therefore incapable of appreciating any sort of instruction?

Ath I will tell you how —Every animal that is born is wont to utter some cry and this is especially the case with man and he is also affected with the inclination to weep more than any other animal

Cle Quite true

Ath Do not nurses when they want to know what an infant desires [792] judge by these signs —when anything is brought to the infant and he is silent, then he is supposed to be pleased but when he weeps and cries out then he is not pleased For tears and cries are the inauspicious signs by which children show what they love and hate Now the time which is thus spent is no less than three years, and is a very considerable portion of life to be passed ill or well

Cle True

Ath Does not the discontented and ungracious nature appear to you to be full of lamentations and sorrows more than a good man ought to be?

Cle Certainly

Ath Well but if during these three years every possible care were taken that our nursling should have as little of sorrow and fear and in general of pain as was possible might we not expect in early childhood to make his soul more gentle and cheerful?

Cle To be sure, Stranger—more especially if we could procure him a variety of pleasures.

Ath There I can no longer agree, Cleinias you amaze me To bring him up in such a way would be his utter ruin for the beginning is always the most critical part of education Let us see whether I am right

Cle Proceed

Ath The point about which you and I differ is of great importance and I hope that you, Megillus, will help to decide between us For I maintain that the true life should neither seek for pleasures nor on the other hand entirely avoid pains, but should embrace the middle state, which I just spoke of as gentle and benign and is a state which we by some divine presage and inspiration rightly ascribe to God. Now I say he among men, too who would be divine ought to pursue after this mean habit—he should not rush headlong into pleasures, for he will not be free from pains nor should we allow any one, young or old male or female to be thus given any more than ourselves, and least of all the newly born infant for in infancy more than at any other time the character is engrained by habit. Nay more if I were not afraid of appearing to be ridiculous I would say that a woman during her year of pregnancy should of all women be most carefully tended and kept from violent or excessive pleasures and pains and should at that time cultivate gentleness and benevolence and kindness

[793] Cle You need not ask Megillus, Stranger which of us has most truly spoken for I myself agree that all men ought to avoid the

Ath Nay, rather on the bodies of infants still unborn

Cle What do you mean, my good sir? In the process of gestation?

Ath Exactly I am not at all surprised that you have never heard of this very peculiar sort of gymnastic applied to such little creatures which although strange I will endeavour to explain to you

Cle By all means

Ath The practice is more easy for us to understand than for you by reason of certain amusements which are carried to excess by us at Athens Not only boys but often older persons are in the habit of keeping quails and cocks which they train to fight one another And they are far from thinking that the contests in which they stir them up to fight with one another are sufficient exercise for in addition to this, they carry them about tucked beneath their armpits holding the smaller birds in their hands the larger under their arms and go for a walk of a great many miles for the sake of health that is to say not their own health but the health of the birds whereby they prove to any intelligent person that all bodies are benefited by shakings and movements when they are moved without weariness whether the motion proceeds from themselves or is caused by a swing or at sea or on horseback or by other bodies in whatever way moving and that thus gaining the mastery over food and drink they are able to impart beauty and health and strength But admitting all this what follows? Shall we make a ridiculous law that the pregnant woman shall walk about and fashion the embryo within as we fashion wax before it hardens and after birth swathe the infant for two years? Suppose that we compel nurses under penalty of a legal fine to be always carrying the children somewhere or other either to the temples or into the country or to their relations houses until they are well able to stand and to take care that their limbs are not distorted by leaning on them when they are too young —they should continue to carry them until the infant has completed its third year the nurses should be strong and there should be more than one of them Shall these be our rules and shall we impose a penalty for the neglect of them? [790] No no the penalty of which we were speaking will fall upon our own heads more than enough

Cle What penalty?

Ath Ridicule and the difficulty of getting the feminine and servant like dispositions of the nurses to comply

Cle Then why was there any need to speak of the matter at all?

Ath The reason is that masters and freemen in states when they hear of it are very likely to arrive at a true conviction that without due regulation of private life in cities stability in the laying down of laws is hardly to be expected and he who makes this reflection may himself adopt the laws just now mentioned and adopting them may order his house and state well and be happy

Ath And therefore let us proceed with our legislation until we have determined the exercises which are suited to the souls of young children in the same manner in which we have begun to go through the rules relating to their bodies

Cle By all means

Ath Let us assume then as a first principle in relation both to the body and soul of very young creatures that nursing and moving about by day and night is good for them all and that the younger they are the more they will need it infants should live if that were possible as if they were always rocking at sea This is the lesson which we may gather from the experience of nurses and likewise from the use of the remedy of motion in the rites of the Corybantes for when mothers want their restless children to go to sleep they do not employ rest but on the contrary motion—rocking them in their arms nor do they give them silence but they sing to them and lap them in sweet strains and the Bacchic women are cured of their frenzy in the same manner by the use of the dance and of music

Cle Well Stranger and what is the reason of this?

Ath The reason is obvious

Cle What?

Ath The affection both of the Bacchantes and of the children is an emotion of fear which springs out of an evil habit of the soul And when some one applies external agitation to affections of this [791] sort the motion coming from without gets the better of the terrible and violent internal one and produces a peace and calm in the soul and quiets the restless palpitation of the heart which is a thing much to be desired sending the children to sleep and similar instruments, as I was saying, it is of no consequence, but makes a great difference, and may be of very great importance to the warrior who has to use iron weapons, bows and javelins, and the like, above all, when in heavy armour he has to fight against heavy armour. And there is a very great difference between one who has learnt and one who has not, and between one who has been trained in gymnastic exercises and one who has not been. For as he who is perfectly skilled in the Pancratium or boxing or wrestling, is not unable to fight from his left side, and does not limp and draggle in confusion when his opponent makes him change his position, so in heavy-armed fighting, and in all other things, if I am not mistaken, the like holds—he who has these double powers of attack and defence ought not in any case to leave them either unused or untrained, if he can help; and if a person had the nature of Geryon or Briareus he ought to be able with his hundred hands to throw a hundred darts. Now the magistrates, male and female, should see to all these things, the women superintending the nursing and amusements of the children, and the men superintending their education, that all of them, boys and girls alike, may be sound hand and foot, and may not, if they can help, spoil the gifts of nature by bad habits.

Education has two branches—one of gymnastic, which is concerned with the body, and the other of music, which is designed for the improvement of the soul. And gymnastic has also two branches—dancing and wrestling; and one sort of dancing imitates musical recitation, and aims at preserving dignity and freedom, the other aims at producing health, agility, and beauty in the limbs and parts of the body, giving the proper flexion and extension to each of them, a harmonious motion being diffused everywhere, and forming a suitable accompaniment to the dance. [796] As regards wrestling, the tricks which Antaeus and Cercyon devised in their systems out of a vain spirit of competition, or the tricks of boxing which Epeius or Amycus invented, are useless and unsuitable for war, and do not deserve to have much said about them; but the art of wrestling erect and keeping free the neck and hands and sides, working with energy and constancy, with a composed strength, and for the sake of health—these are always useful, and are not to be neglected, but to be enjoined alike on masters and scholars, when we reach that part of legislation; and we will desire the one to give their instructions freely, and the others to receive them thankfully.[1] Nor, again, must we omit suitable imitations of war in our choruses; here in Crete you have the armed dances of the Curetes, and the Lacedaemonians have those of the Dioscuri. And our virgin lady, delighting in the amusement of the dance, thought it not fit to amuse herself with empty hands; she must be clothed in a complete suit of armour, and in this attire go through the dance; and youths and maidens should in every respect imitate her, esteeming highly the favour of the Goddess, both with a view to the necessities of war and to festive occasions: it will be right also for the boys, until such time as they go out to war, to make processions and supplications to all the Gods in goodly array, armed and on horseback, in dances, and marches, fast or slow, offering up prayers to the Gods and to the sons of Gods; and also engaging in contests and preludes of contests, if at all, with these objects. For these sorts of exercises, and no others, are useful both in peace and war, and are beneficial alike to states and to private houses. But other labours and sports and exercises of the body are unworthy of freemen, O Megillus and Cleinias.

I have now completely described the kind of gymnastic which I said at first ought to be described; if you know of any better, will you communicate your thoughts?[2]

Cle. It is not easy, Stranger, to put aside these principles of gymnastic and wrestling and to enunciate better ones.

Ath. Now we must say what has yet to be said about the gifts of the Muses and of Apollo: before, we fancied that we had said all, and that gymnastic alone remained; but now we see clearly what points have been omitted, and should be first proclaimed; of these, then, let us proceed to speak.

[797] Cle. By all means.

Ath. Let me tell you once more—although you have heard me say the same before—that caution must be always exercised, both by the speaker and by the hearer, about anything that is very singular and unusual. For my tale is one which many a man would be afraid to tell, and yet I have a confidence which makes me go on.

Cle. What have you to say, Stranger?

Ath. I say that in states generally no one has observed that the plays of childhood have a great deal to do with the permanence or want life of unmingled pain or pleasure and pursue always a middle course And having spoken well may I add that you have been well answered?

Ath Very good Cleinias and now let us all three consider a further point

Cle What is it?

Ath That all the matters which we are now describing are commonly called by the general name of unwritten customs, and what are termed the laws of our ancestors are all of similar nature And the reflection which lately arose in our minds[1] that we can neither call these things laws nor yet leave them unmentioned is justified for they are the bonds of the whole state and come in between the written laws which are or are hereafter to be laid down they are just ancestral customs of great antiquity which if they are rightly ordered and made habitual shield and preserve the previously existing written law but if they depart from right and fall into disorder then they are like the props of builders which slip away out of their place and cause a universal ruin—one part drags another down and the fair superstructure falls because the old foundations are undermined Reflecting upon this Cleinias you ought to bind together the new state in every possible way omitting nothing whether great or small of what are called laws or manners or pursuits, for by these means a city is bound together and all these things are only lasting when they depend upon one another and therefore, we must not wonder if we find that many apparently trifling customs or usages come pouring in and lengthening out our laws

Cle Very true we are disposed to agree with you

Ath Up to the age of three years whether of boy or girl if a person strictly carries out our previous regulations and makes them a principal aim he will do much for the advantage of the young creatures But at three four five and even six years the childish nature will require sports now is the time to get rid of self will in him punishing him but not so as to disgrace him We were saying about slaves that we ought neither to add insult to punishment so as to anger them [794] nor yet to leave them unpunished lest they become self willed and a like rule is to be observed in the case of the free born Children at that age have certain natural modes of amusement which they find out for themselves when they meet And all the children who are between the ages of three and six ought to meet at the temples of the villages the several families of a village uniting on one spot The nurses are to see that the children behave properly and orderly—they themselves and all their companies are to be under the control of twelve matrons one for each company who are annually selected to inspect them from the women previously mentioned [i e the women who have authority over marriage] whom the guardians of the law appoint. These matrons shall be chosen by the women who have authority over marriage one out of each tribe all are to be of the same age and let each of them as soon as she is appointed hold office and go to the temples every day punishing all offenders male or female, who are slaves or strangers by the help of some of the public slaves but if any citizen disputes the punishment let her bring him before the wardens of the city or if there be no dispute let her punish him herself After the age of six years the time has arrived for the separation of the sexes—let boys live with boys and girls in like manner with girls Now they must begin to learn—the boys going to teachers of horsemanship and the use of the bow the javelin and sling and the girls too if they do not object at any rate until they know how to manage these weapons and especially how to handle heavy arms for I may note that the practice which now prevails is almost universally misunderstood

Cle In what respect?

Ath In that the right and left hand are supposed to be by nature differently suited for our various uses of them whereas no difference is found in the use of the feet and the lower limbs but in the use of the hands we are as it were, maimed by the folly of nurses and mothers for although our several limbs are by nature balanced we create a difference in them by bad habit In some cases this is of no consequence as for example when we hold the lyre in the left hand and the plectrum in the right, but it is downright folly to make the same distinction in other cases [795] The custom of the Scythians proves our error for they not only hold the bow from them with the left hand and draw the arrow to them with their right but use either hand for both purposes. And there are many similar examples in charioteering and other things, from which we may learn that those who make the left side weaker than the right act contrary to nature In the case of the plectrum which is of horn only and

Gods, and to consecrate the several odes to Gods and heroes and if any one offers any other hymns or dances to any one of the Gods, the priests and priestesses acting in concert with the guardians of the law shall with the sanction of religion and the la v exclude him and he who is excluded if he do not submit shall be liable all his life long to have a suit of impiety brought against him by any one who likes.

Cle Very good

Ath In the consideration of this subject, let us remember what is due to ourselves.

Cle To what are you referring?

Ath I mean that any young man and much more any old one, when he sees or hears any thing strange or unaccustomed does not at once run to embrace the paradox, but he stands considering, like a person who is at a place where three paths meet and does not very well know his way—he may be alone or he may be walking w th others, and he will say to him self and them, Which is the way? and will not move f rward until he is satisfied that he is going right And this is what we must do in the present instance —A strange discussion on the subject of law has arisen which requires the utmost consideration and we should not at our age be too ready to speak about such great matters, or be confident that we can say anything certain all in a moment.

Cle Most true.

Ath Then we will allow time for reflection and decide when we have given the subject sufficient consideration But that we may not be hindered from completing the natural arrangement of our laws, let us proceed to the conclusion of them in due order for very possibly if God will the exposition of them when completed may throw l ght on our present perplexity

Cle Excellent, Stranger let us do as you propose.

Ath Let us then affirm the paradox that strains of music are our laws (μοι) [800] a d this latter be n the n me which the ancients gave to lyric songs, they probably v ould not have very much objected to our p oposed applicat on f the word Someone, e ther asleep or awake, must ha e had dreamy suspicion of their nature And let our decree be as follows —No ne in sing ng or dan ng shall off nd against public and consecr ted models, and the general fash n amon, the youth any more than he v ould offend a,ainst any other law And he who observes this law shall be blameless but he who is disobedient, as I was saying shall be punished by the guardians of the laws and by the priests and priestesses Suppose that we imagine this to be our law

Cle Very good

Ath Can any one who makes such laws escape ridicule? Let us see I think that our only safety will be in first framing certain models for composers One of these models shall be as follows —If when a sacrifice is going on and the victims are being burnt according to law —if I say any one who may be a son or brother standing by another at the altar and over the victims horribly blasphemes will not his words inspire despondency and evil omens and forebodings in the mind of his father and of his other kinsmen?

Cle Of course

Ath And this is just what takes place in almost all our cities A magistrate offers a public sacrifice and there come in not one but many choruses, who take up a position a little way from the altar and from time to time pour forth all sorts of horrible blasphemies on the sacred rites, exciting the souls of the audience with words and rhythms and melodies most sorrowful to hear and he who at the moment when the city is offering sacrifice makes the citizens weep most carries away the palm of victory Now ought we not to forbid such strains as these? And if ever our citizens must hear such lamentations then on some unblest and inauspic ous day let there be choruses of foreign and hired minstrels like those hirelings who accompany the departed at funerals with barbarous Carian chants That is the sort of thing which will be appropriate if we have such strains at all and let the apparel of the singers be, not circlets and ornaments of gold but the reverse Enough of all this I will simply ask once more whether we shall lay do n as one of our principles of song——

Cle What?

[801] Ath That we should avoid every v ord of evil omen let that k nd of song which is of good omen be heard everywhere and always in our state I need hardly ask again, but shall assume that you agree with me

Cle By all means that law is approved by the suffrages of us all

Ath But what shall be our next musical law or type? Ought not prayers to be offered up to the Gods when we sacrifice?

Cle Certainly

Ath And our third law if I am not mis-

of permanence in legislation For when plays are ordered with a view to children having the same plays and amusing themselves after the same manner and finding delight in the same playthings the more solemn institutions of the state are allowed to remain undisturbed Whereas if sports are disturbed and innovations are made in them and they constantly change and the young never speak of their having the same likings or the same established notions of good and bad taste either in the bearing of their bodies or in their dress but he who devises something new and out of the way in figures and colours and the like is held in special honour we may truly say that no greater evil can happen in a state [1] for he who changes the sports is secretly changing the manners of the young and making the old to be dishonoured among them and the new to be honoured And I affirm that there is nothing which is a greater injury to all states than saying or thinking thus Will you hear me tell how great I deem the evil to be?

Cle You mean the evil of blaming antiquity in states?

Ath Exactly

Cle If you are speaking of that you will find in us hearers who are disposed to receive what you say not unfavourably but most favourably

Ath I should expect so

Cle Proceed

Ath Well then let us give all the greater heed to one another s words The argument affirms that any change whatever except from evil is the most dangerous of all things this is true in the case of the seasons and of the winds in the management of our bodies and the habits of our minds—true of all things except as I said before of the bad He who looks at the constitution of individuals accustomed to eat any sort of meat or drink any drink or to do any work which they can get may see that they are at first disordered by them but afterwards as time goes on their bodies grow adapted to them and they learn to know and like variety and have good health and enjoyment of life [798] and if ever afterwards they are confined again to a superior diet at first they are troubled with disorders and with difficulty become habituated to their new food A similar principle we may imagine to hold good about the minds of men and the natures of their souls For when they have been brought up in certain laws which by some Divine Providence have remained unchanged during long ages so that no one has any memory or tradition of their ever having been otherwise than they are then every one is afraid and ashamed to change that which is established The legislator must somehow find a way of implanting this reverence for antiquity and I would propose the following way —People are apt to fancy as I was saying before that when the plays of children are altered they are merely plays not seeing that the most serious and detrimental consequences arise out of the change and they readily comply with the child s wishes instead of deterring him not considering that these children who make innovations in their games when they grow up to be men will be different from the last generation of children and being different, will desire a different sort of life and under the influence of this desire will want other institutions and laws and no one of them reflects that there will follow what I just now called the greatest of evils to states Changes in bodily fashions are no such serious evils but frequent changes in the praise and censure of manners are the greatest of evils and require the utmost prevision

Cle To be sure

Ath And now do we still hold to our former assertion that rhythms and music in general are imitations of good and evil characters in men? [2] What say you?

Cle That is the only doctrine which we can admit

Ath Must we not then try in every possible way to prevent our youth from even desiring to imitate new modes either in dance or song? nor must any one be allowed to offer them varieties of pleasures

Cle Most true

[799] Ath Can any of us imagine a better mode of effecting this object than that of the Egyptians?

Cle What is their method?

Ath To consecrate every sort of dance or melody First we should ordain festivals—calculating for the year what they ought to be and at what time and in honour of what Gods sons of Gods and heroes they ought to be celebrated and in the next place what hymns ought to be sung at the several sacrifices and with what dances the particular festival is to be honoured This has to be arranged at first by certain persons and when arranged the whole assembly of the citizens *are to offer sacri*fices and libations to the Fates and all the other and that which tends to courage, may be fairly called manly but that which inclines to moderation and temperance [803] may be declared both in law and in ordinary speech to be the more womanly quality. This, then, will be the general order of them.

Let us now speak of the manner of teaching and imparting them, and the persons to whom, and the time when, they are severally to be imparted. As the shipwright first lays down the lines of the keel, and thus, as it were, draws the ship in outline, so do I seek to distinguish the patterns of life, and lay down their keels according to the nature of different men's souls seeking truly to consider by what means, and in what ways, we may go through the voyage of life best. Now human affairs are hardly worth considering in earnest, and yet we must be in earnest about them—a sad necessity constrains us. And having got thus far there will be a fitness in our completing the matter if we can only find some suitable method of doing so. But what do I mean? Some one may ask this very question, and quite rightly too.

Cle. Certainly.

Ath. I say that about serious matters a man should be serious, and about a matter which is not serious he should not be serious and that God is the natural and worthy object of our most serious and blessed endeavours, for man, as I said before, is made to be the plaything of God, and this, truly considered, is the best of him, wherefore also every man and woman should walk seriously and pass life in the noblest of pastimes, and be of another mind from what they are at present.

Cle. In what respect?

Ath. At present they think that their serious pursuits should be for the sake of their sports, for they deem war a serious pursuit, which must be managed well for the sake of peace but the truth is, that there neither is, nor has been, nor ever will be, either amusement or instruction in any degree worth speaking of in war which is nevertheless deemed by us to be the most serious of our pursuits. And therefore, as we say every one of us should live the life of peace as long and as well as he can. And what is the right way of living? Are we to live in sports always? If so, in what kind of sports? We ought to live sacrificing, and singing and dancing, and then a man will be able to propitiate the Gods, and to defend himself against his enemies and conquer them in battle. The type of song or dance by which he will propitiate them has been described, and the paths along which he is to proceed have been cut for him. He will go forward in the spirit of the poet [804]

Telemachus some things thou wilt thyself find in thy heart but other things God will suggest for I deem that thou wast not born or brought up without the will of the Gods

And this ought to be the view of our alumni they ought to think that what has been said is enough for them, and that any other things their Genius and God will suggest to them—he will tell them to whom, and when and to what Gods severally they are to sacrifice and perform dances, and how they may propitiate the deities, and live according to the appointment of nature being for the most part puppets, but having some little share of reality

Megillus You have a low opinion of mankind, Stranger

Ath Nay Megillus, be not amazed, but forgive me —I was comparing them with the Gods and under that feeling I spoke. Let us grant, if you wish that the human race is not to be despised, but is worthy of some consideration.

Next follow the buildings for gymnasia and schools open to all these are to be in three places in the midst of the city and outside the city and in the surrounding country also in three places, there shall be schools for horse exercise, and large grounds arranged with a view to archery and the throwing of missiles, at which young men may learn and practise. Of these mention has already been made, and if the mention be not sufficiently explicit, let us speak further of them and embody them in laws. In these several schools let there be dwellings for teachers, who shall be brought from foreign parts by pay and let them teach those who attend the schools the art of war and the art of music, and the children shall come not only if their parents please, but if they do not please there shall be compulsory education, as the saying is, of all and sundry as far as this is possible and the pupils shall be regarded as belonging to the state rather than to their parents. My law would apply to females as well as males they shall both go through the same exercises I assert without fear of contradiction that gymnastic and horsemanship are as suitable to women as to men. Of the truth of this taken will be to the effect that our poets un derstanding prayers to be requests which we make to the Gods, will take especial heed that they do not by mistake ask for evil instead of good To make such a prayer would surely be too ridiculous

Cle Very true.

Ath Were we not a little while ago quite convinced that no silver or golden Plutus should dwell in our state?

Cle To be sure

Ath And what has it been the object of our argument to show? Did we not imply that the poets are not always quite capable of knowing what is good or evil? And if one of them utters a mistaken prayer in song or words, he will make our citizens pray for the opposite of what is good in matters of the highest import than which as I was saying there can be few greater mistakes Shall we then propose as one of our laws and models relating to the Muses——

Cle What?—will you explain the law more precisely?

Ath Shall we make a law that the poet shall compose nothing contrary to the ideas of the lawful or just or beautiful or good which are allowed in the state? nor shall he be permitted to communicate his compositions to any pri vate individuals until he shall have shown them to the appointed judges and the guardians of the law and they are satisfied with them As to the persons whom we appoint to be our legislators about music and as to the director of education these have been already indi cated Once more then as I have asked more than once shall this be our third law and type, and model—What do you say?

Cle Let it be so by all means

Ath Then it will be proper to have hymns and praises of the Gods intermingled with prayers and after the Gods prayers and praises should be offered in like manner to demigods and heroes suitable to their several characters

Cle Certainly

Ath In the next place there will be no objec tion to a law that citizens who are departed and have done good and energetic deeds either with their souls or with their bodies and have been obedient to the laws should receive eulo- gies this will be very fitting

[802] Cle Quite true

Ath But to honour with hymns and pane gyrics those who are still alive is not safe a man should run his course and make a fair ending and then we will praise him and let praise be given equally to women as well as men who have been distinguished in virtue. The order of songs and dances shall be as fol lows —There are many ancient musical com positions and dances which are excellent and from these the newly founded city may freely select what is proper and suitable and they shall choose judges of not less than fifty years of age who shall make the selection and any of the old poems which they deem sufficient they shall include any that are deficient or al together unsuitable, they shall either utterly throw aside, or examine and amend taking into their counsel poets and musicians and making use of their poetical genius but ex plaining to them the wishes of the legislator in order that they may regulate dancing music, and all choral strains according to the mind of the judges and not allowing them to indulge, except in some few matters their individual pleasures and fancies Now the irregular strain of music is always made ten thousand times better by attaining to law and order and reject ing the honeyed Muse—not however that we mean wholly to exclude pleasure which is the characteristic of all music And if a man be brought up from childhood to the age of dis- cretion and maturity in the use of the orderly and severe music when he hears the opposite he detests it and calls it illiberal but if trained in the sweet and vulgar music he deems the severer kind cold and displeasing So that as I was saying before while he who hears them gains no more pleasure from the one than from the other the one has the advantage of making those who are trained in it better men whereas the other makes them worse

Cle Very true

Ath Again we must distinguish and deter mine on some general principle what songs are suitable to women and what to men and must assign to them their proper melodies and rhythms It is shocking for a whole harmony to be inharmonical or for a rhythm to be un rhythmical and this will happen when the melody is inappropriate to them And there fore the legislator must assign to these also their forms Now both sexes have melodies and rhythms which of necessity belong to them and those of women are clearly enough indi cated by their natural difference. The grand no work remaining to be done which is necessary and fitting, but shall each one of them live fattening like a beast? Such a life is neither just nor honourable, nor can he who lives it fail of meeting his due; and the due reward of the idle fatted beast is that he should be torn in pieces by some other valiant beast whose fatness is worn down by brave deeds and toil. These regulations, if we duly consider them, will never be exactly carried into execution under present circumstances, nor as long as women and children and houses and all other things are the private property of individuals; but if we can attain the second-best form of polity we shall be very well off. And to men living under this second polity there remains a work to be accomplished which is far from being small or insignificant, but is the greatest of all works, and ordained by the appointment of righteous law. For the life which may be truly said to be concerned with the virtue of body and soul is twice, or more than twice, as full of toil and trouble as the pursuit after Pythian and Olympic victories, which debars a man from every employment of life. For there ought to be no bye-work interfering with the greater work of providing the necessary exercise and nourishment for the body, and instruction and education for the soul. Night and day are not long enough for the accomplishment of their perfection and consummation; and therefore to this end all freemen ought to arrange the way in which they will spend their time during the whole course of the day, from morning till evening and from evening till the morning of the next sunrise. There may seem to be some impropriety in the legislator determining minutely the numberless details of the management of the house, including such particulars as the duty of wakefulness in those who are to be perpetual watchmen of the whole city; for that any citizen should continue during the whole of any night in sleep, [808] instead of being seen by all his servants, always the first to awake and get up—this, whether the regulation is to be called a law or only a practice, should be deemed base and unworthy of a free man; also that the mistress of the house should be awakened by her handmaidens instead of herself first awakening them, is what the slaves, male and female, and the serving-boys, and, if that were possible, everybody and everything in the house should regard as base. If they rise early, they may all of them do much of their public and of their household business, as magistrates in the city, and masters and mistresses in their private houses, before the sun is up. Much sleep is not required by nature, either for our souls or bodies, or for the actions which they perform. For no one who is asleep is good for anything, any more than if he were dead; but he of us who has the most regard for life and reason keeps awake as long as he can, reserving only so much time for sleep as is expedient for health; and much sleep is not required, if the habit of moderation be once rightly formed. Magistrates in states who keep awake at night are terrible to the bad, whether enemies or citizens, and are honoured and reverenced by the just and temperate, and are useful to themselves and to the whole state.

A night which is passed in such a manner, in addition to all the above-mentioned advantages, infuses a sort of courage into the minds of the citizens. When the day breaks, the time has arrived for youth to go to their schoolmasters. Now neither sheep nor any other animals can live without a shepherd, nor can children be left without tutors, or slaves without masters. And of all animals the boy is the most unmanageable, inasmuch as he has the fountain of reason in him not yet regulated; he is the most insidious, sharp-witted, and insubordinate of animals. Wherefore he must be bound with many bridles; in the first place, when he gets away from mothers and nurses, he must be under the management of tutors on account of his childishness and foolishness; then, again, being a freeman, he must be controlled by teachers, no matter what they teach, and by studies; but he is also a slave, and in that regard any freeman who comes in his way may punish him and his tutor and his instructor, if any of them does anything wrong; and he who comes across him and does not inflict upon him the punishment which he deserves, [809] shall incur the greatest disgrace; and let the guardian of the law, who is the director of education, see to him who coming in the way of the offences which we have mentioned, does not chastise them when he ought, or chastises them in a way which he ought not; let him keep a sharp look-out, and take especial care of the training of our children, directing their natures, and always turning them to good according to the law.

But how can our law sufficiently train the director of education himself; for as yet all has been imperfect, and nothing has been said either clear or satisfactory? Now, as far as pos-

I am persuaded from ancient tradition and at the present day there are said to be countless myriads of women in the neighbourhood of the Black Sea called Sauromatides who not only ride on horseback like men [805] but have enjoined upon them the use of bows and other weapons equally with the men And I further affirm that if these things are possible nothing can be more absurd than the practice which prevails in our own country of men and women not following the same pursuits with all their strength and with one mind for thus the state instead of being a whole is reduced to a half [2] but has the same imposts to pay and the same toils to undergo and what can be a greater mistake for any legislator to make than this?

Cle Very true yet much of what has been asserted by us Stranger is contrary to the custom of states still in saying that the discourse should be allowed to proceed and that when the discussion is completed we should choose what seems best you spoke very properly and I now feel compunction for what I have said Tell me then what you would next wish to say

Ath I should wish to say Cleinias as I said before that if the possibility of these things were not sufficiently proven in fact then there might be an objection to the argument, but the fact being as I have said, he who rejects the law must find some other ground of objection and failing this our exhortation will still hold good nor will any one deny that women ought to share as far as possible in education and in other ways with men For consider —if women do not share in their whole life with men then they must have some other order of life

Cle Certainly

Ath And what arrangement of life to be found anywhere is preferable to this community which we are now assigning to them? Shall we prefer that which is adopted by the Thracians and many other races who use their women to till the ground and to be shepherds of their herds and flocks and to minister to them like slaves?—Or shall we do as we and people in our part of the world do—getting together as the phrase is all our goods and chattels into one dwelling we entrust them to our women who are the stewards of them and who also preside over the shuttles and the whole art of spinning? [806] Or shall we take a middle course as in Lacedaemon Megillus—letting the girls share in gymnastic and music while the grown up women no longer employed in spinning wool are hard at work weaving the web of life which will be no cheap or mean employment and in the duty of serving and taking care of the household and bringing up children in which they will observe a sort of mean not participating in the toils of war and if there were any necessity that they should fight for their city and families unlike the Amazons they would be unable to take part in archery or any other skilled use of missiles nor could they after the example of the Goddess, carry shield or spear or stand up nobly for their country when it was being destroyed and strike terror into their enemies if only because they were seen in regular order? Living as they do they would never dare at all to imitate the Sauromatides who when compared with ordinary women would appear to be like men Let him who will praise your legislators but I must say what I think The legislator ought to be whole and perfect and not half a man only he ought not to let the female sex live softly and waste money and have no order of life while he takes the utmost care of the male sex and leaves half of life only blest with happiness when he might have made the whole state happy

Meg What shall we do Cleinias? Shall we allow a stranger to run down Sparta in this fashion?

Cle Yes for as we have given him liberty of speech we must let him go on until we have perfected the work of legislation

Meg Very true

Ath Then now I may proceed?

Cle By all means

Ath What will be the manner of life among men who may be supposed to have their food and clothing provided for them in moderation and who have entrusted the practice of the arts to others and whose husbandry committed to slaves paying a part of the produce brings them a return sufficient for men living temperately who moreover have common tables in which the men are placed apart and near them are the common tables of their families of their daughters and mothers which day by day the officers male and female are to inspect—they shall see to the behaviour of the company and so dismiss them after which the presiding magistrate and his attendants shall honour with libations those Gods [807] to whom that day and night are dedicated and then go home? To men whose lives are thus ordered is there you want me now to tell them plainly in what they are right and in what they are wrong

Cle Yes, I do

Ath But how can I in one word rightly comprehend all of them? I am of opinion and if I am not mistaken there is a general agreement, that every one of these poets has said many things well and many things the reverse of well and if this be true, then I do affirm that much learning is dangerous to youth

Cle How would you advise the guardian of the law to act?

Ath In what respect?

Cle I mean to what pattern should he look as his guide in permitting the young to learn some things and forbidding them to learn others Do not shrink from answering

Ath My good Cleinias I rather think that I am fortunate.

Cle How so?

Ath I think that I am not wholly in want of a pattern, for when I consider the words which we have spoken from early dawn until now and which, as I believe, have been inspired by Heaven, they appear to me to be quite like a poem. When I reflected upon all these words of ours, I naturally felt pleasure, for of all the discourses which I have ever learnt or heard either in poetry or prose, this seemed to me to be the justest, and most suitable for young men to hear I cannot imagine any better pattern than this which the guardian of the law who is also the director of education can have He cannot do better than advise the teachers to teach the young these words and any which are of a like nature if he should happen to find them, either in poetry or prose, or if he come across unwritten discourses akin to ours, he should certainly preserve them, and commit them to writing And first of all he shall constrain the teachers themselves to learn and approve them, and any of them who will not, shall not be employed by him but those whom he finds agreeing in his judgment he shall make use of and shall commit to them the instruction and education of youth [812] And here and on this wise let my fanciful tale about letters and teachers of letters come to an end

Cl I do not think Stranger that we have wandered out of the proposed limits of the argument but whether we are right or not in our whole conception I cannot be very certain

Ath The truth Cleinias may be expected to become clearer when as we have often said we arrive at the end of the whole discussion about laws.

Cle Yes.

Ath And now that we have done with the teacher of letters, the teacher of the lyre has to receive orders from us

Cle Certainly

Ath I think that we have only to recollect our previous discussions, and we shall be able to give suitable regulations touching all this part of instruction and education to the teachers of the lyre

Cle To what do you refer?

Ath We were saying if I remember rightly that the sixty year-old choristers of Dionysus were to be specially quick in their perceptions of rhythm and musical composition that they might be able to distinguish good and bad imitation that is to say the imitation of the good or bad soul when under the influence of passion, rejecting the one and displaying the other in hymns and songs charming the souls of youth and inviting them to follow and attain virtue by the way of imitation[1]

Cle Very true

Ath And with this view the teacher and the learner ought to use the sounds of the lyre because its notes are pure the player who teaches and his pupil rendering note for note in unison but complexity and variation of notes, when the strings give one sound and the poet or composer of the melody gives another—also when they make concords and harmonies in which lesser and greater intervals, slow and quick, or high and low notes, are combined—or again when they make complex variations of rhythms which they adapt to the notes of the lyre[2]—all that sort of thing is not suited to those who have to acquire a speedy and useful knowledge of music in three years for opposite principles are confusing and create a difficulty in learning and our young men should learn quickly and their mere necessary acquirements are not few or trifling as will be shown in due course Let the director of education attend to the principles concerning music which we are laying down As to the songs and words themselves which the masters of choruses are to teach and the character of them [813] they have been already described by us,[3] and are the same which when consecrated and adapted to the different festivals we said were to benefit cities by affording them an innocent amusement.

Cle That again is true.

sible the law ought to leave nothing to him but to explain everything that he may be an interpreter and tutor to others About dances and music and choral strains I have already spoken both as to the character of the selection of them and the manner in which they are to be amended and consecrated But we have not as yet spoken O illustrious guardian of education of the manner in which your pupils are to use those strains which are written in prose although you have been informed what martial strains they are to learn and practise what relates in the first place to the learning of letters and secondly to the lyre, and also to calculation which as we were saying [1] is needful for them all to learn and any other things which are required with a view to war and the management of house and city and looking to the same object what is useful in the revolutions of the heavenly bodies—the stars and sun and moon and the various regulations about these matters which are necessary for the whole state—I am speaking of the arrangements of days in periods of months and of months in years which are to be observed in order that seasons and sacrifices and festivals may have their regular and natural order, and keep the city alive and awake the Gods receiving the honours due to them and men having a better understanding about them all these things O my friend have not yet been sufficiently declared to you by the legislator Attend then to what I am now going to say — We were telling you in the first place that you were not sufficiently informed about letters, and the objection was to this effect—that you were never told whether he who was meant to be a respectable citizen should apply himself in detail to that sort of learning or not apply himself at all and the same remark holds good of the study of the lyre But now we say that he ought to attend to them [810] A fair time for a boy of ten years old to spend in letters is three years the age of thirteen is the proper time for him to begin to handle the lyre and he may continue at this for another three years neither more nor less and whether his father or himself like or dislike the study he is not to be allowed to spend more or less time in learning music than the law allows And let him who disobeys the law be deprived of those youthful honours of which we shall hereafter speak Hear however first of all what the young ought to learn in the early years of life, and what their instructors ought to teach them They ought to be occupied with their letters until they are able to read and write but the acquisition of perfect beauty or quickness in writing if nature has not stimulated them to acquire these accomplishments in the given number of years they should let alone And as to the learning of compositions committed to writing which are not set to the lyre, whether metrical or without rhythmical divisions, compositions in prose as they are termed, having no rhythm or harmony—seeing how dangerous are the writings handed down to us by many writers of this class—what will you do with them, O most excellent guardians of the law? or how can the lawgiver rightly direct you about them? I believe that he will be in great difficulty

Cle What troubles you Stranger? and why are you so perplexed in your mind?

Ath You naturally ask, Cleinias and to you and Megillus who are my partners in the work of legislation I must state the more difficult as well as the easier parts of the task

Cle To what do you refer in this instance?

Ath I will tell you There is a difficulty in opposing many myriads of mouths

Cle Well and have we not already opposed the popular voice in many important enactments?

Ath That is quite true and you mean to imply that the road which we are taking may be disagreeable to some but is agreeable to as many others or if not to as many, at any rate to persons not inferior to the others and in company with them you bid me at whatever risk to proceed along the path of legislation which has opened out of our present discourse, and to be of good cheer and not to faint

Cle Certainly

Ath And I do not faint I say indeed that we have a great many poets writing in hexameter trimeter and all sorts of measures—some who are serious others who aim only at raising a laugh—and all mankind declare that the youth who are rightly educated should be brought up in them and saturated with them some insist that they should be constantly hearing them read aloud [811] and always learning them so as to get by heart entire poets while others select choice passages and long speeches and make compendiums of them saying that these ought to be committed to memory if a man is to be made good and wise by experience and learning of many things And you want me now to tell them plainly in what they are right and in what they are wrong.

Cle. Yes, I do.

Ath. But how can I in one word rightly comprehend all of them? I am of opinion, and, if I am not mistaken, there is a general agreement, that every one of these poets has said many things well and many things the reverse of well; and if this be true, then I do affirm that much learning is dangerous to youth.

Cle. How would you advise the guardian of the law to act?

Ath. In what respect?

Cle. I mean to what pattern should he look as his guide in permitting the young to learn some things and forbidding them to learn others. Do not shrink from answering.

Ath. My good Cleinias, I rather think that I am fortunate.

Cle. How so?

Ath. I think that I am not wholly in want of a pattern, for when I consider the words which we have spoken from early dawn until now, and which, as I believe, have been inspired by Heaven, they appear to me to be quite like a poem. When I reflected upon all these words of ours, I naturally felt pleasure, for of all the discourses which I have ever learnt or heard, either in poetry or prose, this seemed to me to be the justest, and most suitable for young men to hear. I cannot imagine any better pattern than this which the guardian of the law who is also the director of education can have. He cannot do better than advise the teachers to teach the young these words and any which are of a like nature, if he should happen to find them, either in poetry or prose, or if he come across unwritten discourses akin to ours, he should certainly preserve them, and commit them to writing. And, first of all, he shall constrain the teachers themselves to learn and approve them, and any of them who will not, shall not be employed by him, but those whom he finds agreeing in his judgment, he shall make use of and shall commit to them the instruction and education of youth. [812] And here and on this wise let my fanciful tale about letters and teachers of letters come to an end.

Cle. I do not think, Stranger, that we have wandered out of the proposed limits of the argument; but whether we are right or not in our whole conception, I cannot be very certain.

Ath. The truth, Cleinias, may be expected to become clearer when, as we have often said, we arrive at the end of the whole discussion about laws.

Cle. Yes.

Ath. And now that we have done with the teacher of letters, the teacher of the lyre has to receive orders from us.

Cle. Certainly.

Ath. I think that we have only to recollect our previous discussions, and we shall be able to give suitable regulations touching all this part of instruction and education to the teachers of the lyre.

Cle. To what do you refer?

Ath. We were saying, if I remember rightly, that the sixty-year-old choristers of Dionysus were to be specially quick in their perceptions of rhythm and musical composition, that they might be able to distinguish good and bad imitation, that is to say, the imitation of the good or bad soul when under the influence of passion, rejecting the one and displaying the other in hymns and songs, charming the souls of youth, and inviting them to follow and attain virtue by the way of imitation.

Cle. Very true.

Ath. And with this view the teacher and the learner ought to use the sounds of the lyre, because its notes are pure, the player who teaches and his pupil rendering note for note in unison; but complexity and variation of notes, when the strings give one sound and the poet or composer of the melody gives another—also when they make concords and harmonies in which lesser and greater intervals, slow and quick, or high and low notes, are combined—or again, when they make complex variations of rhythms, which they adapt to the notes of the lyre—all that sort of thing is not suited to those who have to acquire a speedy and useful knowledge of music in three years; for opposite principles are confusing, and create a difficulty in learning, and our young men should learn quickly, and their mere necessary acquirements are not few or trifling, as will be shown in due course. Let the director of education attend to the principles concerning music which we are laying down. As to the songs and words themselves which the masters of choruses are to teach and the character of them, [813] they have been already described by us, and are the same which, when consecrated and adapted to the different festivals, we said were to benefit cities by affording them an innocent amusement.

Cle. That, again, is true.

Ath Then let him who has been elected a director of music receive these rules from us as containing the very truth and may he prosper in his office! Let us now proceed to lay down other rules in addition to the preceding about dancing and gymnastic exercise in general Having said what remained to be said about the teaching of music, let us speak in like manner about gymnastic For boys and girls ought to learn to dance and practise gymnastic exercises—ought they not?

Cle Yes

Ath Then the boys ought to have dancing masters and the girls dancing mistresses to exercise them

Cle Very good

Ath Then once more let us summon him who has the chief concern in the business, the superintendent of youth [i e the director of education] he will have plenty to do if he is to have the charge of music and gymnastic

Cle But how will an old man be able to attend to such great charges?

Ath O my friend there will be no difficulty for the law has already given and will give him permission to select as his assistants in this charge any citizens male or female whom he desires and he will know whom he ought to choose and will be anxious not to make a mistake from a due sense of responsibility and from a consciousness of the importance of his office and also because he will consider that if young men have been and are well brought up then all things go swimmingly, but if not, it is not meet to say nor do we say what will follow lest the regarders of omens should take alarm about our infant state Many things have been said by us about dancing and about gymnastic movements in general for we include under gymnastics all military exercises such as archery and all hurling of weapons and the use of the light shield and all fighting with heavy arms and military evolutions and movements of armies and encampings and all that relates to horsemanship Of all these things there ought to be public teachers receiving pay from the state and their pupils should be the men and boys in the state and also the girls and women, who are to know all these things While they are yet girls they should have practised dancing in arms and the whole art of fighting—when grown up women [814] they should apply themselves to evolutions and tactics and the mode of grounding and taking up arms if for no other reason yet in case the whole military force should have to leave the city and carry on operations of war outside, that those who will have to guard the young and the rest of the city may be equal to the task and on the other hand when enemies whether barbarian or Hellenic come from without with mighty force and make a violent assault upon them and thus compel them to fight for the possession of the city which is far from being an impossibility great would be the disgrace to the state if the women had been so miserably trained that they could not fight for their young as birds will against any creature however strong and die or undergo any danger but must instantly rush to the temples and crowd at the altars and shrines and bring upon human nature the reproach that of all animals man is the most cowardly!

Cle Such a want of education Stranger is certainly an unseemly thing to happen in a state as well as a great misfortune

Ath Suppose that we carry our law to the extent of saying that women ought not to neglect military matters but that all citizens male and female alike shall attend to them?

Cle I quite agree

Ath Of wrestling we have spoken in part but of what I should call the most important part we have not spoken and cannot easily speak without showing at the same time by gesture as well as in word what we mean when word and action combine and not till then we shall explain clearly what has been said pointing out that of all movements wrestling is most akin to the military art and is to be pursued for the sake of this and not this for the sake of wrestling

Cle Excellent

Ath Enough of wrestling we will now proceed to speak of other movements of the body Such motion may be in general called dancing and is of two kinds one of nobler figures imitating the honourable the other of the more ignoble figures imitating the mean and of both these there are two further subdivisions Of the serious one kind is of those engaged in war and vehement action and is the exercise of a noble person and a manly heart the other exhibits a temperate soul in the enjoyment of prosperity and modest pleasures [815] and may be truly called and is the dance of peace The warrior dance is different from the peaceful one and may be rightly termed Pyrrhic this imitates the modes of avoiding blows and missiles by dropping or giving way or springing aside or rising up or falling down also the opposite postures which are those of action, as, for example, the imitation of archery and the hurling of javelins, and of all sorts of blows. And when the imitation is of brave bodies and souls, and the action is direct and muscular, giving for the most part a straight movement to the limbs of the body—that, I say, is the true sort; but the opposite is not right. In the dance of peace what we have to consider is whether a man bears himself naturally and gracefully, and after the manner of men who duly conform to the law. But before proceeding I must distinguish the dancing about which there is any doubt, from that about which there is no doubt. Which is the doubtful kind, and how are the two to be distinguished? There are dances of the Bacchic sort, both those in which, as they say, they imitate drunken men, and which are named after the Nymphs, and Pan, and Silenuses, and Satyrs; and also those in which purifications are made or mysteries celebrated—all this sort of dancing cannot be rightly defined as having either a peaceful or a warlike character, or indeed as having any meaning whatever and may, I think, be most truly described as distinct from the warlike dance, and distinct from the peaceful, and not suited for a city at all. There let it lie; and so leaving it to lie, we will proceed to the dances of war and peace, for with these we are undoubtedly concerned. Now the unwarlike muse, which honours in dance the Gods and the sons of the Gods, is entirely associated with the consciousness of prosperity; this class may be subdivided into two lesser classes, of which one is expressive of an escape from some labour or danger into good, and has greater pleasures, the other expressive of preservation and increase of former good, in which the pleasure is less exciting;—in all these cases, every man when the pleasure is greater moves his body more, and less when the pleasure is less; and, again, if he be more orderly and has learned courage from discipline he moves less, [816] but if he be a coward, and has no training or self-control, he makes greater and more violent movements, and in general when he is speaking or singing he is not altogether able to keep his body still; and so out of the imitation of words in gestures the whole art of dancing has arisen. And in these various kinds of imitation one man moves in an orderly, another in a disorderly manner; and as the ancients may be observed to have given many names which are according to nature and deserving of praise, so there is an excellent one which they have given to the dances of men who in their times of prosperity are moderate in their pleasures—the giver of names, whoever he was, assigned to them a very true, and poetical, and rational name, when he called them Emmeleiai, or dances of order, thus establishing two kinds of dances of the nobler sort, the dance of war which he called the Pyrrhic, and the dance of peace which he called Emmeleia, or the dance of order; giving to each their appropriate and becoming name. These things the legislator should indicate in general outline, and the guardian of the law should enquire into them and search them out, combining dancing with music, and assigning to the several sacrificial feasts that which is suitable to them; and when he has consecrated all of them in due order, he shall for the future change nothing, whether of dance or song. Thenceforward the city and the citizens shall continue to have the same pleasures, themselves being, as far as possible alike, and shall live well and happily.

I have described the dances which are appropriate to noble bodies and generous souls. But it is necessary also to consider and know uncomely persons and thoughts, and those which are intended to produce laughter in comedy, and have a comic character in respect of style, song, and dance, and of the imitations which these afford. For serious things cannot be understood without laughable things, nor opposites at all without opposites, if a man is really to have intelligence of either; but he cannot carry out both in action, if he is to have any degree of virtue. And for this very reason he should learn them both, in order that he may not in ignorance do or say anything which is ridiculous and out of place—he should command slaves and hired strangers to imitate such things, but he should never take any serious interest in them himself, nor should any freeman or freewoman be discovered taking pains to learn them; and there should always be some element of novelty in the imitation. Let these then be laid down, both in law and in our discourse, as the regulations of laughable amusements which are generally called [817] comedy. And, if any of the serious poets, as they are termed, who write tragedy, come to us and say—"O strangers, may we go to your city and country or may we not, and shall we bring with us our poetry—what is your will about these matters?"—how shall we answer the divine men? I think that our answer should be as fol-dren, which they learn as a pleasure and amusement. They have to distribute apples and garlands, using the same number sometimes for a larger and sometimes for a lesser number of persons and they arrange pugilists and wrestlers as they pair together by lot or remain over and show how their turns come in natural order Another mode of amusing them is to distribute vessels, sometimes of gold, brass, silver and the like, intermixed with one another sometimes of one metal only as I was saying they adapt to their amusement the numbers in common use, and in this way make more intelligible to their pupils the arrangements and movements of armies and expeditions, and in the management of a household they make people more useful to themselves, and more wide awake and again in measurements of things which have length, and breadth, and depth, they free us from that natural ignorance of all these things which is so ludicrous and disgraceful.

Cle What kind of ignorance do you mean?

Ath O my dear Cleinias, I like yourself have late in life heard with amazement of our ignorance in these matters to me we appear to be more like pigs than men, and I am quite ashamed, not only of myself but of all Hellenes.

Cle About what? Say Stranger what you mean

Ath I will or rather I will show you my meaning by a question, and do you please to answer me You know I suppose, what length is?

Cle Certainly

Ath And what breadth is?

Cle To be sure.

Ath And you know that these are two distinct things, and that there is a third thing called depth?

Cle Of course

Ath And do not all these seem to you to be commensurable with themselves?

Cle Yes

Ath That is to say length is naturally commensurable with length [820] and breadth with breadth, and depth in like manner with depth?

Cle Undoubtedly

Ath But if some things are commensurable and other wholly incommensurable, and you think that all things are commensurable, what is your position in regard to them?

Cle Clearly far from good.

Ath Concerning length and breadth when compared with depth or breadth and length when compared with one another are not all the Hellenes agreed that these are commensurable with one another in some way?

Cle Quite true.

Ath But if they are absolutely incommensurable, and yet all of us regard them as commensurable, have we not reason to be ashamed of our compatriots and might we not say to them —O ye best of Hellenes, is not this one of the things of which we were saying that not to know them is disgraceful and of which to have a bare knowledge only is no great distinction?

Cle Certainly

Ath And there are other things akin to these, in which there spring up other errors of the same family

Cle What are they?

Ath The natures of commensurable and incommensurable quantities in their relation to one another A man who is good for anything ought to be able, when he thinks to distinguish them and different persons should compete with one another in asking questions, which will be a far better and more graceful way of passing their time than the old man's game of draughts.

Cle I dare say and these pastimes are not so very unlike a game of draughts

Ath And these as I maintain Cleinias are the studies which our youth ought to learn for they are innocent and not difficult the learning of them will be an amusement, and they will benefit the state If any one is of another mind, let him say what he has to say

Cle Certainly

Ath Then if these studies are such as we maintain we will include them if not, they shall be excluded

Cle Assuredly but may we not now Stranger prescribe these studies as necessary and so fill up the lacunae of our laws?

Ath They shall be regarded as pledges which may be hereafter redeemed and removed from our state if they do not please either us who give them or you who accept them

Cle A fair condition

Ath Next let us see whether we are or are not willing that the study of astronomy shall be proposed for our youth

Cle Proceed.

Ath Here occurs a strange phenomenon which certainly cannot in any point of view be tolerated

lows —Best of strangers we will say to them we also according to our ability are tragic poets and our tragedy is the best and noblest for our whole state is an imitation of the best and noblest life which we affirm to be indeed the very truth of tragedy You are poets and we are poets both makers of the same strains rivals and antagonists in the noblest of dramas which true law can alone perfect as our hope is Do not then suppose that we shall all in a moment allow you to erect your stage in the agora or introduce the fair voices of your actors speaking above our own and permit you to harangue our women and children and the common people about our institutions in language other than our own, and very often the opposite of our own For a state would be mad which gave you this licence until the magistrates had determined whether your poetry might be recited and was fit for publication or not Wherefore O ye sons and scions of the softer Muses first of all show your songs to the magistrates and let them compare them with our own and if they are the same or better we will give you a chorus but if not then my friends we cannot Let these then be the customs ordained by law about all dances and the teaching of them and let matters relating to slaves be separated from those relating to masters if you do not object

[1] Cle We can have no hesitation in assenting when you put the matter thus

Ath There still remain three studies suitable for freemen Arithmetic is one of them the measurement of length surface and depth is the second and the third has to do with the revolutions of the stars in relation to one another [818] Not every one has need to toil through all these things in a strictly scientific manner but only a few and who they are to be we will hereafter indicate at the end which will be the proper place not to know what is necessary for mankind in general and what is the truth is disgraceful to every one and yet to enter into these matters minutely is neither easy, nor at all possible for every one but there is something in them which is necessary and cannot be set aside and probably he who made the proverb about God originally had this in view when he said that not even God himself can fight against necessity —he meant, if I am not mistaken divine necessity for as to the human necessities of which the many speak when they talk in this manner nothing can be more ridiculous than such an application of the words

Cle And what necessities of knowledge are there Stranger, which are divine and not human?

Ath I conceive them to be those of which he who has no use nor any knowledge at all cannot be a God or demi god or hero to mankind or able to take any serious thought or charge of them And very unlike a divine man would he be who is unable to count one two three, or to distinguish odd and even numbers or is unable to count at all or reckon night and day and who is totally unacquainted with the revolution of the sun and moon and the other stars There would be great folly in supposing that all these are not necessary parts of knowledge to him who intends to know anything about the highest kinds of knowledge [4] but which these are and how many there are of them and when they are to be learned, and what is to be learned together and what apart and the whole correlation of them must be rightly apprehended first and these leading the way we may proceed to the other parts of knowledge. For so necessity grounded in nature constrains us against which we say that no God contends or ever will contend

Cle I think Stranger, that what you have now said is very true and agreeable to nature

Ath Yes Cleinias that is so But it is difficult for the legislator to begin with these studies at a more convenient time we will make regulations for them

Cle You seem Stranger to be afraid of our habitual ignorance of the subject [819] there is no reason why that should prevent you from speaking out

Ath I certainly am afraid of the difficulties to which you allude but I am still more afraid of those who apply themselves to this sort of knowledge and apply themselves badly For entire ignorance is not so terrible or extreme an evil and is far from being the greatest of all too much cleverness and too much learning accompanied with an ill bringing up are far more fatal

Cle True

Ath All freemen I conceive, should learn as much of these branches of knowledge as every child in Egypt is taught when he learns the alphabet In that country arithmetical games have been invented for the use of mere chil who passes through life undefiled and is obedient to the words of the legislator both when he is giving laws and when he assigns praise and blame. This is the truest word that can be spoken in praise of a citizen; and the true legislator ought not only to write his laws, but also to interweave with them all such things as seem to him honourable and dishonourable. And the perfect citizen ought to seek to strengthen these no less than the principles of law which are sanctioned by punishments. I will adduce an example which will clear up my meaning, and will be a sort of witness to my words. Hunting is of wide extent, and has a name under which many things are included, for there is a hunting of creatures in the water, and of creatures in the air, and there is a great deal of hunting of land animals of all kinds, and not of wild beasts only. The hunting after man is also worthy of consideration; there is the hunting after him in war, and there is often a hunting after him in the way of friendship, which is praised and also blamed; and there is thieving, and the hunting which is practised by robbers, and that of armies against armies. Now the legislator, in laying down laws about hunting, can neither abstain from noting these things, nor can he make threatening ordinances which will assign rules and penalties about all of them. What is he to do? He will have to praise and blame hunting with a view to the exercise and pursuits of youth. And, on the other hand, the young man must listen obediently; neither pleasure nor pain should hinder him, and he should regard as his standard of action the praises and injunctions of the legislator rather than the punishments which he imposes by law. This being premised, there will follow next in order moderate praise and censure of hunting; the praise being assigned to that kind which will make the souls of young men better, and the censure to that which has the opposite effect.

And now let us address young men in the form of a prayer for their welfare: O friends, we will say to them, may no desire or love of hunting in the sea, or of angling or of catching the creatures in the waters, ever take possession of you, either when you are awake or when you are asleep, by hook or with weels, which latter is a very lazy contrivance; and let not any desire of catching men and of piracy by sea enter into your souls and make you cruel and lawless hunters. And as to the desire of thieving in town or country, may it never enter into your most passing thoughts; nor let the insidious fancy of catching birds, which is hardly worthy of freemen, come into the head of any youth. [824] There remains therefore for our athletes only the hunting and catching of land animals, of which the one sort is called hunting by night, in which the hunters sleep in turn and are lazy; this is not to be commended any more than that which has intervals of rest, in which the wild strength of beasts is subdued by nets and snares, and not by the victory of a laborious spirit. Thus, only the best kind of hunting is allowed at all—that of quadrupeds, which is carried on with horses and dogs and men's own persons, and they get the victory over the animals by running them down and striking them and hurling at them, those who have a care of godlike manhood taking them with their own hands. The praise and blame which is assigned to all these things has now been declared; and let the law be as follows:—Let no one hinder these who verily are sacred hunters from following the chase wherever and whithersoever they will; but the hunter by night, who trusts to his nets and gins, shall not be allowed to hunt anywhere. The fowler in the mountains and waste places shall be permitted, but on cultivated ground and on consecrated wilds he shall not be permitted; and any one who meets him may stop him. As to the hunter in waters, he may hunt anywhere except in harbours or sacred streams or marshes or pools, provided only that he do not pollute the water with poisonous juices. And now we may say that all our enactments about education are complete.

Cle. Very good.

BOOK VIII

[828] Athenian Stranger. Next, with the help of the Delphian oracle, we have to institute festivals and make laws about them, and to determine what sacrifices will be for the good of the city, and to what Gods they shall be offered; but when they shall be offered, and how often, may be partly regulated by us.

Clinias. The number—yes.

Ath. Then we will first determine the number; and let the whole number be 365—one for every day—so that one magistrate at least will sacrifice daily to some God or demi-god on behalf of the city, and the citizens, and their possessions. And the interpreters, and priests, and priestesses, and prophets shall meet, and, in company with the guardians of the law, ordain those things which the legislator of necessity

[821] Cle To what are you referring?

Ath Men say that we ought not to enquire into the supreme God and the nature of the universe nor busy ourselves in searching out the causes of things and that such enquiries are impious whereas the very opposite is the truth

Cle What do you mean?

Ath Perhaps what I am saying may seem paradoxical and at variance with the usual language of age But when any one has any good and true notion which is for the advantage of the state and in every way acceptable to God he cannot abstain from expressing it

Cle Your words are reasonable enough but shall we find any good or true notion about the stars?

Ath My good friends at this hour all of us Hellenes tell lies if I may use such an expression about those great Gods the Sun and the Moon

Cle Lies of what nature?

Ath We say that they and divers other stars do not keep the same path and we call them planets or wanderers

Cle Very true Stranger and in the course of my life I have often myself seen the morning star and the evening star and divers others not moving in their accustomed course but wandering out of their path in all manner of ways and I have seen the sun and moon doing what we all know that they do

Ath Just so Megillus and Cleinias and I maintain that our citizens and our youth ought to learn about the nature of the Gods in heaven so far as to be able to offer sacrifices and pray to them in pious language and not to blaspheme about them

Cle There you are right if such a knowledge be only attainable and if we are wrong in our mode of speaking now and can be better instructed and learn to use better language then I quite agree with you that such a degree of knowledge as will enable us to speak rightly should be acquired by us And now do you try to explain to us your whole meaning and we on our part, will endeavour to understand you

Ath There is some difficulty in understanding my meaning but not a very great one nor will any great length of time be required And of this I am myself a proof for I did not know these things long ago nor in the days of my youth and yet I can explain them to you in a brief space of time whereas if they had been difficult I could certainly never have explained them all old as I am to old men like yourselves

Cle True but what is this study which you describe as wonderful and fitting for youth to learn [822] but of which we are ignorant? Try and explain the nature of it to us as clearly as you can

Ath I will For O my good friends, that other doctrine about the wandering of the sun and the moon and the other stars is not the truth but the very reverse of the truth Each of them moves in the same path—not in many paths but in one only which is circular and the varieties are only apparent Nor are we right in supposing that the swiftest of them is the slowest nor conversely that the slowest is the quickest And if what I say is true only just imagine that we had a similar notion about horses running at Olympia or about men who ran in the long course and that we addressed the swiftest as the slowest and the slowest as the swiftest and sang the praises of the vanquished as though he were the victor —in that case our praises would not be true nor very agreeable to the runners though they be but men and now to commit the same error about the Gods which would have been ludicrous and erroneous in the case of men—is not that ludicrous and erroneous?

Cle Worse than ludicrous I should say

Ath At all events the Gods cannot like us to be spreading a false report of them

Cle Most true if such is the fact

Ath And if we can show that such is really the fact then all these matters ought to be learned so far as is necessary for the avoidance of impiety but if we cannot they may be let alone and let this be our decision

Cle Very good

Ath Enough of laws relating to education and learning But hunting and similar pursuits in like manner claim our attention For the legislator appears to have a duty imposed upon him which goes beyond mere legislation There is something over and above law which lies in a region between admonition and law and has several times occurred to us in the course of discussion for example in the education of very young children there were things as we maintain which are not to be defined and to regard them as matters of positive law is a great absurdity Now our laws and the whole constitution of our state having been thus delineated the praise of the virtuous citizen is not complete when he is described as the person who serves the laws best and obeys them most but the higher form of praise is that which describes him as the good [823] citizen we ever study the art of self-defence?

Cle The way which you mention, Stranger would be the only way

Ath And shall the warriors of our city who are destined when occasion calls to enter the greatest of all contests and to fight for their lives, and their children, and their property and the whole city be worse prepared than boxers? And will the legislator because he is afraid that their practising with one another may appear to some ridiculous, abstain from commanding them to go out and fight will he not ordain that soldiers shall perform lesser exercises with out arms every day making dancing and all gymnastic tend to this end and also will he not require that they shall practise some gymnastic exercises, greater as well as lesser as often as every month and that they shall have contests one with another in every part of the country seizing upon posts and lying in ambush and imitating in every respect the reality of war fighting with boxing-gloves and hurling javelins, and using weapons somewhat dangerous and as nearly as possible like the true ones, in order that the sport may not be altogether without fear but may have terrors and to a certain degree show the man who has and who has not courage [831] and that the honour and dishonour which are assigned to them respectively may prepare the whole city for the true conflict of life? If any one dies in these mimic contests, the homicide is involuntary and we will make the slayer when he has been purified according to law to be pure of blood, considering that if a few men should die, others as good as they will be born but that if fear is dead then the citizens will never find a test of superior and inferior natures, which is a far greater evil to the state than the loss of a few

Cle We are quite agreed Stranger that we should legislate about such things, and that the whole state should practise them

Ath And what is the reason that dances and contests of this sort hardly ever exist in states at least not to any extent worth speaking of? Is this due to the ignorance of mankind and their legislator?

Cle Perhaps.

Ath Certainly not, sweet Cleinias there are two causes, which are quite enough to account for the deficiency

Cle What are they?

Ath One cause is the love of wealth, which wholly absorbs men, and never for a moment allows them to think of anything but their own private possessions on this the soul of every citizen hangs suspended and can attend to nothing but his daily gain mankind are ready to learn any branch of knowledge, and to follow any pursuit which tends to this end and they laugh at every other —that is one reason why a city will not be in earnest about such contests or any other good and honourable pursuit But from an insatiable love of gold and silver every man will stoop to any art or contrivance, seemly or unseemly in the hope of becoming rich and will make no objection to performing any action holy or unholy and utterly base, if only like a beast he have the power of eating and drinking all kinds of things, and procuring for himself in every sort of way the gratification of his lusts.

Cle True

Ath Let this then be deemed one of the causes which prevent states from pursuing in an efficient manner the art of war, or any other noble aim but makes the orderly and temperate part of mankind into merchants and captains of ships and servants and converts the valiant sort into thieves and burglars, and robbers of temples, [832] and violent, tyrannical persons many of whom are not without ability but they are unfortunate.

Cle What do you mean?

Ath Must not they be truly unfortunate whose souls are compelled to pass through life always hungering?

Cle Then that is one cause, Stranger but you spoke of another

Ath Thank you for reminding me.

Cle The insatiable lifelong love of wealth as you were saying is one cause which absorbs mankind and prevents them from rightly practising the arts of war —Granted and now tell me, what is the other?

Ath Do you imagine that I delay because I am in a perplexity?

Cle No but we think that you are too severe upon the money loving temper of which you seem in the present discussion to have a peculiar dislike.

Ath That is a very fair rebuke, Cleinias and I will now proceed to the second cause.

Cle Proceed.

Ath I say that governments are a cause— democracy oligarchy tyranny concerning which I have often spoken in the previous discourse or rather governments they are not, for none of them exercises a voluntary rule over voluntary subjects but they may be truly called omits and I may remark that they are the very persons who ought to take note of what is omitted The law will say that there are twelve feasts dedicated to the twelve Gods, after whom the several tribes are named and that to each of them they shall sacrifice every month and appoint choruses and musical and gymnastic contests assigning them so as to suit the Gods and seasons of the year And they shall have festivals for women distinguishing those which ought to be separated from the men s festivals and those which ought not Further they shall not confuse the infernal deities and their rites with the Gods who are termed heavenly and their rites but shall separate them giving to Pluto his own in the twelfth month which is sacred to him according to the law To such a deity warlike men should entertain no aversion but they should honour him as being always the best friend of man For the connection of soul and body is no way better than the dissolution of them as I am ready to maintain quite seriously Moreover those who would regulate these matters rightly should consider that our city among existing cities has no fellow either in respect of leisure or command of the necessaries of life and that like an individual she ought to live happily [829] And those who would live happily should in the first place do no wrong to one another and ought not themselves to be wronged by others to attain the first is not difficult but there is great difficulty in acquiring the power of not being wronged No man can be perfectly secure against wrong unless he has become perfectly good and cities are like individuals in this for a city if good has a life of peace but if evil a life of war within and without Wherefore the citizens ought to practise war—not in time of war but rather while they are at peace And every city which has any sense should take the field at least for one day in every month and for more if the magistrates think fit having no regard to winter cold or summer heat and they should go out en masse including their wives and their children when the magistrates determine to lead forth the whole people or in separate portions when summoned by them and they should always provide that there should be games and sacrificial feasts and they should have tournaments imitating in as lively a manner as they can real battles And they should distribute prizes of victory and valour to the competitors passing censures and encomiums on one another according to the characters which they bear in the contests and in their whole life honouring him who seems to be the best and blaming him who is the opposite And let poets celebrate the victors—not however every poet but only one who in the first place is not less than fifty years of age, nor should he be one who although he may have musical and poetical gifts, has never in his life done any noble or illustrious action but those who are themselves good and also honourable in the state creators of noble actions—let their poems be sung even though they be not very musical And let the judgment of them rest with the instructor of youth and the other guardians of the laws, who shall give them this privilege and they alone shall be free to sing but the rest of the world shall not have this liberty Nor shall any one dare to sing a song which has not been approved by the judgment of the guardians of the laws not even if his strain be sweeter than the songs of Thamyras and Orpheus, but only such poems as have been judged sacred and dedicated to the Gods and such as are the works of good men in which praise or blame has been awarded and which have been deemed to fulfil their design fairly

The regulations about war and about liberty of speech in poetry ought to apply equally to men and women The legislator may be supposed to argue the question in his own mind —Who are my citizens for whom I have set in order the city? [830] Are they not competitors in the greatest of all contests and have they not innumerable rivals? To be sure will be the natural reply Well but if we were training boxers or pancratiasts or any other sort of athletes would they never meet until the hour of contest arrived and should we do nothing to prepare ourselves previously by daily practice? Surely if we were boxers we should have been learning to fight for many days before and exercising ourselves in imitating all those blows and wards which we were intending to use in the hour of conflict and in order that we might come as near to reality as possible instead of cestuses we should put on boxing gloves that the blows and the wards might be practised by us to the utmost of our power And if there were a lack of competitors the ridicule of fools would not deter us from hanging up a lifeless image and practising at that Or if we had no adversary at all animate or inanimate should we not venture in the dearth of antagonists to spar by ourselves? In what other manner could would be no sense nor any shadow of sense in instituting contests which are not after the manner of our country And therefore we give our prizes for single horses—for colts who have not yet cast their teeth, and for those who are intermediate, and for the full-grown horses themselves, and thus our equestrian games will accord with the nature of the country Let them have conflict and rivalry in these matters in accordance with the law and let the colonels and generals of horse decide together about all courses and about the armed competitors in them. But we have nothing to say to the unarmed either in gymnastic exercises or in these contests. On the other hand, the Cretan bowman or javelin-man who fights in armour on horseback is useful, and therefore we may as well place a competition of this sort among our amusements. Women are not to be forced to compete by laws and ordinances but if from previous training they have acquired the habit and are strong enough and like to take part, let them do so, girls as well as boys, and no blame to them.

Thus the competition in gymnastic and the mode of learning it have been described and we have spoken also of the toils of the contest, and of daily exercises under the superintendence of masters. Likewise what relates to music has been, for the most part, completed. But as to rhapsodes and the like, and the contests of choruses which are to perform at feasts, all this shall be arranged when the months and days and years have been appointed for Gods and demi gods, whether every third year or again every fifth year or in whatever way or manner the Gods may put into men's minds [835] the distribution and order of them At the same time, we may expect that the musical contests will be celebrated in their turn by the command of the judges and the director of education and the guardians of the law meeting together for this purpose and themselves becoming legislators of the times and nature and conditions of the choral contests and of dancing in general What they ought severally to be in language and song and in the admixture of harmony with rhythm and the dance has been often declared by the original legislator and his successors ought to follow him, making the games and sacrifices duly to correspond at fitting times, and appointing public festivals It is not difficult to determine how these and the like matters may have a regular order nor again, will the alteration of them do any great good or harm to the state There is, however another matter of great importance and difficulty concerning which God should legislate, if there were any possibility of obtaining from him an ordinance about it. But seeing that divine aid is not to be had, there appears to be a need of some bold man who specially honours plainness of speech, and will say outright what he thinks best for the city and citizens—ordaining what is good and convenient for the whole state amid the corruptions of human souls, opposing the mightiest lusts, and having no man his helper but himself standing alone and following reason only

Cle What is this, Stranger that you are saying? For we do not as yet understand your meaning

Ath Very likely I will endeavour to explain myself more clearly When I came to the subject of education, I beheld young men and maidens holding friendly intercourse with one another And there naturally arose in my mind a sort of apprehension—I could not help thinking how one is to deal with a city in which youths and maidens are well nurtured, and have nothing to do, and are not undergoing the excessive and servile toils which extinguish wantonness, and whose only cares during their whole life are sacrifices and festivals and dances. How in such a state as this, will they abstain from desires which thrust many a man and woman into perdition and from which reason [836] assuming the functions of law commands them to abstain? The ordinances already made may possibly get the better of most of these desires the prohibition of excessive wealth is a very considerable gain in the direction of temperance, and the whole education of our youth imposes a law of moderation on them more over the eye of the rulers is required always to watch over the young and never to lose sight of them and these provisions do, as far as human means can effect anything exercise a regulating influence upon the desires in general But how can we take precautions against the unnatural loves of either sex, from which innumerable evils have come upon individuals and cities? How shall we devise a remedy and way of escape out of so great a danger? Truly Cleinias, here is a difficulty In many ways Crete and Lacedaemon furnish a great help to those who make peculiar laws but in the matter of love, as we are alone I must confess that they are quite against us. For if any one following nature should lay down the law which existed before the days of Laius, and denounce these lusts as contrary to nature adducing the states of discord in which while the government is voluntary the subjects always obey against their will and have to be coerced and the ruler fears the subject and will not if he can help, allow him to become either noble or rich or strong or valiant or warlike at all[1] These two are the chief causes of almost all evils, and of the evils of which I have been speaking they are notably the causes But our state has escaped both of them for her citizens have the greatest leisure and they are not subject to one another and will I think be made by these laws the reverse of lovers of money Such a constitution may be reasonably supposed to be the only one existing which will accept the education which we have described and the martial pastimes which have been perfected according to our idea

Cle True

Ath Then next we must remember about all gymnastic contests, that only the warlike sort of them are to be practised and to have prizes of victory and those which are not military are to be given up The military sort had better be completely described and established by law; and first let us speak of running and swiftness

Cle Very good

Ath Certainly the most military of all qualities is general activity of body whether of foot or hand For escaping or for capturing an enemy [833] quickness of foot is required but hand-to-hand conflict and combat need vigour and strength

Cle Very true

Ath Neither of them can attain their greatest efficiency without arms

Cle How can they?

Ath Then our herald in accordance with the prevailing practice will first summon the runner —he will appear armed for to an unarmed competitor we will not give a prize And he shall enter first who is to run the single course bearing arms next he who is to run the double course third he who is to run the horse-course and fourthly he who is to run the long course the fifth whom we start shall be the first sent forth in heavy armour and shall run a course of sixty stadia to some temple of Ares—and we will send forth another whom we will style the more heavily armed to run over smoother ground There remains the archer and he shall run in the full equipments of an archer a distance of 100 stadia over mountains and across every sort of country to a temple of Apollo and Artemis this shall be the order of the contest and we will wait for them until they return and will give a prize to the conqueror in each

Cle Very good

Ath Let us suppose that there are three kinds of contests—one of boys, another of beardless youths and a third of men For the youths we will fix the length of the contest at two-thirds, and for the boys at half of the entire course, whether they contend as archers or as heavy armed Touching the women let the girls who are not grown up compete naked in the stadium and the double course, and the horse-course and the long course and let them run on the race ground itself those who are thirteen years of age and upwards until their marriage shall continue to share in contests if they are not more than twenty, and shall be compelled to run up to eighteen and they shall descend into the arena in suitable dresses Let these be the regulations about contests in running both for men and women

Respecting contests of strength instead of wrestling and similar contests of the heavier sort, we will institute conflicts in armour of one against one and two against two and so on up to ten against ten As to what a man ought not to suffer or do and to what extent in order to gain the victory—as in wrestling the masters of the art have laid down what is fair and what is not fair so in fighting in armour—we ought to call in skilful persons who shall judge for us and be our assessors in the work of legislation they shall say who deserves to be victor in combats of this sort and what he is not to do or have done to him and in like manner what rule determines who is defeated [834] and let these ordinances apply to women until they are married as well as to men The pancration shall have a counterpart in a combat of the light armed they shall contend with bows and with light shields and with javelins and in the throwing of stones by slings and by hand and laws shall be made about it, and rewards and prizes given to him who best fulfils the ordinances of the law

Next in order we shall have to legislate about the horse contests Now we do not need many horses for they cannot be of much use in a country like Crete and hence we naturally do not take great pains about the rearing of them or about horse races There is no one who keeps a chariot among us and any rivalry in such matters would be altogether out of place there the penalty of his sin.

Meg. You are very right in saying that tradition, if no breath of opposition ever assails it, has a marvellous power.

Ath. Am I not also right in saying that the legislator who wants to master any of the passions which master man may easily know how to subdue them? He will consecrate the tradition of their evil character among all, slaves and freemen, women and children, throughout the city:—that will be the surest foundation of the law which he can make.

Meg. Yes; but will he ever succeed in making all mankind use the same language about them?

Ath. A good objection; but was I not just now saying that I had a way to make men use natural love and abstain from unnatural, not intentionally destroying the seeds of human increase, [839] or sowing them in stony places, in which they will take no root; and that I would command them to abstain too from any female field of increase in which that which is sown is not likely to grow? Now if a law to this effect could only be made perpetual, and gain an authority such as already prevents intercourse of parents and children—such a law, extending to other sensual desires, and conquering them, would be the source of ten thousand blessings. For, in the first place, moderation is the appointment of nature, and deters men from all frenzy and madness of love, and from all adulteries and immoderate use of meats and drinks, and makes them good friends to their own wives. And innumerable other benefits would result if such a law could only be enforced. I can imagine some lusty youth who is standing by, and who, on hearing this enactment, declares in scurrilous terms that we are making foolish and impossible laws, and fills the world with his outcry. And therefore I said that I knew a way of enacting and perpetuating such a law, which was very easy in one respect, but in another most difficult. There is no difficulty in seeing that such a law is possible, and in what way; for, as I was saying, the ordinance once consecrated would master the soul of every man, and terrify him into obedience. But matters have now come to such a pass that even then the desired result seems as if it could not be attained, just as the continuance of an entire state in the practice of common meals is also deemed impossible. And although this latter is partly disproven by the fact of their existence among you, still even in your cities the common meals of women would be regarded as unnatural and impossible. I was thinking of the rebelliousness of the human heart when I said that the permanent establishment of these things is very difficult.

Meg. Very true.

Ath. Shall I try and find some sort of persuasive argument which will prove to you that such enactments are possible, and not beyond human nature?

Cle. By all means.

Ath. Is a man more likely to abstain from the pleasures of love and to do what he is bidden about them, when his body is in a good condition, or when he is in an ill condition, and out of training?

Cle. He will be far more temperate when he is in training.

Ath. And have we not heard of Iccus of Tarentum, who, with a view to the Olympic and other contests, [840] in his zeal for his art, and also because he was of a manly and temperate disposition, never had any connection with a woman or a youth during the whole time of his training? And the same is said of Crison and Astylus and Diopompus and many others; and yet, Cleinias, they were far worse educated in their minds than your and my citizens, and in their bodies far more lusty.

Cle. No doubt this fact has been often affirmed positively by the ancients of these athletes.

Ath. And had they the courage to abstain from what is ordinarily deemed a pleasure for the sake of a victory in wrestling, running, and the like; and shall our young men be incapable of a similar endurance for the sake of a much nobler victory, which is the noblest of all, as from their youth upwards we will tell them, charming them, as we hope, into the belief of this by tales and sayings and songs?

Cle. Of what victory are you speaking?

Ath. Of the victory over pleasure, which if they win, they will live happily; or if they are conquered, the reverse of happily. And, further, may we not suppose that the fear of impiety will enable them to master that which other inferior people have mastered?

Cle. I dare say.

Ath. And since we have reached this point in our legislation, and have fallen into a difficulty by reason of the vices of mankind, I affirm that our ordinance should simply run in the following terms: Our citizens ought not to fall below the nature of birds and beasts in general, who are born in great multitudes, and yet remain until the age for procreation virgin and animals as a proof that such unions were monstrous he might prove his point but he would be wholly at variance with the custom of your states Further they are repugnant to a principle which we say that a legislator should always observe for we are always enquiring which of our enactments tends to virtue and which not And suppose we grant that these loves are accounted by law to be honourable or at least not disgraceful in what degree will they contribute to virtue? Will such passions implant in the soul of him who is seduced the habit of courage or in the soul of the seducer the principle of temperance? Who will ever believe this?—or rather who will not blame the effeminacy of him who yields to pleasures and is unable to hold out against them? Will not all men censure as womanly him who imitates the woman? And who would ever think of establishing such a practice by law? Certainly no one who had in his mind the image of true law How can we prove that what I am saying is true? [837] He who would rightly consider these matters must see the nature of friendship and desire and of these so-called loves for they are of two kinds and out of the two arises a third kind having the same name and this similarity of name causes all the difficulty and obscurity

Cle How is that?

Ath Dear is the like in virtue to the like and the equal to the equal dear also though unlike, is he who has abundance to him who is in want. And when either of these friendships becomes excessiv we term the excess love

Cle Very true

Ath The friendship which arises from contraries is horrible and coarse and has often no tie of communion but that which arises from likeness is gentle and has a tie of communion which lasts through life As to the mixed sort which is made up of them both there is first of all a difficulty in determining what he who is possessed by this third love desires moreover he is drawn different ways and is in doubt between the two principles the one exhorting him to enjoy the beauty of youth and the other forbidding him For the one is a lover of the body and hungers after beauty like ripe fruit and would fain satisfy himself without any regard to the character of the beloved the other holds the desire of the body to be a secondary matter and looking rather than loving and with his soul desiring the soul of the other in a becoming manner regards the satisfaction of the bodily love as wantonness [1] he reverences and respects temperance and courage and magnanimity and wisdom and wishes to live chastely with the chaste object of his affection Now the sort of love which is made up of the other two is that which we have described as the third Seeing then that there are these three sorts of love ought the law to prohibit and forbid them all to exist among us? Is it not rather clear that we should wish to have in the state the love which is of virtue and which desires the beloved youth to be the best possible and the other two if possible we should hinder? What do you say friend Megillus?

Megillus I think Stranger that you are perfectly right in what you have been now saying

Ath I knew well my friend, that I should obtain your assent which I accept and therefore have no need to analyse your custom any further Cleinias shall be prevailed upon to give me his assent at some other time Enough of this and now let us proceed to the laws

[838] Meg Very good

Ath Upon reflection I see a way of imposing the law which in one respect is easy but, in another is of the utmost difficulty

Meg What do you mean?

Ath We are all aware that most men in spite of their lawless natures are very strictly and precisely restrained from intercourse with the fair and this is not at all against their will but entirely with their will

Meg When do you mean?

Ath When any one has a brother or sister who is fair and about a son or daughter the same unwritten law holds and is a most perfect safeguard, so that no open or secret connection ever takes place between them Nor does the thought of such a thing ever enter at all into the minds of most of them

Meg Very true

Ath Does not a little word extinguish all pleasures of that sort?

Meg What word?

Ath The declaration that they are unholy hated of God and most infamous and is not the reason of this that no one has ever said the opposite but every one from his earliest childhood has heard men speaking in the same manner about them always and everywhere whether in comedy or in the graver language of tragedy? When the poet introduces on the stage a Thyestes or an Oedipus or a Macareus having secret intercourse with his sister he represents him when found out ready to kill himself as which shall be called the laws of husbandmen And let the first of them be the law of Zeus, the god of boundaries. Let no one shift the boundary line either of a fello v-citizen who is a neighbour or if he dv ells at the extremity of the land, [843] of any stranger who is conterminous with him, considering that this is truly to mo e the immovable," and every one should be more willin„ to move the largest rock which i not a landmark, than the least stone which is the sworn mark of friendship and hatred be tween neighbours for Zeus the god of kin dred, is the witness of the citizen, and Zeus, the god of strangers, of the stranger and when aroused, terrible are the wars which they stir up. He who obeys the law will never know the fatal consequences of disobed ence, but he who despises the law shall be liable to a double pen alty the first coming from the Gods, and the second from the law For let no one wilfully re move the boundaries of his neighbour s land and if any one does, let him who will inform the landowners, and let them bring him into court, and if he be convicted of re-dividing the land by stealth or by force let the court deter mine what he ought to suffer or pay In the next place, many small injuries done by neigh bours to one another through their multiplica-t on may cause a weight of enmity and make neighbourhood a very d sagreeable and b tter thin„ Wherefore a man ought to be very care ful of committing any offence against his neigh bour and especially of encroaching on his neigh bour s land for any man may easily do harm, but not every man can do good to another He who encroaches on his neighbour s land and transgresses his boundaries, shall make good the damage, and to cure him of his impudence and also of his meanness, he shall pay a double penalty to the injured party Of these and the l ke matters the wardens of the country shall take co„nizance, and be the judges of them and assessors of the damage in the more important cases, as has been already said the whole number of them belonging to any one of the twelve divisions shall decide and in the lesser cases the commanders or again if any one pastures his cattle on his neighbour s land they shall see the njury and adjudge the penalty And if any ne, by decoying the bees, gets possession of an other s swarms, and dra vs them to himself by making noises, he shall pay the dama„e or if anyone sets fire to his own wood and takes no care of his ne ghbour s property he shall be fined at the discretion of the magistrates And if in planting he does not leave a fair distance between his own and his neighbour s land he shall be punished in accordance with the enact ments of many lawgivers which we may use not deeming it necessary that the great legisla tor of our state should [844] determine all the trifles which might be decided by any body for example husbandmen have had of old excel lent laws about waters, and there is no reason why we should propose to divert their course He who likes may draw water from the foun tain head of the common stream on to his own land if he do not cut off the spring which clear ly belongs to some other owner and he may take the water in any direction which he pleases except through a house or temple or sepulchre but he must be careful to do no harm beyond the channel And if there be in any place a nat ural dryness of the earth which keeps in the rain from heaven and causes a deficiency in the supply of water let him dig down on his own land as far as the clay and if at this depth he finds no v ater let him obtain water from his neighbours, as much as is required for his serv ants drinking and if his neighbours, too, are limited in their supply let him have a fixed measure which shall be determined by the war dens of the country This he shall receive each day and on these terms have a share of his neighbours water If there be heavy rain and one of those on the lov er ground injures some tiller of the upper ground or some one who has a common wall by refusing to give them an outlet for water or again if some one living on the higher ground recklessly lets off the water on his lov er neighbour and they cannot come to terms ith one another let him who will call in a warden of the city if he be in the city or if he be in the country a warden of the country and let him obtain a decision determining what each of them is to do And he who will not abide by the decision shall suffer for his malignant and morose temper and pay a fine to the injured party equivalent to double the value of the in jury because he was unwilling to submit to the magistrates

Now the part cipation of fruits shall be or dered on this wise. The goddess of Autumn has t vo gracious gifts one, the joy of Dionysus which is not treasured up the other which na ture intends to be stored Let this be the law then concerning the fruits of autumn He who tastes the common or storing fruits of autumn, v hether grapes or figs before the season of vin tage which co nc des v th Arcturus, either on his own land or on that of others—let him pay unmarried but when they have reached the proper time of life are coupled male and female and lovingly pair together and live the rest of their lives in holiness and innocence abiding firmly in their original compact — surely we will say to them you should be better than the animals But if they are corrupted by the other Hellenes and the common practice of barbarians and they see with their eyes and hear with their ears of the so called free love everywhere prevailing among them and they themselves are not able to get the better of the temptation the guardians of the law exercising the functions of lawgivers shall devise a second law against them

[841] Cle And what law would you advise them to pass if this one failed?

Ath Clearly Cleinias the one which would naturally follow

Cle What is that?

Ath Our citizens should not allow pleasures to strengthen with indulgence but should by toil divert the aliment and exuberance of them into other parts of the body and this will happen if no immodesty be allowed in the practice of love Then they will be ashamed of frequent intercourse and they will find pleasure if seldom enjoyed to be a less imperious mistress They should not be found out doing anything of the sort Concealment shall be honourable and sanctioned by custom and made law by unwritten prescription on the other hand to be detected shall be esteemed dishonourable but not to abstain wholly In this way there will be a second legal standard of honourable and dishonourable involving a second notion of right Three principles will comprehend all those corrupt natures whom we call inferior to themselves and who form but one class and will compel them not to transgress

Cle What are they?

Ath The principle of piety the love of honour and the desire of beauty not in the body but in the soul These are perhaps romantic aspirations but they are the noblest of aspirations, if they could only be realized in all states and God willing in the matter of love we may be able to enforce one of two things—either that no one shall venture to touch any person of the freeborn or noble class except his wedded wife or sow the unconsecrated and bastard seed among harlots or in barren and unnatural lusts or at least we may abolish altogether the connection of men with men and as to women if any man has to do with any but those who come into his house duly married by sacred rites whether they be bought or acquired in any other way and he offends publicly in the face of all mankind we shall be right in enacting that he be deprived of civic honours and privileges and be deemed to be as he truly is, a stranger Let this law then whether it is one, or ought rather to be called two be laid down respecting love in general and the intercourse of the sexes which arises out of the desires whether rightly or wrongly indulged

[842] Meg I for my part Stranger would gladly receive this law Cleinias shall speak for himself and tell you what is his opinion

Cle I will Megillus when an opportunity offers at present I think that we had better allow the Stranger to proceed with his laws

Meg Very good

Ath We had got about as far as the establishment of the common tables which in most places would be difficult but in Crete no one would think of introducing any other custom There might arise a question about the manner of them—whether they shall be such as they are here in Crete or such as they are in Lacedaemon —or is there a third kind which may be better than either of them? The answer to this question might be easily discovered but the discovery would do no great good for at present they are very well ordered

Leaving the common tables, we may therefore proceed to the means of providing food Now in cities the means of life are gained in many ways and from divers sources and in general from two sources whereas our city has only one For most of the Hellenes obtain their food from sea and land but our citizens from land only And this makes the task of the legislator less difficult—half as many laws will be enough and much less than half and they will be of a kind better suited to free men For he has nothing to do with laws about shipowners and merchants and retailers and innkeepers and tax collectors and mines and money lending and compound interest and innumerable other things—bidding good bye to these he gives laws to husbandmen and shepherds and bee keepers and to the guardians and superintendents of their implements and he has already legislated for greater matters as for example respecting marriage and the procreation and nurture of children and for education and the establishment of offices—and now he must direct his laws to those who provide food and labour in preparing it

Let us first of all then have a class of laws

Cf Aristotle Politics vii 10 1330 a 3 10

h... of pursuing two professions or two arts rightly, or of practising one art himself, and superintending some one else who is practising another. Let this, then, be our first principle in the state:—No one who is a smith shall also be a carpenter, and if he be a carpenter, he shall not superintend the smith's art rather than his own, under the pretext that in superintending many servants who are working for him, he is likely to superintend them better, because more revenue will accrue to him from them than from his own art; [847] but let every man in the state have one art, and get his living by that. Let the wardens of the city labour to maintain this law, and if any citizen incline to any other art than the study of virtue, let them punish him with disgrace and infamy, until they bring him back into his own right course; and if any stranger profess two arts, let them chastise him with bonds and money penalties, and expulsion from the state, until they compel him to be one only and not many.

But as touching payments for hire, and contracts of work, or in case any one does wrong to any of the citizens, or they do wrong to any other, up to fifty drachmae, let the wardens of the city decide the case; but if a greater amount be involved, then let the public courts decide according to law. Let no one pay any duty either on the importation or exportation of goods; and as to frankincense and similar perfumes, used in the service of the Gods, which come from abroad, and purple and other dyes which are not produced in the country, or the materials of any art which have to be imported, and which are not necessary—no one should import them; nor again, should any one export anything which is wanted in the country. Of all these things let there be inspectors and superintendents, taken from the guardians of the law; and they shall be the twelve next in order to the five seniors. Concerning arms, and all implements which are required for military purposes, if there be need of introducing any art, or plant, or metal, or chains of any kind, or animals for use in war, let the commanders of the horse and the generals have authority over their importation and exportation; the city shall send them out and also receive them, and the guardians of the law shall make fit and proper laws about them. But let there be no retail trade for the sake of money making, either in these or any other articles, in the city or country at all.

With respect to food and the distribution of the produce of the country, the right and proper way seems to be nearly that which is the custom of Crete; for all should be required to distribute the fruits of the soil into twelve parts, and in this way consume them. Let the twelfth portion of each (as for instance of wheat and barley, to which the rest of the fruits of the earth shall be added, [848] as well as the animals which are for sale in each of the twelve divisions) be divided in due proportion into three parts; one part for freemen, another for their servants, and a third for craftsmen and in general for strangers, whether sojourners who may be dwelling in the city, and like other men must live, or those who come on some business which they have with the state, or with some individual. Let only this third part of all necessaries be required to be sold; out of the other two-thirds no one shall be compelled to sell. And how will they be best distributed?[3] In the first place, we see clearly that the distribution will be of equals in one point of view, and in another point of view of unequals.

Cle. What do you mean?

Ath. I mean that the earth of necessity produces and nourishes the various articles of food, sometimes better and sometimes worse.

Cle. Of course.

Ath. Such being the case, let no one of the three portions be greater than either of the other two;—neither that which is assigned to masters or to slaves, nor again that of the stranger; but let the distribution to all be equal and alike, and let every citizen take his two portions and distribute them among slaves and freemen, he having power to determine the quantity and quality. And what remains he shall distribute by measure and number among the animals who have to be sustained from the earth, taking the whole number of them.

In the second place, our citizens should have separate houses duly ordered; and this will be the order proper for men like them. There shall be twelve hamlets, one in the middle of each twelfth portion, and in each hamlet they shall first set apart a market-place, and the temples of the Gods, and of their attendant demigods; and if there be any local deities of the Magnetes, or holy seats of other ancient deities, whose memory has been preserved, to these let them pay their ancient honours. But Hestia, and Zeus, and Athene will have temples everywhere together with the God who presides in fifty drachmae which shall be sacred to Dionysus if he pluck them from his own land and if from his neighbour s land a mina and if from any others two-thirds of a mina And he who would gather the choice grapes or the choice figs as they are now termed if he take them off his own land let him pluck them how and when he likes but if he take them from the ground of others without their leave let him in that case be always punished in accordance with the law which ordains that he should not move what he has not laid down[1] [845] And if a slave touches any fruit of this sort without the consent of the owner of the land he shall be beaten with as many blows as there are grapes on the bunch or figs on the fig tree Let a metric purchase the choice 'autumnal fruit and then if he pleases he may gather it but if a stranger is passing along the road and desires to eat let him take of the choice grapes for himself and a single follower without payment as a tribute of hospitality The law however forbids strangers from sharing in the sort which is not used for eating and if any one whether he be master or slave takes of them in ignorance let the slave be beaten and the freeman dismissed with admonitions and instructed to take of the other autumnal fruits which are unfit for making raisins and wine or for laying by as dried figs As to pears and apples and pomegranates and similar fruits there shall be no disgrace in taking them secretly but he who is caught if he be of less than thirty years of age shall be struck and beaten off but not wounded and no freeman shall have any right of satisfaction for such blows Of these fruits the stranger may partake just as he may of the fruits of autumn And if an elder who is more than thirty years of age eat of them on the spot let him like the stranger be allowed to partake of all such fruits but he must carry away nothing If however he will not obey the law let him run the risk of failing in the competition of virtue in case any one takes notice of his actions before the judges at the time

Water is the greatest element of nutrition in gardens but is easily polluted You cannot poison the soil, or the sun or the air which are the other elements of nutrition in plants or divert them or steal them but all these things may very likely happen in regard to water which must therefore be protected by law And let this be the law —If any one intentionally pollutes the water of another whether the water of a spring, or collected in reservoirs either by poisonous substances or by digging or by theft, let the injured party bring the cause before the wardens of the city and claim in writing the value of the loss if the accused be found guilty of injuring the water by deleterious substances, let him not only pay damages, but purify the stream or the cistern which contains the water in such manner as the laws of the interpreters[2] order the purification to be made by the offender in each case

With respect to the gathering in of the fruits of the soil let a man if he pleases [846] carry his own fruits through any place in which he either does no harm to any one or himself gains three times as much as his neighbour loses Now of these things the magistrates should be cognisant as of all other things in which a man intentionally does injury to another or to the property of another by fraud or force in the use which he makes of his own property All these matters a man should lay before the magistrates and receive damages supposing the injury to be not more than three minae or if he have a charge against another which involves a larger amount let him bring his suit into the public courts and have the evil doer punished But if any of the magistrates appear to adjudge the penalties which he imposes in an unjust spirit let him be liable to pay double to the injured party Any one may bring the offences of magistrates in any particular case before the public courts There are innumerable little matters relating to the modes of punishment and applications for suits and summonses and the witnesses to summonses—for example whether two witnesses should be required for a summons or how many—and all such details which cannot be omitted in legislation but are beneath the wisdom of an aged legislator These lesser matters as they indeed are in comparison with the greater ones let a younger generation regulate by law after the patterns which have preceded and according to their own experience of the usefulness and necessity of such laws and when they are duly regulated let there be no alteration but let the citizens live in the observance of them

Now of artisans let the regulations be as follows —In the first place let no citizen or servant of a citizen be occupied in handicraft arts for he who is to secure and preserve the public order of the state has an art which requires much study and many kinds of knowledge and does not admit of being made a secondary occupation and hardly any human being is capa

[853] Next to all the matters which have preceded in the natural order of legislation will come suits of law Of suits those which relate to agriculture have been already described, but the more important have not been described Having mentioned them severally under their usual names, we will proceed to say what punishments are to be inflicted for each offence, and who are to be the judges of them.

Cleinias Very good

Athenian Stranger There is a sense of disgrace in legislating, as we are about to do for all the details of crime in a state which, as we say is to be well regulated and will be perfectly adapted to the practice of virtue. To assume that in such a state there will arise some one who will be guilty of crimes as heinous as any which are ever perpetrated in other states, and that we must legislate for him by anticipation and threaten and make laws against him if he should arise, in order to deter him and punish his acts under the idea that he will arise—this, as I was saying, is in a manner disgraceful. Yet seeing that we are not like the ancient legislators, who gave laws to heroes and sons of gods, being according to the popular belief, themselves the offspring of the gods, and legislating for others, who were also the children of divine parents, but that we are only men who are legislating for the sons of men, there is no uncharitableness in apprehending that some one of our citizens may be like a seed which has touched the ox's horn, having a heart so hard that it cannot be softened any more than those seeds can be softened by fire Among our citizens there may be those who cannot be subdued by all the strength of the laws and for their sake, though an ungracious task, I will proclaim my first law about the robbing of temples, in case any one should dare to commit such a crime I do not expect or imagine that any well-brought-up citizen will ever take the infection but their servants, and strangers, and strangers servants may be guilty of many impieties [854] And with a view to them especially and yet not without a provident eye to the weakness of human nature generally I will proclaim the law about robbers of temples and similar incurable or almost incurable criminals Having already agreed that such enactments ought always to have a short prelude, we may speak to the criminal whom some tormenting desire by night and by day tempts to go and rob a temple, the fewest possible words of admonition and exhortation —O sir we will say to him the impulse which moves you to rob temples is not an ordinary human malady nor yet a visitation of heaven, but a madness which is begotten in a man from ancient and unexpiated crimes of his race, an ever recurring curse —against this you must guard with all your might, and how you are to guard we will explain to you. When any such thought comes into your mind, go and perform expiations, go as a suppliant to the temples of the Gods who avert evils, go to the society of those who are called good men among you hear them tell and yourself try to repeat after them, that every man should honour the noble and the just. Fly from the company of the wicked—fly and turn not back and if your disorder is lightened by these remedies, well and good but if not, then acknowledge death to be nobler than life, and depart hence.

Such are the preludes which we sing to all who have thoughts of unholy and treasonable actions and to him who hearkens to them the law has nothing to say But to him who is disobedient when the prelude is over cry with a loud voice—He who is taken in the act of robbing temples, if he be a slave or stranger shall have his evil deed engraven on his face and hands and shall be beaten with as many stripes as may seem good to the judges, and be cast naked beyond the borders of the land And if he suffers this punishment he will probably return to his right mind and be improved for no penalty which the law inflicts is designed for evil, but always makes him who suffers either better or not so much worse as he would have been. But if any citizen be found guilty of any great or unmentionable wrong, either in relation to the gods, or his parents, or the state, let the judge deem him to be incurable, remembering that after receiving such an excellent education and training from youth upward he has not abstained from the greatest of crimes His punishment shall be death [855] which to him will be the least of evils and his example will benefit others, if he perish ingloriously and be cast beyond the borders of the land But let his children and family if they avoid the ways of their father have glory and let honourable mention be made of them, as having nobly and manfully escaped out of evil into good None each of the twelve districts[1] And the first erection of houses shall be around these temples where the ground is highest in order to provide the safest and most defensible place of retreat for the guards All the rest of the country they shall settle in the following manner —They shall make thirteen divisions of the craftsmen one of them they shall establish in the city and this again they shall subdivide into twelve lesser divisions among the twelve districts of the city, and the remainder shall be distributed in the country round about and in each village they shall settle various classes of craftsmen with a view to the convenience of the husbandmen And the chief officers of the wardens of the country shall superintend all these matters and see how many of them and which class of them each place requires [849] and fix them where they are likely to be least troublesome and most useful to the husbandman And the wardens of the city shall see to similar matters in the city

Now the wardens of the agora ought to see to the details of the agora Their first care after the temples which are in the agora have been seen to should be to prevent any one from doing any wrong in dealings between man and man in the second place as being inspectors of temperance and violence they should chastise him who requires chastisement Touching articles of sale they should first see whether the articles which the citizens are under regulations to sell to strangers are sold to them as the law ordains And let the law be as follows —On the first day of the month the persons in charge whoever they are whether strangers or slaves who have the charge on behalf of the citizens shall produce to the strangers the portion which falls to them in the first place a twelfth portion of the corn —the stranger shall purchase corn for the whole month and other cereals on the first market day and on the tenth day of the month the one party shall sell and the other buy liquids sufficient to last during the whole month and on the twenty third day there shall be a sale of animals by those who are willing to sell to the people who want to buy and of implements and other things which husbandmen sell (such as skins and all kinds of clothing either woven or made of felt and other goods of the same sort) and which strangers are compelled to buy and purchase of others As to the retail trade in these things whether of barley or wheat set apart for meal and flour or any other kind of food no one shall sell them to citizens or their slaves nor shall any one buy of a citizen but let the stranger sell them in the market of strangers to artisans and their slaves, making an exchange of wine and food which is commonly called retail trade And butchers shall offer for sale parts of dismembered animals to the strangers, and artisans, and their servants Let any stranger who likes buy fuel from day to day wholesale from those who have the care of it in the country, and let him sell to the strangers as much as he pleases and when he pleases As to other goods and implements which are likely to be wanted they shall sell them in the common market at any place which the guardians of the law and the wardens of the market and city choosing according to their judgment shall determine at such places they shall exchange money for goods and goods for money neither party giving credit to the other[2] and he who gives credit must be satisfied whether he obtain his money or not, [850] for in such exchanges he will not be protected by law But whenever property has been bought or sold greater in quantity or value than is allowed by the law which has determined within what limits a man may increase and diminish his possessions let the excess be registered in the books of the guardians of the law or in case of diminution let there be an erasure made. And let the same rule be observed about the registration of the property of the metics Any one who likes may come and be a metic on certain conditions a foreigner if he likes and is able to settle may dwell in the land, but he must practise an art and not abide more than twenty years from the time at which he has registered himself and he shall pay no sojourner s tax however small, except good conduct nor any other tax for buying and selling But when the twenty years have expired he shall take his property with him and depart And if in the course of these years he should chance to distinguish himself by any considerable benefit which he confers on the state, and he thinks that he can persuade the council and assembly either to grant him delay in leaving the country or to allow him to remain for the whole of his life, let him go and persuade the city and whatever they assent to at his instance shall take effect For the children of the metics being artisans and of fifteen years of age let the time of their sojourn commence after their fifteenth year and let them remain for twenty years and then go where they like but any of them who wishes to remain may do so if he can persuade not, he shall be bound until he pay the penalty or persuade him who has obtained the sentence against him to forgive him. But if a person be convicted of a theft against the state, then if he can persuade the city or if he will pay back twice the amount of the theft, he shall be set free from his bonds.

Cle. What makes you say, Stranger, that a theft is all one, whether the thief may have taken much or little, and either from sacred or secular places—and these are not the only differences in thefts.—seeing, then, that they are of many kinds, ought not the legislator to adapt himself to them, and impose upon them entirely different penalties?

Ath. Excellent. I was running on too fast, Cleinias, and you impinged upon me, and brought me to my senses, reminding me of what, indeed, had occurred to my mind already, that legislation was never yet rightly worked out, as I may say in passing.—Do you remember the image in which I likened the men for whom laws are now made to slaves who are doctored by slaves? For of this you may be very sure, that if one of those empirical physicians, who practise medicine without science, were to come upon the gentleman physician talking to his gentleman patient, and using the language almost of philosophy, beginning at the beginning of the disease and discoursing about the whole nature of the body, he would burst into a hearty laugh—he would say what most of those who are called doctors always have at their tongue's end:—Foolish fellow, he would say, you are not healing the sick man, but you are educating him; and he does not want to be made a doctor, but to get well.

Cle. And would he not be right?

Ath. Perhaps he would; and he might remark upon us, that he who discourses about laws, as we are now doing, is giving the citizens education and not laws; that would be rather a telling observation.

Cle. Very true.

Ath. But we are fortunate.

[858] Cle. In what way?

Ath. Inasmuch as we are not compelled to give laws, but we may take into consideration every form of government, and ascertain what is best and what is most needful, and how they may both be carried into execution; and we may also, if we please, at this very moment choose what is best, or, if we prefer, what is most necessary—which shall we do?

Cle. There is something ridiculous, Stranger, in our proposing such an alternative as if we were legislators, simply bound under some great necessity which cannot be deferred to the morrow. But we, as I may by the grace of Heaven affirm, like gatherers of stones or beginners of some composite work, may gather a heap of materials, and out of this, at our leisure, select what is suitable for our projected construction. Let us then suppose ourselves to be at leisure, not of necessity building, but rather like men who are partly providing materials, and partly putting them together. And we may truly say that some of our laws, like stones, are already fixed in their places, and others lie at hand.

Ath. Certainly, in that case, Cleinias, our view of law will be more in accordance with nature. For there is another matter affecting legislators, which I must earnestly entreat you to consider.

Cle. What is it?

Ath. There are many writings to be found in cities, and among them there are discourses composed by legislators as well as by other persons.

Cle. To be sure.

Ath. Shall we give heed rather to the writings of those others—poets and the like, who either in metre or out of metre have recorded their advice about the conduct of life, and not to the writings of legislators? or shall we give heed to them above all?

Cle. Yes; to them far above all others.

Ath. And ought the legislator alone among writers to withhold his opinion about the beautiful, the good, and the just, and not to teach what they are, and how they are to be pursued by those who intend to be happy?

Cle. Certainly not.

Ath. And is it disgraceful for Homer and Tyrtaeus and other poets to lay down evil precepts in their writings respecting life and the pursuits of men, but not so disgraceful for Lycurgus and Solon and others who were legislators as well as writers? Is it not true that of all the writings to be found in cities, those which relate to laws, when you unfold and read them, ought to be by far the noblest and the best? [859] and should not other writings either agree with them, or if they disagree, be deemed ridiculous? We should consider whether the laws of states ought not to have the character of loving and wise parents, rather than of tyrants and masters, who command and threaten, and, after writing their decrees on walls, go of them should have their goods confiscated to the state for the lots of the citizens ought always to continue the same and equal

Touching the exaction of penalties when a man appears to have done anything which deserves a fine he shall pay the fine if he have anything in excess of the lot which is assigned to him but more than that he shall not pay And to secure exactness let the guardians of the law refer to the registers and inform the judges of the precise truth in order that none of the lots may go uncultivated for want of money But if any one seems to deserve a greater penalty let him undergo a long and public imprisonment and be dishonoured unless some of his friends are willing to be surety for him and liberate him by assisting him to pay the fine No criminal shall go unpunished, not even for a single offence nor if he have fled the country but let the penalty be according to his deserts —death or bonds or blows, or degrading places of sitting or standing or removal to some temple on the borders of the land or let him pay fines as we said before In cases of death let the judges be the guardians of the law and a court selected by merit from the last year s magistrates But how the causes are to be brought into court how the summonses are to be served and the like these things may be left to the younger generation of legislators to determine the manner of voting we must determine ourselves

Let the vote be given openly but before they come to the vote let the judges sit in order of seniority over against plaintiff and defendant and let all the citizens who can spare time hear and take a serious interest in listening to such causes First of all the plaintiff shall make one speech and then the defendant shall make another and after the speeches have been made the eldest judge shall begin to examine the parties and proceed to make an adequate enquiry into what has been said and after the oldest has spoken the rest shall proceed in order to examine either party as to what he finds defective in the evidence whether of statement or omission and he who has nothing to ask shall hand over the examination to another And on so much of what has been said as is to the purpose all the judges shall set their seals and place the writings on the altar of Hestia [856] On the next day they shall meet again and in like manner put their questions and go through the cause and again set their seals upon the evidence and when they have three times done this and have had witnesses and evidence enough they shall each of them give a holy vote, after promising by Hestia that they will decide justly and truly to the utmost of their power and so they shall put an end to the suit

Next after what relates to the Gods, follows what relates to the dissolution of the state — Whoever by promoting a man to power enslaves the laws and subjects the city to factions using violence and stirring up sedition contrary to law him we will deem the greatest enemy of the whole state But he who takes no part in such proceedings and being one of the chief magistrates of the state, has no knowledge of the treason or having knowledge of it by reason of cowardice does not interfere on behalf of his country such an one we must consider nearly as bad Every man who is worth anything will inform the magistrates and bring the conspirator to trial for making a violent and illegal attempt to change the government The judges of such cases shall be the same as of the robbers of temples and let the whole proceeding be carried on in the same way and the vote of the majority condemn to death But let there be a general rule that the disgrace and punishment of the father is not to be visited on the children except in the case of some one whose father grandfather and great grandfather have successively undergone the penalty of death Such persons the city shall send away with all their possessions to the city and country of their ancestors retaining only and wholly their appointed lot And out of the citizens who have more than one son of not less than ten years of age they shall select ten whom their father or grandfather by the mother s or father s side shall appoint and let them send to Delphi the names of those who are selected and him whom the God chooses they shall establish as heir of the house which has failed and may he have better fortune than his predecessors!

Cle Very good

Ath Once more let there be a third general law respecting the judges who are to give judgment and the manner of conducting suits against those who are tried on an accusation of treason [857] and as concerning the remaining or departure of their descendants—there shall be one law for all three for the traitor and the robber of temples and the subverter by violence of the laws of the state For a thief whether he steal much or little, let there be one law and one punishment for all alike in the first place let him pay double the amount of the theft if he be convicted and if he have so much over and above the allotment —if he have

of them should have their goods confiscated to the state for the lots of the citizens ought always to continue the same and equal

Touching the exaction of penalties when a man appears to have done anything which deserves a fine he shall pay the fine if he have anything in excess of the lot which is assigned to him but more than that he shall not pay And to secure exactness let the guardians of the law refer to the registers and inform the judges of the precise truth in order that none of the lots may go uncultivated for want of money But if any one seems to deserve a greater penalty let him undergo a long and public imprisonment and be dishonoured unless some of his friends are willing to be surety for him and liberate him by assisting him to pay the fine No criminal shall go unpunished not even for a single offence nor if he have fled the country but let the penalty be according to his deserts —death or bonds or blows, or degrading places of sitting or standing or removal to some temple on the borders of the land or let him pay fines as we said before In cases of death let the judges be the guardians of the law and a court selected by merit from the last year s magistrates But how the causes are to be brought into court, how the summonses are to be served and the like these things may be left to the younger generation of legislators to determine the manner of voting we must determine ourselves

Let the vote be given openly but before they come to the vote let the judges sit in order of seniority over against plaintiff and defendant and let all the citizens who can spare time hear and take a serious interest in listening to such causes First of all the plaintiff shall make one speech and then the defendant shall make another and after the speeches have been made the eldest judge shall begin to examine the parties and proceed to make an adequate enquiry into what has been said and after the oldest has spoken the rest shall proceed in order to examine either party as to what he finds defective in the evidence whether of statement or omission and he who has nothing to ask shall hand over the examination to another And on so much of what has been said as is to the purpose all the judges shall set their seals and place the writings on the altar of Hestia [856] On the next day they shall meet again and in like manner put their questions and go through the cause and again set their seals upon the evidence and when they have three times done this and have had witnesses and evidence enough they shall each of them give a holy vote after promising by Hestia that they will decide justly and truly to the utmost of their power and so they shall put an end to the suit

Next after what relates to the Gods follows what relates to the dissolution of the state — Whoever by promoting a man to power enslaves the laws and subjects the city to factions using violence and stirring up sedition contrary to law him we will deem the greatest enemy of the whole state But he who takes no part in such proceedings and being one of the chief magistrates of the state has no knowledge of the treason, or having knowledge of it by reason of cowardice does not interfere on behalf of his country such an one we must consider nearly as bad Every man who is worth anything will inform the magistrates and bring the conspirator to trial for making a violent and illegal attempt to change the government The judges of such cases shall be the same as of the robbers of temples and let the whole proceeding be carried on in the same way and the vote of the majority condemn to death But let there be a general rule that the disgrace and punishment of the father is not to be visited on the children except in the case of some one whose father grandfather and great grandfather have successively undergone the penalty of death Such persons the city shall send away with all their possessions to the city and country of their ancestors, retaining only and wholly their appointed lot And out of the citizens who have more than one son of not less than ten years of age they shall select ten whom their father or grandfather by the mother s or father s side shall appoint and let them send to Delphi the names of those who are selected and him whom the God chooses they shall establish as heir of the house which has failed and may he have better fortune than his predecessors!

Cle Very good

Ath Once more let there be a third general law respecting the judges who are to give judgment and the manner of conducting suits against those who are tried on an accusation of treason [857] and as concerning the remaining or departure of their descendants—there shall be one law for all three for the traitor and the robber of temples and the subverter by violence of the laws of the state For a thief whether he steal much or little, let there be one law and one punishment for all alike in the first place let him pay double the amount of the theft if he be convicted and if he have so much over and above the allotment —if he have not, he shall be bound until he pay the penalty or persuade him who has obtained the sentence against him to forgive him. But if a person be con icted of a theft against the state, then if he can persuade the city or if he will pay back twice the amount of the theft, he shall be set free from his bonds.

Cle What makes you say Stranger that a theft is all one, whether the thief may have tak en much or little, and e ther from sacred or sec ular places—and these are not the only differ ences in thefts —seeing then, that they are of many kinds, ought not the legislator to adapt himself to them and impose upon them entire ly different penalties?

Ath Excellent. I was running on too fast, Cleinias, and you impinged upon me, and brought me to my senses reminding me of what, indeed, had occurred to my mind already that legislation was never yet rightly worked out, as I may say in passing —Do you remember the image in which I likened the men for whom laws are now made to slaves who are doctored by slaves? For of this you may be very sure, that if one of those empirical physi cians, who practise medicine without science, ere to come upon the gentleman physician talking to his gentleman patient, and using the language almost of philosophy beginning at the beginning of the d sease and discoursing about the whole nature of the body he would burst into a hearty laugh—he would say what most of those who are called doctors al ays have at their tongue s end —Foolish fellow he would say you ar not healing the sick man, but you are educating him and he does not want to be made a doctor but to get well

Cle And would he not be right?

Ath Perhaps he would and he might remark upon us, that he who discourses about laws, as w are n w doing, is giving the citizens educa tion and not laws that would be rather a tell ing observation.

Cle Very true.

Ath But we are fortunate

[858] Cl In what way?

Ath Inasmuch as we are not compelled to g la s, but e may take into con ideration e ery form of go ernment, and ascertain what is best and what is most needful, and how they may both be carr ed into execution and we may also, it we pl ase, at this very moment hoose what best, or if we p efer what is most nec essary—wh h shall we do?

Cle There is something ridiculous, Stranger in our proposing such an alternative as if we were legislators simply bound under some great necessity which cannot be deferred to the morrow But we as I may by the grace of Heav en affirm like gatherers of stones or beginners of some composite work may gather a heap of materials and out of this at our leisure select what is suitable for our projected construction. Let us then suppose ourselves to be at leisure, not of necessity building but rather like men who are partly providing materials, and part ly putting them together And we may truly say that some of our laws like stones, are al ready fixed in their places, and others lie at hand

Ath Certainly in that case, Cleinias our view of law will be more in accordance with nature For there is another matter affecting legislators which I must earnestly entreat you to consider

Cle What is it?

Ath There are many writings to be found in cities and among them there are discourses composed by legislators as well as by other per sons.

Cle To be sure

Ath Shall we give heed rather to the writings of those others—poets and the like who either in metre or out of metre have recorded their advice about the conduct of life, and not to the writings of legislators? or shall we give heed to them above all?

Cle Yes to them far above all others.

Ath And ought the legislator alone, among writers to withhold his opinion about the beau tiful the good, and the just, and not to teach what they are and how they are to be pursued by those who intend to be happy?

Cle Certainly not.

Ath And is it disgraceful for Homer and Tyrtaeus and other poets to lay down evil pre cepts in their writings respecting life and the pursu ts of men but not so disgraceful for Ly curgus and Solon and others who were legis lators as well as writers? Is it not true that of all the writings to be found in cities, those hich relate to laws, when you unfold and read them ought to be by far the noblest and the best? [859] and should not other ritings either agree with them, or if they disagree, be deemed ridiculous? We should consider whether the la s of states ought not to have the character of loving and w se parents rather than of ty rants and masters, who command and threaten, and after writing their decrees on walls, go their ways and whether in discoursing of laws we should not take the gentler view of them which may or may not be attainable—at any rate we will show our readiness to entertain such a view and be prepared to undergo whatever may be the result And may the result be good and if God be gracious it will be good!

Cle Excellent let us do as you say

Ath Then we will now consider accurately as we proposed what relates to robbers of temples and all kinds of thefts and offences in general and we must not be annoyed if in the course of legislation we have enacted some things and have not made up our minds about some others for as yet we are not legislators, but we may soon be Let us if you please consider these matters

Cle By all means

Ath Concerning all things honourable and just let us then endeavour to ascertain how far we are consistent with ourselves and how far we are inconsistent and how far the many from whom at any rate we should profess a desire to differ agree and disagree among themselves

Cle What are the inconsistencies which you observe in us?

Ath I will endeavour to explain If I am not mistaken we are all agreed that justice, and just men and things and actions are all fair and if a person were to maintain that just men even when they are deformed in body are still perfectly beautiful in respect of the excellent justice of their minds no one would say that there was any inconsistency in this

Cle They would be quite right

Ath Perhaps but let us consider further that if all things which are just are fair and honourable in the term all we must include just sufferings which are the correlatives of just actions

Cle And what is the inference?

Ath The inference is that a just action in partaking of the just partakes also in the same degree of the fair and honourable

Cle Certainly

Ath And must not a suffering which partakes of the just principle be admitted to be in the same degree fair and honourable [860] if the argument is consistently carried out?

Cle True

Ath But then if we admit suffering to be just and yet dishonourable and the term dishonourable is applied to justice will not the just and the honourable disagree?

Cle What do you mean?

Ath A thing not difficult to understand the laws which have been already enacted would seem to announce principles directly opposed to what we are saying

Cle To what?

Ath We had enacted if I am not mistaken that the robber of temples and he who was the enemy of law and order, might justly be put to death and we were proceeding to make divers other enactments of a similar nature But we stopped short because we saw that these sufferings are infinite in number and degree, and that they are, at once the most just and also the most dishonourable of all sufferings And if this be true are not the just and the honourable at one time all the same and at another time in the most diametrical opposition?

Cle Such appears to be the case

Ath In this discordant and inconsistent fashion does the language of the many rend asunder the honourable and just.

Cle Very true Stranger

Ath Then now Cleinias let us see how far we ourselves are consistent about these matters

Cle Consistent in what?

Ath I think that I have clearly stated in the former part of the discussion but if I did not, let me now state——

Cle What?

Ath That all bad men are always involuntarily bad, and from this I must proceed to draw a further inference

Cle What is it?

Ath That the unjust man may be bad but that he is bad against his will Now that an action which is voluntary should be done involuntarily is a contradiction wherefore he who maintains that injustice is involuntary will deem that the unjust does injustice involuntarily I too admit that all men do injustice involuntarily and if any contentious or disputatious person says that men are unjust against their will and yet that many do injustice willingly I do not agree with him But then how can I avoid being inconsistent with myself if you Cleinias and you Megillus say to me—Well Stranger if all this be as you say how about legislating for the city of the Magnetes—shall we legislate or not—what do you advise? Certainly we will I should reply Then will you determine for them what are voluntary and what are involuntary crimes and shall we make the punishments greater of voluntary errors and crimes and less for the involuntary? or shall we make the punishment of all to be alike [861] under the idea that there is no such thing as voluntary crime?

Cle Very good, Stranger and what shall we say in answer to these objections?

Ath That is a very fair question. In the first place, let us——

Cle Do what?

Ath Let us remember what has been well said by us already that our ideas of justice are in the highest degree confused and contradictory Bearing this in mind, let us proceed to ask ourselves once more whether we have discovered a way out of the difficulty Have we ever determined in what respect these two classes of actions differ from one another? For in all states and by all legislators whatsoever two kinds of actions have been distinguished—the one, voluntary the other involuntary and they have legislated about them accordingly But shall this new word of ours, like an oracle of God, be only spoken, and get away without giving any explanation or verification of itself? How can a word not understood be the basis of legislation? Impossible. Before proceeding to legislate, then, we must prove that they are two, and what is the difference between them, that when we impose the penalty upon either every one may understand our proposal, and be able in some way to judge whether the penalty is fitly or unfitly inflicted.

Cle I agree with you, Stranger for one of two things is certain either we must not say that all unjust acts are involuntary or we must show the meaning and truth of this statement.

Ath Of these two alternatives, the one is quite intolerable—not to speak what I believe to be the truth would be to me unlawful and unholy But if acts of injustice cannot be divided into voluntary and involuntary I must endeavour to find some other distinction between them.

Cle Very true, Stranger there cannot be two opinions among us upon that point.

Ath Reflect, then there are hurts of various kinds done by the citizens to one another in the intercourse of life, affording plentiful examples both of the voluntary and involuntary

Cle Certainly

Ath I would not have any one suppose that all these hurts are injuries, and that these injuries are of two kinds—one, voluntary and the other involuntary for the involuntary hurts of all men are quite as many and as great as the voluntary [862] And please to consider whether I am right or quite wrong in what I am going to say for I deny Clinias and Megillus, that he who harms another involuntarily does him an injury involuntarily nor should I legislate about such an act under the idea that I am legislating for an involuntary injury But I should rather say that such a hurt whether great or small, is not an injury at all and on the other hand if I am right, when a benefit is wrongly conferred the author of the benefit may often be said to injure. For I maintain, O my friends, that the mere giving or taking away of anything is not to be described either as just or unjust but the legislator has to consider whether mankind do good or harm to one another out of a just principle and intention. On the distinction between injustice and hurt he must fix his eye and when there is hurt, he must, as far as he can, make the hurt good by law and save that which is ruined, and raise up that which is fallen, and make that which is dead or wounded whole. And when compensation has been given for injustice, the law must always seek to win over the doers and sufferers of the several hurts from feelings of enmity to those of friendship

Cle Very good

Ath Then as to unjust hurts (and gains also, supposing the injustice to bring gain) of these we may heal as many as are capable of being healed, regarding them as diseases of the soul and the cure of injustice will take the following direction.

Cle What direction?

Ath When any one commits any injustice, small or great, the law will admonish and compel him either never at all to do the like again, or never voluntarily or at any rate in a far less degree and he must in addition pay for the hurt. Whether the end is to be attained by word or action, with pleasure or pain, by giving or taking away privileges, by means of fines or gifts, or in whatsoever way the law shall proceed to make a man hate injustice, and love or not hate the nature of the just—this is quite the noblest work of law But if the legislator sees any one who is incurable, for him he will appoint a law and a penalty He knows quite well that to such men themselves there is no profit in the continuance of their lives, and that they would do a double good to the rest of mankind if they would take their departure, [863] inasmuch as they would be an example to other men not to offend, and they would relieve the city of bad citizens. In such cases, and in such cases only the legislator ought to inflict death as the punishment of offences

Cle What you have said appears to me to be their ways and whether in discoursing of laws we should not take the gentler view of them which may or may not be attainable—at any rate we will show our readiness to entertain such a view and be prepared to undergo whatever may be the result And may the result be good and if God be gracious it will be good!

precincts, or even set his foot at all on his country, he shall be bound by the guardians of the law in the public prison for two years, and then go free.

Having begun to speak of homicides, let us endeavour to lay down laws concerning every different kind of homicide; and, first, concerning violent and involuntary homicides. If any one in an athletic contest, and at the public games, involuntarily kills a friend, and he dies either at the time or afterwards of the blows which he has received, or if the like misfortune happens to any one in war, or military exercises, or mimic contests of which the magistrates enjoin the practice, whether with or without arms, when he has been purified according to the law brought from Delphi relating to these matters, he shall be innocent. And so in the case of physicians, if their patient dies against their will, they shall be held guiltless by the law. And if one slay another with his own hand, but unintentionally, whether he be unarmed or have some instrument or dart in his hand, or if he kill him by administering food or drink, or by the application of fire or cold, or by suffocating him, whether he do the deed by his own hand, or by the agency of others, he shall be deemed the agent, and shall suffer one of the following penalties:—If he kill the slave of another in the belief that he is his own, he shall bear the master of the dead man harmless from loss, or shall pay a penalty of twice the value of the dead man, which the judges shall assess; but purifications must be used greater and more numerous than for those who committed homicide at the games;—what they are to be, the interpreters whom the God appoints shall be authorized to declare. And if a man kills his own slave, when he has been purified according to law he shall be quit of the homicide. And if a man kills a freeman unintentionally, he shall undergo the same purification as he did who killed the slave. But let him not forget also a tale of olden time, which is to this effect:—He who has suffered a violent end, when newly dead, if he has had the soul of a freeman in life, is angry with the author of his death; and being himself full of fear and panic by reason of his violent end, when he sees his murderer walking about in his own accustomed haunts, he is stricken with terror and becomes disordered, and this disorder of his, aided by the guilty recollection of the other, is communicated by him with overwhelming force to the murderer and his deeds. Wherefore also the murderer must go out of the way of his victim for the entire period of a year, and not himself be found in any spot which was familiar to him throughout the country. And if the dead man be a stranger, the homicide shall be kept from the country of the stranger during a like period. If any one voluntarily obeys this law, the next of kin to the deceased, seeing all that has happened, shall take pity on him, and make peace with him, and show him all gentleness. But if any one is disobedient, and either ventures to go to any of the temples and sacrifice unpurified, or will not continue in exile during the appointed time, the next of kin to the deceased shall proceed against him for murder; and if he be convicted, every part of his punishment shall be doubled.

And if the next of kin do not proceed against the perpetrator of the crime, then the pollution shall be deemed to fall upon his own head;—the murdered man will fix the guilt upon his kinsman, and he who has a mind to proceed against him may compel him to be absent from his country during five years, according to law. If a stranger unintentionally kill a stranger who is dwelling in the city, he who likes shall prosecute the cause according to the same rules. If he be a metic, let him be absent for a year, or if he be an entire stranger, in addition to the purification, whether he have slain a stranger or a metic, or a citizen, he shall be banished for life from the country which is in possession of our laws. And if he return contrary to law, let the guardians of the law punish him with death; and let them hand over his property, if he have any, to him who is next of kin to the sufferer. And if he be wrecked, and driven on the coast against his will, he shall take up his abode on the seashore, wetting his feet in the sea, and watching for an opportunity of sailing; but if he be brought by land, and is not his own master, let the magistrate whom he first comes across in the city release him and send him unharmed over the border.

If any one slays a freeman with his own hand, and the deed be done in passion, in the case of such actions we must begin by making a distinction. For a deed is done from passion either when men suddenly and without intention to kill cause the death of another by blows and the like on a momentary impulse, and are sorry for the deed immediately afterwards; or again, when after having been insulted in deed or word men pursue revenge, and kill a person intentionally, and are not sorry for the act. And, therefore, we must assume that these homicides are of two kinds, both of them arising from pas-very reasonable but will you favour me by stating a little more clearly the difference between hurt and injustice and the various complications of the voluntary and involuntary which enter into them?

Ath I will endeavour to do as you wish — Concerning the soul thus much would be generally said and allowed that one element in her nature is passion which may be described either as a state or a part of her and is hard to be striven against and contended with and by irrational force overturns many things

Cle Very true

Ath And pleasure is not the same with passion but has an opposite power working her will by persuasion and by the force of deceit in all things

Cle Quite true

Ath A man may truly say that ignorance is a third cause of crimes Ignorance however may be conveniently divided by the legislator into two sorts there is simple ignorance which is the source of lighter offences and double ignorance which is accompanied by a conceit of wisdom and he who is under the influence of the latter fancies that he knows all about matters of which he knows nothing This second kind of ignorance when possessed of power and strength will be held by the legislator to be the source of great and monstrous crimes but when attended with weakness will only result in the errors of children and old men and these he will treat as errors and will make laws accordingly for those who commit them which will be the mildest and most merciful of all laws

Cle You are perfectly right.

Ath We all of us remark of one man that he is superior to pleasure and passion and of another that he is inferior to them and this is true[1]

Cle Certainly

Ath But no one was ever yet heard to say that one of us is superior and another inferior to ignorance

Cle Very true

Ath We are speaking of motives which incite men to the fulfilment of their will although an individual may be often drawn by them in opposite directions at the same time

Cle Yes often

Ath And now I can define to you clearly and without ambiguity what I mean by the just and unjust according to my notion of them —When anger and fear and pleasure

[1] Cf Republic iv 430 supra i 626 ff

and pain and jealousies and desires, [864] tyrannize over the soul whether they do any harm or not—I call all this injustice. But when the opinion of the best in whatever part of human nature states or individuals may suppose that to dwell has dominion in the soul and orders the life of every man even if it be sometimes mistaken yet what is done in accordance therewith and the principle in individuals which obeys this rule and is best for the whole life of man is to be called just although the hurt done by mistake is thought by many to be involuntary injustice Leaving the question of names about which we are not going to quarrel and having already delineated three sources of error we may begin by recalling them somewhat more vividly to our memory —One of them was of the painful sort, which we denominate anger and fear

Cle Quite right

Ath There was a second consisting of pleasures and desires and a third of hopes which aimed at true opinion about the best The latter being subdivided into three, we now get five sources of actions and for these five we will make laws of two kinds

Cle What are the two kinds?

Ath There is one kind of actions done by violence and in the light of day and another kind of actions which are done in darkness and with secret deceit or sometimes both with violence and deceit the laws concerning these last ought to have a character of severity

Cle Naturally

Ath And now let us return from this digression and complete the work of legislation Laws have been already enacted by us concerning the robbers of the Gods and concerning traitors, and also concerning those who corrupt the laws for the purpose of subverting the government. A man may very likely commit some of these crimes either in a state of madness or when affected by disease or under the influence of extreme old age or in a fit of childish wantonness himself no better than a child And if this be made evident to the judges elected to try the cause on the appeal of the criminal or his advocate and he be judged to have been in this state when he committed the offence he shall simply pay for the hurt which he may have done to another but he shall be exempt from other penalties unless he have slain some one and have on his hands the stain of blood And in that case he shall go to another land and country and there dwell for a year and if he return before the expiration of the time which the law shall not come under the same roof, or share in the sacred rites of those whom they have deprived of their brethren, or of their children. [869] And he who is disobedient shall be justly liable to the law concerning impiety which relates to these matters. If any one is so violent in his passion against his parents, that in the madness of his anger he dares to kill one of them, if the murdered person before dying freely forgives the murderer let him undergo the punishment which is assigned to those who have been guilty of involuntary homicide, and do as they do, and he shall be pure. But if he be not acquitted, the perpetrator of such a deed shall be amenable to many laws —he shall be amenable to the extreme punishments for assault, and impiety and robbing of temples, for he has robbed his parent of life, and if a man could be slain more than once, most justly would he who in a fit of passion has slain father or mother undergo many deaths. How can he, whom, alone of all men, even in defence of his life, and when about to suffer death at the hands of his parents, no law will allow to kill his father or his mother who are the authors of his being, and whom the legislator will command to endure any extremity rather than do this—how can he, I say lawfully receive any other punishment? Let death then be the appointed punishment of him who in a fit of passion slays his father or his mother But if brother kills brother in a civil broil, or under other like circumstances, if the other has begun, and he only defends himself, let him be free from guilt, as he would be if he had slain an enemy: and the same rule will apply if a citizen kill a citizen, or a stranger a stranger Or if a stranger kill a citizen or a citizen a stranger in self-defence, let him be free from guilt in like manner: and so in the case of a slave who has killed a slave: but if a slave have killed a freeman in self-defence, let him be subject to the same laws as he who has killed a father: and let the law about the remission of penalties in the case of parricide apply equally to every other remission. Whenever any sufferer of his own accord remits the guilt of homicide to another under the idea that his act was involuntary let the perpetrator of the deed undergo a purification and remain in exile for a year according to law

Enough has been said of murders violent and involuntary and committed in passion we have now to speak of voluntary crimes done with injustice of every kind and with premeditation, through the influence of pleasures, and desires, and jealousies.

Cle Very good.

Ath Let us first speak, as far as we are able, of their various kinds. The greatest cause of them is lust, which gets the mastery of the soul maddened by desire [870] and this is most commonly found to exist where the passion reigns which is strongest and most prevalent among the mass of mankind I mean where the power of wealth breeds endless desires of never to-be satisfied acquisition, originating in natural disposition, and a miserable want of education. Of this want of education, the false praise of wealth which is bruited about both among Hellenes and barbarians is the cause: they deem that to be the first of goods which in reality is only the third. And in this way they wrong both posterity and themselves, for nothing can be nobler and better than that the truth about wealth should be spoken in all states—namely that riches are for the sake of the body as the body is for the sake of the soul. They are good, and wealth is intended by nature to be for the sake of them, and is therefore inferior to them both, and third in order of excellence. This argument teaches us that he who would be happy ought not to seek to be rich, or rather he should seek to be rich justly and temperately and then there would be no murders in states requiring to be purged away by other murders. But now as I said at first, avarice is the chiefest cause and source of the worst trials for voluntary homicide. A second cause is ambition this creates jealousies, which are troublesome companions, above all to the jealous man himself, and in a less degree to the chiefs of the state. And a third cause is cowardly and unjust fear which has been the occasion of many murders. When a man is doing or has done something which he desires that no one should know him to be doing or to have done, he will take the life of those who are likely to inform of such things, if he have no other means of getting rid of them. Let this be said as a prelude concerning crimes of violence in general and I must not omit to mention a tradition which is firmly believed by many and has been received by them from those who are learned in the mysteries. they say that such deeds will be punished in the world below and also that when the perpetrators return to this world they will pay the natural penalty which is due to the sufferer and end their lives in like manner by the hand of another If he who is about to commit murder believes this, and is made by the mere prelude to dread such a penalty there is no need to proceed with the proclamation of the law But if he will not lis-

sion which may be justly said to be in a mean between the voluntary and involuntary [867] at the same time they are neither of them any thing more than a likeness or shadow of either He who treasures up his anger and avenges himself not immediately and at the moment but with insidious design and after an interval is like the voluntary but he who does not treasure up his anger and takes vengeance on the instant and without malice prepense approaches to the involuntary and yet even he is not altogether involuntary but is only the image or shadow of the involuntary wherefore about homicides committed in hot blood there is a difficulty in determining whether in legislating we shall reckon them as voluntary or as partly involuntary The best and truest view is to regard them respectively as likenesses only of the voluntary and involuntary and to distinguish them accordingly as they are done with or without premeditation And we should make the penalties heavier for those who commit homicide with angry premeditation and lighter for those who do not premeditate but smite upon the instant for that which is like a greater evil should be punished more severely and that which is like a less evil should be punished less severely this shall be the rule of our laws

Ath Let us proceed —If any one slays a free man with his own hand and the deed be done in a moment of anger and without premeditation let the offender suffer in other respects as the involuntary homicide would have suffered and also undergo an exile of two years that he may learn to school his passions But he who slays another from passion yet with premeditation shall in other respects suffer as the former and to this shall be added an exile of three instead of two years—his punishment is to be longer because his passion is greater The manner of their return shall be on this wise (and here the law has difficulty in determining exactly for in some cases the murderer who is judged by the law to be the worse may really be the less cruel and he who is judged the less cruel may be really the worse and may have executed the murder in a more savage manner whereas the other may have been gentler But in general the degrees of guilt will be such as we have described them Of all these things the guardians of the law must take cognisance) —When a homicide of either kind has completed his term of exile the guardians shall send twelve judges to the borders of the land these during the interval shall have informed themselves of the actions of the criminals and they shall judge respecting their pardon and reception [868] and the homicides shall abide by their judgment But if after they have returned home any one of them in a moment of anger repeats the deed let him be an exile, and return no more or if he returns let him suffer as the stranger was to suffer in a similar case He who kills his own slave shall undergo a purification but if he kills the slave of another in anger he shall pay twice the amount of the loss to his owner And if any homicide is disobedient to the law and without purification pollutes the agora or the games or the temples he who pleases may bring to trial the next of kin to the dead man for permitting him and the murderer with him and may compel the one to exact and the other to suffer a double amount of fines and purifications and the accuser shall himself receive the fine in accordance with the law If a slave in a fit of passion kills his master the kindred of the deceased man may do with the murderer (provided only they do not spare his life) whatever they please and they will be pure or if he kills a freeman who is not his master the owner shall give up the slave to the relatives of the deceased and they shall be under an obligation to put him to death but this may be done in any manner which they please And if (which is a rare occurrence but does sometimes happen) a father or a mother in a moment of passion slays a son or daughter by blows or some other violence the slayer shall undergo the same purification as in other cases and be exiled during three years but when the exile returns the wife shall separate from the husband and the husband from the wife and they shall never afterwards beget children together or live under the same roof or partake of the same sacred rites with those whom they have deprived of a child or of a brother And he who is impious and disobedient in such a case shall be brought to trial for impiety by any one who pleases If in a fit of anger a husband kills his wedded wife or the wife her husband the slayer shall undergo the same purification and the term of exile shall be three years And when he who has committed any such crime returns let him have no communication in sacred rites with his children neither let him sit at the same table with them and the father or son who disobeys shall be liable to be brought to trial for impiety by any one who pleases If a brother o a sister in a fit of passion kills a brother or a sister they shall undergo purification and exile as was the case with parents who killed their offspring they be slain at some time or other by his children—if a mother he shall of necessity take a woman's nature, and lose his life at the hands of his offspring in after ages for where the blood of a family has been polluted there is no other purification, nor can the pollution be washed out until the homicidal soul which did the deed has given life for life [873] and has propitiated and laid to sleep the wrath of the whole family These are the retributions of Heaven, and by such punishments men should be deterred But if they are not deterred, and any one should be incited by some fatality to deprive his father or mother or brethren, or children, of life voluntarily and of purpose for him the earthly lawgiver legislates as follows —There shall be the same proclamations about outlawry and there shall be the same sureties which have been enacted in the former cases. But in his case, if he be convicted, the servants of the judges and the magistrates shall slay him at an appointed place without the city where three ways meet, and there expose his body naked, and each of the magistrates on behalf of the whole city shall take a stone and cast it upon the head of the dead man, and so deliver the city from pollution after that, they shall bear him to the borders of the land, and cast him forth unburied, according to law And what shall he suffer who slays him who of all men as they say is his own best friend? I mean the suicide, who deprives himself by violence of his appointed share of life, not because the law of the state requires him, nor yet under the compulsion of some painful and inevitable misfortune which has come upon him, nor because he has had to suffer from irremediable and intolerable shame but who from sloth or want of manliness imposes upon himself an unjust penalty For him what ceremonies there are to be of purification and burial God knows, and about these the next of kin should enquire of the interpreters and of the laws thereto relating, and do according to their injunctions They who meet their death in this way shall be buried alone and none shall be laid by their side they shall be buried ingloriously in the borders of the twelve portions of the land in such places as are uncultivated and nameless, and no column or inscription shall mark the place of their interment. And if a beast of burden or other animal cause the death of any one except in the case of anything of that kind happening to a competitor in the public contests, the kinsmen of the deceased shall prosecute the slayer for murder and the wardens of the country such and so many as the kinsmen appoint, shall try the cause, and let the beast when condemned be slain by them and let them cast it beyond the borders And if any lifeless thing deprive a man of life, except in the case of a thunderbolt or other fatal dart sent from the Gods—whether a man is killed by lifeless objects falling upon him [874] or by his falling upon them, the nearest of kin shall appoint the nearest neighbour to be a judge and thereby acquit himself and the whole family of guilt And he shall cast forth the guilty thing beyond the border as has been said about the animals.

If a man is found dead, and his murderer be unknown and after a diligent search cannot be detected, there shall be the same proclamation as in the previous cases, and the same interdict on the murderer and having proceeded against him they shall proclaim in the agora by a herald, that he who has slain such and such a person and has been convicted of murder shall not set his foot in the temples, nor at all in the country of the murdered man, and if he appears and is discovered, he shall die, and be cast forth unburied beyond the border Let this one law then be laid down by us about murder and let cases of this sort be so regarded

And now let us say in what cases and under what circumstances the murderer is rightly free from guilt —If a man catch a thief coming into his house by night to steal and he take and kill him, or if he slay a footpad in self-defence, he shall be guiltless And any one who does violence to a free woman or a youth, shall be slain with impunity by the injured person or by his or her father or brothers or sons If a man find his wife suffering violence, he may kill the violator and be guiltless in the eye of the law or if a person kill another in warding off death from his father or mother or children or brethren or wife who are doing no wrong he shall assuredly be guiltless.

Thus much as to the nurture and education of the living soul of man having which he can and without which if he unfortunately be without them he cannot live and also concerning the punishments which are to be inflicted for violent deaths, let thus much be enacted Of the nurture and education of the body we have spoken before and next in order we have to speak of deeds of violence voluntary and involuntary which men do to one another these we will now distinguish as far as we are able, according to their nature and number and determine what will be the suitable penalties of each and so assign to them their proper place ten let the following law be declared and registered against him [871]

Whoever shall wrongfully and of design slay with his own hand any of his kinsmen shall in the first place be deprived of legal privileges and he shall not pollute the temples or the agora or the harbours or any other place of meeting whether he is forbidden of men or not for the law which represents the whole state forbids him and always is and will be in the attitude of forbidding him And if a cousin or nearer relative of the deceased, whether on the male or female side does not prosecute the homicide when he ought and have him proclaimed an outlaw, he shall in the first place be involved in the pollution and incur the hatred of the Gods, even as the curse of the law stirs up the voices of men against him and in the second place he shall be liable to be prosecuted by any one who is willing to inflict retribution on behalf of the dead And he who would avenge a murder shall observe all the precautionary ceremonies of lavation and any others which the God commands in cases of this kind Let him have proclamation made, and then go forth and compel the perpetrator to suffer the execution of justice according to the law Now the legislator may easily show that these things must be accomplished by prayers and sacrifices to certain Gods who are concerned with the prevention of murders in states. But who these Gods are and what should be the true manner of instituting such trials with due regard to religion the guardians of the law aided by the interpreters and the prophets, and the God shall determine, and when they have determined let them carry on the prosecution at law The cause shall have the same judges[1] who are appointed to decide in the case of those who plunder temples Let him who is convicted be punished with death and let him not be buried in the country of the murdered man for this would be shameless as well as impious But if he fly and will not stand his trial let him fly for ever or if he set foot anywhere on any part of the murdered man's country let any relation of the deceased or any other citizen who may first happen to meet with him kill him with impunity or bind and deliver him to those among the judges of the case who are magistrates that they may put him to death And let the prosecutor demand surety of him whom he prosecutes three sureties sufficient in the opinion of the magistrates who try the cause shall be provided by him and they shall undertake to produce him at the trial But if he be unwilling or unable to provide sureties then the magistrates shall take him and keep him in bonds, and produce him at the day of trial

[872] If a man do not commit a murder with his own hand, but contrives the death of another and is the author of the deed in intention and design and he continues to dwell in the city having his soul not pure of the guilt of murder let him be tried in the same way except in what relates to the sureties and also if he be found guilty his body after execution may have burial in his native land but in all other respects his case shall be as the former and whether a stranger shall kill a citizen or a citizen a stranger or a slave a slave there shall be no difference as touching murder by one's own hand or by contrivance, except in the matter of sureties and these as has been said shall be required of the actual murderer only and he who brings the accusation shall bind them over at the time. If a slave be convicted of slaying a freeman voluntarily either by his own hand or by contrivance, let the public executioner take him in the direction of the sepulchre, to a place whence he can see the tomb of the dead man, and inflict upon him as many stripes as the person who caught him orders, and if he survive, let him put him to death And if any one kills a slave who has done no wrong because he is afraid that he may inform of some base and evil deeds of his own, or for any similar reason, in such a case let him pay the penalty of murder as he would have done if he had slain a citizen There are things about which it is terrible and unpleasant to legislate, but impossible not to legislate. If for example, there should be murders of kinsmen either perpetrated by the hands of kinsmen or by their contrivance, voluntary and purely malicious, which most often happen in ill regulated and ill-educated states and may perhaps occur even in a country where a man would not expect to find them we must repeat once more the tale which we narrated a little while ago in the hope that he who hears us will be the more disposed to abstain voluntarily on these grounds from murders which are utterly abominable For the myth or saying or whatever we ought to call it, has been plainly set forth by priests of old they have pronounced that the justice which guards and avenges the blood of kindred follows the law of retaliation and ordains that he who has done any murderous act should of necessity suffer that which he has done He who has slain a father shall himself intention to slay another who is not his enemy, and whom the law does not permit him to slay, and he wounds him, [877] but is unable to kill him, he who had the intent and has wounded him is not to be pitied—he deserves no consideration, but should be regarded as a murderer and be tried for murder. Still having respect to the fortune which has in a manner favoured him, and to the providence which in pity to him and to the wounded man saved the one from a fatal blow and the other from an accursed fate and calamity—as a thank-offering to this deity and in order not to oppose his will—in such a case the law will remit the punishment of death, and only compel the offender to emigrate to a neighbouring city for the rest of his life, where he shall remain in the enjoyment of all his possessions. But if he have injured the wounded man, he shall make such compensation for the injury as the court deciding the cause shall assess, and the same judges shall decide who would have decided if the man had died of his wounds. And if a child intentionally wound his parents, or a servant his master, death shall be the penalty. And if a brother or a sister intentionally wound a brother or a sister and is found guilty, death shall be the penalty. And if a husband wound a wife, or a wife a husband, with intent to kill, let him or her undergo perpetual exile; if they have sons or daughters who are still young, the guardians shall take care of their property and have charge of the children as orphans. If their sons are grown up, they shall be under no obligation to support the exiled parent, but they shall possess the property themselves. And if he who meets with such a misfortune has no children, the kindred of the exiled man to the degree of sons of cousins, both on the male and female side, shall meet together, and after taking counsel with the guardians of the law and the priests, shall appoint a 5040th citizen to be the heir of the house, considering and reasoning that no house of all the 5040 belongs to the inhabitant or to the whole family, but is the public and private property of the state. Now the state should seek to have its houses as holy and happy as possible. And if any one of the houses be unfortunate, and stained with impiety, and the owner leave no posterity, but dies unmarried, or married and childless, having suffered death as the penalty of murder or some other crime committed against the Gods or against his fellow-citizens, of which death is the penalty distinctly laid down in the law; or if any of the citizens be in perpetual exile, and also childless, that house shall first of all be purified and undergo expiation according to law; and then let the kinsmen of the house, as we were just now saying, and the guardians of the law [878] meet and consider what family there is in the state which is of the highest repute for virtue and also for good fortune, in which there are a number of sons; from that family let them take one and introduce him to the father and forefathers of the dead man as their son, and, for the sake of the omen, let him be called so, that he may be the continuer of their family, the keeper of their hearth, and the minister of their sacred rites with better fortune than his father had; and when they have made this supplication, they shall make him heir according to law, and the offending person they shall leave nameless and childless and portionless when calamities such as these overtake him.

Now the boundaries of some things do not touch one another, but there is a borderland which comes in between, preventing them from touching. And we were saying that actions done from passion are of this nature, and come in between the voluntary and involuntary. If a person be convicted of having inflicted wounds in a passion, in the first place he shall pay twice the amount of the injury, if the wound be curable, or, if incurable, four times the amount of the injury; or if the wound be curable, and at the same time cause great and notable disgrace to the wounded person, he shall pay fourfold. And whenever any one in wounding another injures not only the sufferer, but also the city, and makes him incapable of defending his country against the enemy, he, besides the other penalties, shall pay a penalty for the loss which the state has incurred. And the penalty shall be, that in addition to his own times of service, he shall serve on behalf of the disabled person, and shall take his place in war; or, if he refuse, he shall be liable to be convicted by law of refusal to serve. The compensation for the injury, whether to be twofold or threefold or fourfold, shall be fixed by the judges who convict him. And if, in like manner, a brother wounds a brother, the parents and kindred of either sex, including the children of cousins, whether on the male or female side, shall meet, and when they have judged the cause, they shall entrust the assessment of damages to the parents, as is natural; and if the estimate be disputed, then the kinsmen on the male side shall make the estimate, or if they cannot, they shall commit the matter to the guardians of the law. And when similar charges of wounding are brought by in the series of our enactments The poorest legislator will have no difficulty in determining that wounds and mutilations arising out of wounds should follow next in order after deaths Let wounds be divided as homicides were divided—into those which are involuntary and which are given in passion or from fear and those inflicted voluntarily and with premeditation Concerning all this we must make some such proclamation as the following —Mankind must have laws and conform to them [875] or their life would be as bad as that of the most savage beast [1] And the reason of this is that no man's nature is able to know what is best for human society or knowing always able and willing to do what is best In the first place there is a difficulty in apprehending that the true art of politics is concerned not with private but with public good (for public good binds together states but private only distracts them) and that both the public and private good as well of individuals as of states is greater when the state and not the individual is first considered In the second place although a person knows in the abstract that this is true yet if he be possessed of absolute and irresponsible power he will never remain firm in his principles or persist in regarding the public good as primary in the state and the private good as secondary Human nature will be always drawing him into avarice and selfishness avoiding pain and pursuing pleasure without any reason and will bring these to the front obscuring the juster and better and so working darkness in his soul will at last fill with evils both him and the whole city For if a man were born so divinely gifted that he could naturally apprehend the truth he would have no need of laws to rule over him for there is no law or order which is above knowledge nor can mind without impiety be deemed the subject or slave of any man but rather the lord of all I speak of mind true and free and in harmony with nature But then there is no such mind anywhere, or at least not much and therefore we must choose law and order which are second best These look at things as they exist for the most part only and are unable to survey the whole of them And therefore I have spoken as I have

And now we will determine what penalty he ought to pay or suffer who has hurt or wounded another Any one may easily imagine the questions which have to be asked in all such cases —What did he wound or whom or how or when? for there are innumerable particulars of this sort which greatly vary from one another And to allow courts of law to determine all these things or not to determine any of them is alike impossible There is one particular which they must determine in all cases—the question of fact And then again [876] that the legislator should not permit them to determine what punishment is to be inflicted in any of these cases but should himself decide about all of them small or great is next to impossible.

Cle Then what is to be the inference?

Ath The inference is that some things should be left to courts of law, others the legislator must decide for himself

Cle And what ought the legislator to decide and what ought he to leave to the courts of law [2]

Ath I may reply that in a state in which the courts are bad and mute because the judges conceal their opinions and decide causes clandestinely or what is worse, when they are disorderly and noisy as in a theatre clapping or hooting in turn this or that orator—I say that then there is a very serious evil which affects the whole state Unfortunate is the necessity of having to legislate for such courts but where the necessity exists the legislator should only allow them to ordain the penalties for the smallest offences if the state for which he is legislating be of this character he must take most matters into his own hands and speak distinctly But when a state has good courts and the judges are well trained and scrupulously tested, the determination of the penalties or punishments which shall be inflicted on the guilty may fairly and with advantage be left to them And we are not to be blamed for not legislating concerning all that large class of matters which judges far worse educated than ours would be able to determine, assigning to each offence what is due both to the perpetrator and to the sufferer We believe those for whom we are legislating to be best able to judge and therefore to them the greater part may be left At the same time as I have often said we should exhibit to the judges as we have done the outline and form of the punishments to be inflicted and then they will not transgress the just rule That was an excellent practice which we observed before and which now that we are resuming the work of legislation may with advantage be repeated by us

Let the enactment about wounding be in the following terms —If any one has a purpose and

Laws are partly framed for the sake of good men, in order to instruct them how they may live on friendly terms with one another and partly for the sake of those who refuse to be instructed, whose spirit cannot be subdued, or softened, or hindered from plunging into evil These are the persons who cause the word to be spoken which I am about to utter for them the legislator legislates of necessity and in the hope that there may be no need of his laws. He who shall dare to lay violent hands upon his father or mother or any still older relative, having no fear either of the wrath of the Gods above, [881] or of the punishments that are spoken of in the world below but transgresses in contempt of ancient and universal traditions as though he were too wise to believe in them, requires some extreme measure of prevention. Now death is not the worst that can happen to men far worse are the punishments which are said to pursue them in the world below But although they are most true tales, they work on such souls no prevention for if they had any effect there would be no slayers of mothers, or impious hands lifted up against parents and therefore the punishments of this world which are inflicted during life ought not in such cases to fall short, if possible, of the terrors of the world below Let our enactment then be as follows —If a man dare to strike his father or his mother or their fathers or mothers, he being at the time of sound mind, then let any one who is at hand come to the rescue as has been already said, and the metic or stranger who comes to the rescue shall be called to the first place in the games but if he do not come he shall suffer the punishment of perpetual exile He who is not a metic, if he comes to the rescue, shall have praise, and if he do not come, blame. And if a slave come to the rescue, let him be made free, but if he do not come to the rescue, let him receive 100 strokes of the whip, by order of the wardens of the agora if the occurrence take place in the agora or if some here in the city beyond the limits of the agora, any warden of the city who is in residence shall punish him or if in the country then the commanders of the wardens of the country If those who are near at the time be inhabitants of the same place, whether they be youths, or men, or women, let them come to the rescue and denounce him as the impious one and he who does not come to the rescue shall fall under the curse of Zeus, the God of kindred and of ancestors, according to law And if any one is found guilty of assaulting a parent, let him in the first place be for ever banished from the city into the country and let him abstain from the temples and if he do not abstain, the wardens of the country shall punish him with blows, or in any way which they please, and if he return he shall be put to death And if any freeman eat or drink, or have any other sort of intercourse with him, or only meeting him have voluntarily touched him, he shall not enter into any temple, nor into the agora, nor into the city until he is purified for he should consider that he has become tainted by a curse. And if he disobeys the law and pollutes the city and the temples contrary to law and one of the magistrates sees him and does not indict him, when he gives in his account this omission shall be a most serious charge.

Cf. -60.

[882] If a slave strike a freeman, whether a stranger or a citizen, let any one who is present come to the rescue, or pay the penalty already mentioned and let the bystanders bind him, and deliver him up to the injured person, and he receiving him shall put him in chains and inflict on him as many stripes as he pleases but having punished him he must surrender him to his master according to law and not deprive him of his property Let the law be as follows —The slave who strikes a freeman, not at the command of the magistrates, his owner shall receive bound from the man whom he has stricken, and not release him until the slave has persuaded the man whom he has stricken that he ought to be released And let there be the same laws about women in relation to women, and about men and women in relation to one another

BOOK X

[884] And now having spoken of assaults let us sum up all acts of violence under a single law which shall be as follows —No one shall take or carry away any of his neighbour's goods, neither shall he use anything which is his neighbour's without the consent of the owner for these are the offences which are and have been, and will ever be, the source of all the aforesaid evils The greatest of them are excesses and insolences of youth, and are offences against the greatest when they are done against religion and especially great when in violation of public and holy rites, or of the partly-common rites in which tribes and phratries share [885] and in the second degree great when they are committed against private rites and sepulchres, and in the third degree (not to re-

children against their parents those who are more than sixty years of age having children of their own not adopted, shall be required to decide and if any one is convicted, they shall determine whether he or she ought to die or suffer some other punishment either greater than death [879] or at any rate, not much less A kinsman of the offender shall not be allowed to judge the cause not even if he be of the age which is prescribed by the law If a slave in a fit of anger wound a freeman the owner of the slave shall give him up to the wounded man who may do as he pleases with him and if he do not give him up he shall himself make good the injury And if any one says that the slave and the wounded man are conspiring together let him argue the point and if he is cast he shall pay for the wrong three times over but if he gains his case the freeman who conspired with the slave shall be liable to an action for kidnapping And if any one unintentionally wounds another he shall simply pay for the harm, for no legislator is able to control chance In such a case the judges shall be the same as those who are appointed in the case of children suing their parents and they shall estimate the amount of the injury

All the preceding injuries and every kind of assault are deeds of violence and every man woman or child ought to consider that the elder has the precedence of the younger in honour both among the Gods and also among men who would live in security and happiness Wherefore it is a foul thing and hateful to the Gods to see an elder man assaulted by a younger in the city and it is reasonable that a young man when struck by an elder should lightly endure his anger laying up in store for himself a like honour when he is old Let this be the law —Every one shall reverence his elder in word and deed he shall respect any one who is twenty years older than himself whether male or female regarding him or her as his father or mother and he shall abstain from laying hands on any one who is of an age to have been his father or his mother out of reverence to the Gods who preside over birth similarly he shall keep his hands from a stranger whether he be an old inhabitant or newly arrived he shall not venture to correct such an one by blows either as the aggressor or in self defence If he thinks that some stranger has struck him out of wantonness or insolence and ought to be punished he shall take him to the wardens of the city but let him not strike him that the stranger may be kept far away from the possibility of lifting up his hand against a citizen and let the wardens of the city take the offender and examine him, not forgetting their duty to the God of Strangers and in case the stranger appears to have struck the citizen unjustly let them inflict upon him as many blows with the scourge as he has himself inflicted and quell his presumption. But if he be innocent they shall threaten and rebuke the man who arrested him [880] and let them both go If a person strikes another of the same age or somewhat older than himself who has no children whether he be an old man who strikes an old man or a young man who strikes a young man let the person struck defend himself in the natural way without a weapon and with his hands only He who being more than forty years of age dares to fight with another whether he be the aggressor or in self defence shall be regarded as rude and ill mannered and slavish —this will be a disgraceful punishment and therefore suitable to him The obedient nature will readily yield to such exhortations but the disobedient who heeds not the prelude shall have the law ready for him —If any man smite another who is older than himself either by twenty or by more years in the first place he who is at hand not being younger than the combatants nor their equal in age shall separate them or be disgraced according to law but if he be the equal in age of the person who is struck or younger he shall defend the person injured as he would a brother or father or still older relative Further let him who dares to smite an elder be tried for assault, as I have said and if he be found guilty let him be imprisoned for a period of not less than a year or if the judges approve of a longer period their decision shall be final But if a stranger or metic smite one who is older by twenty years or more the same law shall hold about the bystanders assisting and he who is found guilty in such a suit if he be a stranger but not resident, shall be imprisoned during a period of two years and a metic who disobeys the laws shall be imprisoned for three years unless the court assign him a longer term And let him who was present in any of these cases and did not assist according to law be punished if he be of the highest class by paying a fine of a mina or if he be of the second class of fifty drachmas or if of the third class by a fine of thirty drachmas or if he be of the fourth class by a fine of twenty drachmas and the generals and taxiarchs and phylarchs and hipparchs shall form the court in such cases earth and stones only which can have no care at all of human affairs, and that all religion is a cooking up of words and a make-believe.

Cle One such teacher O Stranger would be bad enough, and you imply that there are many of them, which is worse.

Ath Well, then what shall we say or do?—Shall we assume that some one is accusing us among unholy men, [887] who are trying to escape from the effect of our legislation and that they say of us—How dreadful that you should legislate on the supposition that there are Gods! Shall we make a defence of ourselves? or shall we leave them and return to our laws, lest the prelude should become longer than the law? For the discourse will certainly extend to great length, if we are to treat the impiously disposed as they desire, partly demonstrating to them at some length the things of which they demand an explanation, partly making them afraid or dissatisfied, and then proceed to the requisite enactments.

Cle Yes, Stranger: but then how often have we repeated already that on the present occasion there is no reason why brevity should be preferred to length for who is at our heels—as the saying goes, and it would be paltry and ridiculous to prefer the shorter to the better. It is a matter of no small consequence, in some way or other to prove that there are Gods, and that they are good, and regard justice more than men do. The demonstration of this would be the best and noblest prelude of all our laws. And therefore, without impatience, and without hurry let us unreservedly consider the whole matter summoning up all the power of persuasion which we possess.

Ath Seeing you thus in earnest, I would fain offer up a prayer that I may succeed —but I must proceed at once. Who can be calm when he is called upon to prove the existence of the Gods? Who can avoid hating and abhorring the men who are and have been the cause of this argument, I speak of those who will not believe the tales which they have heard as babes and sucklings from their mothers and nurses, repeated by them both in jest and earnest, like charms, who have also heard them in the sacrificial prayers and seen sights accompanying them—sights and sounds delightful to children—and their parents during the sacrifices showing an intense earnestness on behalf of their children and of themselves, and with eager interest talking to the Gods, and beseeching them, as though they were firmly convinced of their existence who likewise see and hear the prostrations and invocations which are made by Hellenes and barbarians at the rising and setting of the sun and moon in all the vicissitudes of life, not as if they thought that there were no Gods, but as if there could be no doubt of their existence and no suspicion of their non-existence when men knowing all these things, [888] despise them on no real grounds, as would be admitted by all who have any particle of intelligence, and when they force us to say what we are now saying how can any one in gentle terms remonstrate with the like of them, when he has to begin by proving to them the very existence of the Gods? Yet the attempt must be made for it would be unseemly that one half of mankind should go mad in their lust of pleasure and the other half in their indignation at such persons Our address to these lost and perverted natures should not be spoken in passion let us suppose ourselves to select some one of them and gently reason with him, smothering our anger —O my son, we will say to him, you are young, and the advance of time will make you reverse many of the opinions which you now hold Wait awhile, and do not attempt to judge at present of the highest things and that is the highest of which you now think nothing—to know the Gods rightly and to live accordingly And in the first place let me indicate to you one point which is of great importance, and about which I cannot be deceived —You and your friends are not the first who have held this opinion about the Gods. There have always been persons more or less numerous who have had the same disorder I have known many of them, and can tell you, that no one who had taken up in youth this opinion, that the Gods do not exist, ever continued in the same until he was old the two other notions certainly do continue in some cases, but not in many: the notion, I mean, that the Gods exist, but take no heed of human things, and the other notion that they do take heed of them but are easily propitiated with sacrifices and prayers. As to the opinion about the Gods which may some day become clear to you, I advise you go wait and consider if it be true or not ask of others, and above all of the legislator In the meantime take care that you do not offend against the Gods. For the duty of the legislator is and always will be to teach you the truth of these matters.

Cle Our address, Stranger thus far is excellent.

Cp. Apology 26, E   Cf. 19, ff. ix. 65–8.

peat the acts formerly mentioned) when insults are offered to parents the fourth kind of violence is when any one regardless of the authority of the rulers takes or carries away or makes use of anything which belongs to them not having their consent and the fifth kind is when the violation of the civil rights of an individual demands reparation There should be a common law embracing all these cases For we have already said in general terms what shall be the punishment of sacrilege whether fraudulent or violent and now we have to determine what is to be the punishment of those who speak or act insolently toward the Gods But first we must give them an admonition which may be in the following terms —No one who in obedience to the laws believed that there were Gods ever intentionally did any unholy act or uttered any unlawful word but he who did must have supposed one of three things—either that they did not exist —which is the first possibility or secondly that if they did they took no care of man or thirdly that they were easily appeased and turned aside from their purpose by sacrifices and prayers

Cleinias What shall we say or do to these persons?

Athenian Stranger My good friend let us first hear the jests which I suspect that they in their superiority will utter against us

Cle What jests?

Ath They will make some irreverent speech of this sort — O inhabitants of Athens and Sparta and Cnosus they will reply in that you speak truly for some of us deny the very existence of the Gods while others as you say are of opinion that they do not care about us and others that they are turned from their course by gifts Now we have a right to claim as you yourself allowed in the matter of laws that before you are hard upon us and threaten us you should argue with us and convince us —you should first attempt to teach and persuade us that there are Gods by reasonable evidences and also that they are too good to be unrighteous or to be propitiated or turned from their course by gifts For when we hear such things said of them by those who are esteemed to be the best of poets and orators and prophets and priests and by innumerable others the thoughts of most of us are not set upon abstaining from unrighteous acts but upon doing them and atoning for them When lawgivers profess that they are gentle and not stern, we think that they should first of all use persuasion to us and show us the existence of Gods if not in a better manner than other men, at any rate in a truer and who knows but that we shall hearken to you? If then our request is a fair one please to accept our challenge

Cle But is there any difficulty in proving the existence of the Gods?

[886] Ath How would you prove it?

Cle How? In the first place the earth and the sun and the stars and the universe and the fair order of the seasons and the division of them into years and months furnish proofs of their existence and also there is the fact that all Hellenes and barbarians believe in them

Ath I fear my sweet friend though I will not say that I much regard the contempt with which the profane will be likely to assail us For you do not understand the nature of their complaint and you fancy that they rush into impiety only from a love of sensual pleasure

Cle Why Stranger what other reason is there?

Ath One which you who live in a different atmosphere would never guess

Cle What is it?

Ath A very grievous sort of ignorance which is imagined to be the greatest wisdom

Cle What do you mean?

Ath At Athens there are tales preserved in writing which the virtue of your state as I am informed refuses to admit They speak of the Gods in prose as well as verse and the oldest of them tell of the origin of the heavens and of the world and not far from the beginning of their story they proceed to narrate the birth of the Gods and how after they were born they behaved to one another Whether these stories have in other ways a good or a bad influence I should not like to be severe upon them because they are ancient but looking at them with reference to the duties of children to their parents I cannot praise them or think that they are useful or at all true Of the words of the ancients I have nothing more to say and I should wish to say of them only what is pleasing to the Gods But as to our younger generation and their wisdom I cannot let them off when they do mischief For do but mark the effect of their words when you and I argue for the existence of the Gods and produce the sun moon stars and earth claiming for them a divine being if we would listen to the aforesaid philosophers we should say that they are

Cf iv 718 ff
Cf Republic ii 364
Cf Republic ii 378 ff

like exist by nature, and no less than nature, if they are the creations of mind in accordance with right reason as you appear to me to maintain, and I am disposed to agree with you in thinking

Ath Yes, my enthusiastic Cleinias but are not these things when spoken to a multitude hard to be understood not to mention that they take up a dismal length of time?

Cle Why Stranger shall we, whose patience failed not when drinking or music were the themes of discourse, weary now of discoursing about the Gods, and about divine things? And the greatest help to rational legislation is that the laws when once written down [891] are always at rest they can be put to the test at any future time, and therefore if on first hearing they seem difficult, there is no reason for apprehension about them because any man however dull can go over them and consider them again and again nor if they are tedious but useful is there any reason or religion as it seems to me, in any man refusing to maintain the principles of them to the utmost of his power

Megillus Stranger I like what Cleinias is saying.

Ath Yes, Megillus, and we should do as he proposes for if impious discourses were not scattered, as I may say throughout the world, there would have been no need for any vindication of the existence of the Gods—but seeing that they are spread far and wide, such arguments are needed and who should come to the rescue of the greatest laws, when they are being undermined by bad men, but the legislator himself?

Meg There is no more proper champion of them

Ath Well then tell me, Cleinias—for I must ask you to be my partner—does not he who talks in this way conceive fire and water and earth and air to be the first elements of all things? These he calls nature, and out of these he supposes the soul to be formed afterwards and this is not a mere conjecture of ours about his meaning, but is what he really means

Cle Very true.

Ath Then, by Heaven we have discovered the source of this vain opinion of all those physical investigators and I would have you examine their arguments with the utmost care for their impiety is a very serious matter they not only make a bad and mistaken use of argument, but they lead away the minds of others that is my opinion of them.

Cf. Timaeus 46.

Cle You are right but I should like to know how this happens

Ath I fear that the argument may seem singular

Cle Do not hesitate Stranger I see that you are afraid of such a discussion carrying you beyond the limits of legislation But if there be no other way of showing our agreement in the belief that there are Gods, of whom the law is said now to approve, let us take this way my good sir

Ath Then I suppose that I must repeat the singular argument of those who manufacture the soul according to their own impious notions they affirm that which is the first cause of the generation and destruction of all things, to be not first, but last, and that which is last to be first, and hence they have fallen into error about the true nature of the Gods.

[892] Cle Still I do not understand you.

Ath Nearly all of them, my friends, seem to be ignorant of the nature and power of the soul especially in what relates to her origin they do not know that she is among the first of things, and before all bodies, and is the chief author of their changes and transpositions And if this is true, and if the soul is older than the body must not the things which are of the soul's kindred be of necessity prior to those which appertain to the body?

Cle Certainly

Ath Then thought and attention and mind and art and law will be prior to that which is hard and soft and heavy and light and the great and primitive works and actions will be works of art they will be the first, and after them will come nature and works of nature, which however is a wrong term for men to apply to them these will follow and will be under the government of art and mind

Cle But why is the word "nature" wrong?

Ath Because those who use the term mean to say that nature is the first creative power but if the soul turn out to be the primeval element and not fire or air then in the truest sense and beyond other things the soul may be said to exist by nature and this would be true if you proved that the soul is older than the body but not otherwise

Cle You are quite right.

Ath Shall we, then take this as the next point to which our attention should be directed?

Cle By all means

Ath Let us be on our guard lest this most deceptive argument with its youthful looks,

Ath Quite true, Megillus and Cleinias but I am afraid that we have unconsciously lighted on a strange doctrine

Cle What doctrine do you mean?

Ath The wisest of all doctrines in the opinion of many

Cle I wish that you would speak plainer

Ath The doctrine that all things do become, have become and will become, some by nature some by art and some by chance

Cle Is not that true?

Ath Well philosophers are probably right at any rate we may as well follow in their track [889] and examine what is the meaning of them and their disciples

Cle By all means

Ath They say that the greatest and fairest things are the work of nature and of chance the lesser of art which receiving from nature the greater and primeval creations moulds and fashions all those lesser works which are generally termed artificial

Cle How is that?

Ath I will explain my meaning still more clearly They say that fire and water and earth and air all exist by nature and chance and none of them by art and that as to the bodies which come next in order—earth, and sun and moon and stars—they have been created by means of these absolutely inanimate existences The elements are severally moved by chance and some inherent force according to certain affinities among them—of hot with cold or of dry with moist or of soft with hard and according to all the other accidental admixtures of opposites which have been formed by necessity After this fashion and in this manner the whole heaven has been created and all that is in the heaven as well as animals and all plants and all the seasons come from these elements not by the action of mind as they say or of any God or from art but as I was saying by nature and chance only Art sprang up afterwards and out of these mortal and of mortal birth and produced in play certain images and very partial imitations of the truth, having an affinity to one another such as music and painting create and their companion arts And there are other arts which have a serious purpose and these co operate with nature such for example as medicine and husbandry and gymnastic And they say that politics cooperate with nature but in a less degree and have more of art also that legislation is entirely a work of art and is based on assumptions which are not true

Cle How do you mean?

Ath In the first place my dear friend these people would say that the Gods exist not by nature but by art and by the laws of states, which are different in different places according to the agreement of those who make them and that the honourable is one thing by nature and another thing by law and that the principles of justice have no existence at all in nature, but that mankind are always disputing about them and altering them and that the alterations which are made by art and by law have no basis in nature [890] but are of authority for the moment and at the time at which they are made—These my friends are the sayings of wise men, poets and prose writers which find a way into the minds of youth They are told by them that the highest right is might and in this way the young fall into impieties under the idea that the Gods are not such as the law bids them imagine and hence arise factions these philosophers inviting them to lead a true life according to nature that is to live in real dominion over others and not in legal subjection to them

Cle What a dreadful picture Stranger have you given and how great is the injury which is thus inflicted on young men to the ruin both of states and families!

Ath True Cleinias but then what should the lawgiver do when this evil is of long standing? should he only rise up in the state and threaten all mankind proclaiming that if they will not say and think that the Gods are such as the law ordains (and this may be extended generally to the honourable the just and to all the highest things and to all that relates to virtue and vice) and if they will not make their actions conform to the copy which the law gives them then he who refuses to obey the law shall die or suffer stripes and bonds or privation of citizenship or in some cases be punished by loss of property and exile? Should he not rather when he is making laws for men at the same time infuse the spirit of persuasion into his words and mitigate the severity of them as far as he can?

Cle Why Stranger if such persuasion be at all possible then a legislator who has anything in him ought never to weary of persuading men he ought to leave nothing unsaid in support of the ancient opinion that there are Gods and of all those other truths which you were just now mentioning he ought to support the law and also art and acknowledge that both

Cf Gorgias 483

Cle. Certainly.

Ath. And which of these ten motions ought we to prefer as being the mightiest and most efficient?

Cle. I must say that the motion which is able to move itself is ten thousand times superior to all the others.

Ath. Very good; but may I make one or two corrections in what I have been saying?

Cle. What are they?

Ath. When I spoke of the tenth sort of motion, that was not quite correct.

Cle. What was the error?

Ath. According to the true order, the tenth was really the first in generation and power; then follows the second, which was strangely enough termed the ninth by us.

Cle. What do you mean?

Ath. I mean this: when one thing changes another, and that another, of such will there be any primary changing element? How can a thing which is moved by another ever be the beginning of change? Impossible. But when the self-moved changes other, and that again other, and thus thousands upon tens of thousands of bodies are set in motion, [895] must not the beginning of all this motion be the change of the self-moving principle?

Cle. Very true, and I quite agree.

Ath. Or, to put the question in another way, making answer to ourselves:—If, as most of these philosophers have the audacity to affirm, all things were at rest in one mass, which of the above-mentioned principles of motion would first spring up among them?

Cle. Clearly the self-moving; for there could be no change in them arising out of any external cause; the change must first take place in themselves.

Ath. Then we must say that self-motion being the origin of all motions, and the first which arises among things at rest as well as among things in motion, is the eldest and mightiest principle of change, and that which is changed by another and yet moves other is second.

Cle. Quite true.

Ath. At this stage of the argument let us put a question.

Cle. What question?

Ath. If we were to see this power existing in any earthy, watery, or fiery substance, simple or compound—how should we describe it?

Cle. You mean to ask whether we should call such a self-moving power life?

Ath. I do.

Cle. Certainly we should.

Ath. And when we see soul in anything, must we not do the same—must we not admit that this is life?

Cle. We must.

Ath. And now, I beseech you, reflect;—you would admit that we have a threefold knowledge of things?

Cle. What do you mean?

Ath. I mean that we know the essence, and that we know the definition of the essence, and the name,—these are the three; and there are two questions which may be raised about anything.

Cle. How two?

Ath. Sometimes a person may give the name and ask the definition; or he may give the definition and ask the name. I may illustrate what I mean in this way.

Cle. How?

Ath. Number like some other things is capable of being divided into equal parts; when thus divided, number is named "even," and the definition of the name "even" is "number divisible into two equal parts"?

Cle. True.

Ath. I mean, that when we are asked about the definition and give the name, or when we are asked about the name and give the definition—in either case, whether we give name or definition, we speak of the same thing, calling "even" the number which is divided into two equal parts.

Cle. Quite true.

Ath. And what is the definition of that which is named "soul"? Can we conceive of any other than that which has been already [896] given—the motion which can move itself?

Cle. You mean to say that the essence which is defined as the self-moved is the same with that which has the name soul?

Ath. Yes; and if this is true, do we still maintain that there is anything wanting in the proof that the soul is the first origin and moving power of all that is, or has become, or will be, and their contraries, when she has been clearly shown to be the source of change and motion in all things?

Cle. Certainly not; the soul as being the source of motion, has been most satisfactorily shown to be the oldest of all things.

Ath. And is not that motion which is produced in another, by reason of another, but

Cf. Timaeus 89.
Cf. Phaedrus 245.

beguiling us old men, give us the slip and make a laughing stock of us Who knows but we may be aiming at the greater and fail of attaining the lesser? Suppose that we three have to pass a rapid river, and I being the youngest of the three and experienced in rivers take upon me the duty of making the attempt first by myself leaving you in safety on the bank I am to examine whether the river is passable by older men like yourselves and if such appears to be the case then I shall invite you to follow and my experience will help to convey you across but if the river is impassable by you then there will have been no danger to any body but myself—would not that seem to be a very fair proposal? I mean to say that the argument in prospect is likely to be too much for you out of your depth and beyond your strength and I should be afraid that the stream of my questions might create in you who [893] are not in the habit of answering giddiness and confusion of mind and hence a feeling of unpleasantness and unsuitableness might arise I think therefore that I had better first ask the questions and then answer them myself while you listen in safety in that way I can carry on the argument until I have completed the proof that the soul is prior to the body

Cle Excellent Stranger and I hope that you will do as you propose

Ath Come then and if ever we are to call upon the Gods let us call upon them now in all seriousness to come to the demonstration of their own existence And so holding fast to the rope we will venture upon the depths of the argument When questions of this sort are asked of me, my safest answer would appear to be as follows —Some one says to me O Stranger are all things at rest and nothing in motion or is the exact opposite of this true or are some things in motion and others at rest? —To this I shall reply that some things are in motion and others at rest And do not things which move move in a place and are not the things which are at rest at rest in a place? Certainly And some move or rest in one place and some in more places than one? You mean to say we shall rejoin that those things which rest at the centre move in one place, just as the circumference goes round of globes which are said to be at rest? Yes And we observe that, in the revolution, the motion which carries round the larger and the lesser circle at the same time is proportionally distributed to greater and smaller and is greater and smaller in a certain proportion Here is a wonder which might be thought an impossibility that the same motion should impart swiftness and slowness in due proportion to larger and lesser circles Very true And when you speak of bodies moving in many places you seem to me to mean those which move from one place to another and sometimes have one centre of motion and sometimes more than one because they turn upon their axis and whenever they meet anything if it be stationary they are divided by it but if they get in the midst between bodies which are approaching and moving towards the same spot from opposite directions, they unite with them I admit the truth of what you are saying Also when they unite they grow and when they are divided they waste away—that is supposing the constitution of each to remain or if that fails then there is a second reason of their dissolution. And when are all things created and how? [894] Clearly, they are created when the first principle receives increase and attains to the second dimension and from this arrives at the one which is neighbour to this and after reaching the third becomes perceptible to sense. Everything which is thus changing and moving is in process of generation only when at rest has it real existence but when passing into another state it is destroyed utterly Have we not mentioned all motions that there are and comprehended them under their kinds and numbered them with the exception my friends, of two?

Cle Which are they?

Ath Just the two with which our present enquiry is concerned

Cle Speak plainer

Ath I suppose that our enquiry has reference to the soul?

Cle Very true

Ath Let us assume that there is a motion able to move other things but not to move itself —that is one kind and there is another kind which can move itself as well as other things working in composition and decomposition by increase and diminution and generation and destruction—that is also one of the many kinds of motion

Cle Granted

Ath And we will assume that which moves other and is changed by other to be the ninth and that which changes itself and others and is co-incident with every action and every passion and is the true principle of change and motion in all that is—that we shall be inclined to call the tenth does no discredit to our ingenuity

Cle. It does us great credit.

Ath. And the motion of the other sort which is not after the same manner nor in the same, nor about the same, nor in relation to the same, nor in one place, nor in order nor according to any rule or proportion, may be said to be akin to senselessness and folly?

Cle. That is most true.

Ath. Then, after what has been said, there is no difficulty in distinctly stating, that since soul carries all things round, either the best soul or the contrary must of necessity carry round and order and arrange the revolution of the heaven.

Cle. And judging from what has been said, Stranger there would be impiety in asserting that any but the most perfect soul or souls carries round the heavens.

Ath. You have understood my meaning right well, Cleinias, and now let me ask you another question.

Cle. What are you going to ask?

Ath. If the soul carries round the sun and moon, and the other stars, does she not carry round each individual of them

Cle. Certainly

Ath. Then of one of them let us speak, and the same argument will apply to all.

Cle. Which will you take?

Ath. Every one sees the body of the sun, but no one sees his soul, nor the soul of any other body living or dead and yet there is great reason to believe that this nature, unperceived by any of our senses, is circumfused around them all, but is perceived by mind and therefore by mind and reflection only let us apprehend the following point.

Cle. What is that?

Ath. If the soul carries round the sun, we shall not be far wrong in supposing one of three alternatives.

Cle. What are they?

Ath. Either the soul which moves the sun this way and that, resides within the circular and visible body like the soul which carries us about every way [899] or the soul provides herself with an external body of fire or air as some affirm, and violently propels body by body or thirdly she is without such a body but guides the sun by some extraordinary and wonderful power

Cle. Yes, certainly the soul can only order all things in one of these three ways.

Ath. And this soul of the sun, which is therefore better than the sun, whether taking the sun about in a chariot to give light to men, or acting from without or in any other way, ought by every man to be deemed a God.[1]

Cle. Yes, by every man who has the least particle of sense.

Ath. And of the stars too, and of the moon, and of the years and months and seasons, must we not say in like manner that since a soul or souls having every sort of excellence are the causes of all of them, those souls are Gods, whether they are living beings and reside in bodies, and in this way order the whole heaven, or whatever be the place and mode of their existence —and will any one who admits all this venture to deny that all things are full of Gods?[2]

Cle. No one, Stranger would be such a madman.

Ath. And now Megillus and Cleinias, let us offer terms to him who has hitherto denied the existence of the Gods, and leave him.

Cle. What terms?

Ath. Either he shall teach us that we were wrong in saying that the soul is the original of all things, and arguing accordingly or if he be not able to say anything better then he must yield to us and live for the remainder of his life in the belief that there are Gods.—Let us see, then, whether we have said enough or not enough to those who deny that there are Gods.

Cle. Certainly—quite enough, Stranger

Ath. Then to them we will say no more. And now we are to address him who, believing that there are Gods, believes also that they take no heed of human affairs To him we say—O thou best of men, in believing that there are Gods you are led by some affinity to them, which attracts you towards your kindred and makes you honour and believe in them. But the fortunes of evil and unrighteous men in private as well as public life, which, though not really happy are wrongly counted happy in the judgment of men, and are celebrated both by poets and prose writers —these draw you aside from your natural piety [900] Perhaps you have seen impious men growing old and leaving their children's children in high offices, and their prosperity shakes your faith—you have known or heard or been yourself an eye witness of many monstrous impieties, and have beheld men by such criminal means from small beginnings attaining to sovereignty and the pinnacle of greatness and considering all these things you do not like to accuse the Gods of them, because they are your relatives and so from some

[1] Cf. xii. 966, 967
[2] Cf. Republic ii. 364.

never has any self moving power at all being in truth the change of an inanimate body to be reckoned second or by any lower number which you may prefer?

Cle Exactly

Ath Then we are right and speak the most perfect and absolute truth when we say that the soul is prior to the body and that the body is second and comes afterwards and is born to obey the soul which is the ruler?

Cle Nothing can be more true

Ath Do you remember our old admission that if the soul was prior to the body the things of the soul were also prior to those of the body?

Cle Certainly

Ath Then characters and manners and wishes and reasonings and true opinions and reflections and recollections are prior to length and breadth and depth and strength of bodies if the soul is prior to the body

Cle To be sure

Ath In the next place must we not of necessity admit that the soul is the cause of good and evil base and honourable just and unjust and of all other opposites if we suppose her to be the cause of all things?

Cle We must

Ath And as the soul orders and inhabits all things that move however moving must we not say that she orders also the heavens?

Cle Of course

Ath One soul or more? More than one—I will answer for you at any rate we must not suppose that there are less than two—one the author of good and the other of evil

Cle Very true

Ath Yes very true the soul then directs all things in heaven and earth and sea by her movements and these are described by the terms—will [897] consideration attention deliberation opinion true and false joy and sorrow confidence fear hatred love and other primary motions akin to these which again receive the secondary motions of corporeal substances and guide all things to growth and decay to composition and decomposition and to the qualities which accompany them such as heat and cold heaviness and lightness hardness and softness blackness and whiteness bitterness and sweetness, and all those other qualities which the soul uses herself a goddess when truly receiving the divine mind she disciplines all things rightly to their happiness but when she is the companion of folly she does the very contrary of all this Shall we assume so much or do we still entertain doubts?

Cle There is no room at all for doubt

Ath Shall we say then that it is the soul which controls heaven and earth and the whole world?—that it is a principle of wisdom and virtue or a principle which has neither wisdom nor virtue? Suppose that we make answer as follows —

Cle How would you answer?

Ath If my friend we say that the whole path and movement of heaven and of all that is therein is by nature akin to the movement and revolution and calculation of mind, and proceeds by kindred laws then as is plain we must say that the best soul takes care of the world and guides it along the good path

Cle True

Ath But if the world moves wildly and irregularly then the evil soul guides it

Cle True again

Ath Of what nature is the movement of mind?—To this question it is not easy to give an intelligent answer and therefore I ought to assist you in framing one

Cle Very good

Ath Then let us not answer as if we would look straight at the sun making ourselves darkness at midday —I mean as if we were under the impression that we could see with mortal eyes or know adequately the nature of mind —it will be safer to look at the image only

Cle What do you mean?

Ath Let us select of the ten motions the one which mind chiefly resembles this I will bring to your recollection and will then make the answer on behalf of us all

Cle That will be excellent

Ath You will surely remember our saying that all things were either at rest or in motion?

Cle I do

Ath And that of things in motion some were moving in one place [898] and others in more than one?

Cle Yes

Ath Of these two kinds of motion that which moves in one place must move about a centre like globes made in a lathe and is most entirely akin and similar to the circular movement of mind

Cle What do you mean?

Ath In saying that both mind and the motion which is in one place move in the same and like manner in and about the same and in relation to the same and according to one proportion and order and are like the motion of a globe we invented a fair image which

Cf Republic vii. 515

Ath Then the alternative which remains is that if the Gods neglect the lighter and lesser concerns of the universe, [902] they neglect them because they know that they ought not to care about such matters—what other alternative is there but the opposite of their knowing?

Cle There is none

Ath And O most excellent and best of men, do I understand you to mean that they are careless because they are ignorant, and do not know that they ought to take care or that they know and yet like the meanest sort of men, knowing the better choose the worse because they are overcome by pleasures and pains?

Cle Impossible

Ath Do not all human things partake of the nature of soul? And is not man the most religious of all animals?

Cle That is not to be denied

Ath And we acknowledge that all mortal creatures are the property of the Gods to whom also the whole of heaven belongs? [1]

Cle Certainly

Ath And, therefore, whether a person says that these things are to the Gods great or small—in either case it would not be natural for the Gods who own us, and who are the most careful and the best of owners to neglect us—There is also a further consideration

Cle What is it?

Ath Sensation and power are in an inverse ratio to each other in respect to their ease and difficulty

Cle What do you mean?

Ath I mean that there is greater difficulty in seeing and hearing the small than the great, but more facility in moving and controlling and taking care of small and unimportant things than of their opposites

Cle Far more

Ath Suppose the case of a physician who is willing and able to cure some living thing as a whole—how will the whole fare at his hands if he takes care only of the greater and neglects the parts which are lesser?

Cle Decidedly not well

Ath. No better would be the result with pilots or generals, or householders or statesmen, or any other such class if they neglected the small and regarded only the great—as the builders say the larger stones do not lie well without the lesser

Cle Of course not.

Ath Let us not, then, deem God inferior to human workmen who in proportion to their skill finish and perfect their works small as well as great [903] by one and the same art or that God, the wisest of beings who is both willing and able to take care is like a lazy good for nothing or a coward who turns his back upon labour and gives no thought to smaller and easier matters but to the greater only

Cle Never Stranger let us admit a supposition about the Gods which is both impious and false

Ath I think that we have now argued enough with him who delights to accuse the Gods of neglect.

Cle Yes

Ath He has been forced to acknowledge that he is in error but he still seems to me to need some words of consolation

Cle What consolation will you offer him?

Ath Let us say to the youth —The ruler of the universe has ordered all things with a view to the excellence and preservation of the whole and each part, as far as may be, has an action and passion appropriate to it. Over these down to the least fraction of them ministers have been appointed to preside, who have wrought out their perfection with infinitesimal exactness And one of these portions of the universe is thine own unhappy man which, however little, contributes to the whole and you do not seem to be aware that this and every other creation is for the sake of the whole and in order that the life of the whole may be blessed and that you are created for the sake of the whole and not the whole for the sake of you For every physician and every skilled artist does all things for the sake of the whole, directing his effort towards the common good executing the part for the sake of the whole and not the whole for the sake of the part And you are annoyed because you are ignorant how what is best for you happens to you and to the universe as far as the laws of the common creation admit. Now as the soul combining first with one body and then with another undergoes all sorts of changes, either of herself or through the influence of another soul all that remains to the player of the game is that he should shift the pieces sending the better nature to the better place, and the worse to the worse, and so assigning to them their proper portion

Cle In what way do you mean?

Ath In a way which may be supposed to make the care of all things easy to the Gods If any one were to form or fashion all things

Cf. Timaeus 42.

[1] Cf. Phaedo 62.

want of reasoning power and also from an unwillingness to find fault with them you have come to believe that they exist indeed but have no thought or care of human things Now that your present evil opinion may not grow to still greater impiety and that we may if possible use arguments which may conjure away the evil before it arrives we will add another argument to that originally addressed to him who utterly denied the existence of the Gods And do you, Megillus and Cleinias answer for the young man as you did before and if any impediment comes in our way I will take the word out of your mouths and carry you over the river as I did just now

Cle Very good do as you say and we will help you as well as we can

Ath There will probably be no difficulty in proving to him that the Gods care about the small as well as about the great For he was present and heard what was said that they are perfectly good and that the care of all things is most entirely natural to them [1]

Cle No doubt he heard that

Ath Let us consider together in the next place what we mean by this virtue which we ascribe to them Surely we should say that to be temperate and to possess mind belongs to virtue, and the contrary to vice?

Cle Certainly

Ath Yes, and courage is a part of virtue, and cowardice of vice?

Cle True

Ath And the one is honourable, and the other dishonourable?

Cle To be sure

Ath And the one like other meaner things is a human quality but the Gods have no part in anything of the sort?

Cle That again is what everybody will admit

Ath But do we imagine carelessness and idleness and luxury to be virtues? What do you think?

Cle Decidedly not

Ath They rank under the opposite class?

Cle Yes

[901] Ath And their opposites therefore would fall under the opposite class?

Cle Yes

Ath But are we to suppose that one who possesses all these good qualities will be luxurious and heedless and idle like those whom the poet compares to stingless drones?

Cle And the comparison is a most just one

[1] Cf 809

Ath Surely God must not be supposed to have a nature which he himself hates?—he who dares to say this sort of thing must not be tolerated for a moment

Cle Of course not How could he have?

Ath Should we not on any principle be entirely mistaken in praising any one who has some special business entrusted to him, if he have a mind which takes care of great matters and no care of small ones? Reflect he who acts in this way whether he be God or man must act from one of two principles

Cle What are they?

Ath Either he must think that the neglect of the small matters is of no consequence to the whole or if he knows that they are of consequence and he neglects them his neglect must be attributed to carelessness and indolence Is there any other way in which his neglect can be explained? For surely when it is impossible for him to take care of all he is not negligent if he fails to attend to these things great or small which a God or some inferior being might be wanting in strength or capacity to manage?

Cle Certainly not

Ath Now then let us examine the offenders who both alike confess that there are Gods but with a difference—the one saying that they may be appeased and the other that they have no care of small matters there are three of us and two of them and we will say to them—In the first place you both acknowledge that the Gods hear and see and know all things and that nothing can escape them which is matter of sense and knowledge —do you admit this?

Cle Yes

Ath And do you admit also that they have all power which mortals and immortals can have?

Cle They will of course admit this also

Ath And surely we three and they two—five in all—have acknowledged that they are good and perfect?

Cle Assuredly

Ath But if they are such as we conceive them to be can we possibly suppose that they ever act in the spirit of carelessness and indolence? For in us inactivity is the child of cowardice, and carelessness of inactivity and indolence

Cle Most true

Ath Then not from inactivity and carelessness is any God ever negligent for there is no cowardice in them

Cle That is very true

Ath Then the alternative which remains is, that if the Gods neglect the lighter and lesser concerns of the universe, [902] they neglect them because they know that they ought not to care about such matters—what other alternative is there but the opposite of their knowing?

Cle There is none.

Ath And, O most excellent and best of men, do I understand you to mean that they are careless because they are ignorant, and do not know that they ought to take care, or that they know and yet like the meanest sort of men, knowing the better choose the worse because they are overcome by pleasures and pains?

Cle Impossible.

Ath Do not all human things partake of the nature of soul? And is not man the most religious of all animals?

Cle That is not to be denied.

Ath And we acknowledge that all mortal creatures are the property of the Gods, to whom also the whole of heaven belongs?[a]

Cle Certainly

Ath And, therefore, whether a person says that these things are to the Gods great or small—in either case it would not be natural for the Gods who own us, and who are the most careful and the best of owners, to neglect us.—There is also a further consideration.

Cle What is it?

Ath Sensation and power are in an inverse ratio to each other in respect to their ease and difficulty

Cle What do you mean?

Ath I mean that there is greater difficulty in seeing and hearing the small than the great, but more facility in moving and controlling and taking care of small and unimportant things than of their opposites.

Cle Far more.

Ath Suppose the case of a physician who is willing and able to cure some living thing as a whole—how will the whole fare at his hands if he takes care only of the greater and neglects the parts which are lesser?

Cle Decidedly not well.

Ath No better would be the result with pilots or generals, or householders or statesmen, or any other such class, if they neglected the small and regarded only the great—as the builders say the larger stones do not lie well without the lesser

Cle Of course not.

Ath Let us not, then, deem God inferior to human workmen, who in proportion to their skill finish and perfect their works small as well as great, [903] by one and the same art, or that God, the wisest of beings who is both willing and able to take care, is like a lazy good for nothing or a coward, who turns his back upon labour and gives no thought to smaller and easier matters, but to the greater only

Cle Never Stranger let us admit a supposition about the Gods which is both impious and false

Ath I think that we have now argued enough with him who delights to accuse the Gods of neglect.

Cle Yes.

Ath He has been forced to acknowledge that he is in error but he still seems to me to need some words of consolation.

Cle What consolation will you offer him?

Ath Let us say to the youth —The ruler of the universe has ordered all things with a view to the excellence and preservation of the whole, and each part, as far as may be, has an action and passion appropriate to it. Over these, down to the least fraction of them ministers have been appointed to preside, who have wrought out their perfection with infinitesimal exactness. And one of these portions of the universe is thine own, unhappy man, which, however little, contributes to the whole and you do not seem to be aware that this and every other creation is for the sake of the whole, and in order that the life of the whole may be blessed and that you are created for the sake of the whole, and not the whole for the sake of you. For every physician and every skilled artist does all things for the sake of the whole, directing his effort towards the common good executing the part for the sake of the whole, and not the whole for the sake of the part. And you are annoyed because you are ignorant how what is best for you happens to you and to the universe, as far as the laws of the common creation admit. Cle In what way do you mean?

Ath In a way which may be supposed to make the care of all things easy to the Gods. If any one were to form or fashion all things

Cf. Timaeus 42.

Cf. Phaedo 62.

without any regard to the whole—if for example he formed a living element of water out of fire instead of forming many things out of one or one out of many in regular order attaining to a first or [904] second or third birth[1] the transmutation would have been infinite but now the ruler of the world has a wonderfully easy task

Cle How so?

Ath I will explain —When the king saw that our actions had life and that there was much virtue in them and much vice and that the soul and body although not like the Gods of popular opinion eternal yet having once come into existence were indestructible (for if either of them had been destroyed there would have been no generation of living beings) and when he observed that the good of the soul was ever by nature designed to profit men and the evil to harm them—he seeing all this contrived so to place each of the parts that their position might in the easiest and best manner procure the victory of good and the defeat of evil in the whole And he contrived a general plan by which a thing of a certain nature found a certain seat and room But the formation of qualities he left to the wills of individuals For every one of us is made pretty much what he is by the bent of his desires and the nature of his soul

Cle Yes that is probably true

Ath Then all things which have a soul change and possess in themselves a principle of change and in changing move according to law and to the order of destiny natures which have undergone a lesser change move less and on the earth s surface but those which have suffered more change and have become more criminal sink into the abyss that is to say into Hades and other places in the world below of which the very names terrify men and which they picture to themselves as in a dream both while alive and when released from the body And whenever the soul receives more of good or evil from her own energy and the strong influence of others—when she has communion with divine virtue and becomes divine she is carried into another and better place which is perfect in holiness but when she has communion with evil then she also changes the place of her life

This is the justice of the Gods who inhabit Olympus

O youth or young man who fancy that you are neglected by the Gods know that if you become worse you shall go to the worse souls or if better to the better and in every succession of life and death you will do and suffer what like [905] may fitly suffer at the hands of like This is the justice of heaven which neither you nor any other unfortunate will ever glory in escaping and which the ordaining powers have specially ordained take good heed thereof for it will be sure to take heed of you If you say —I am small and will creep into the depths of the earth or I am high and will fly up to heaven you are not so small or so high but that you shall pay the fitting penalty either here or in the world below or in some still more savage place whither you shall be conveyed This is also the explanation of the fate of those whom you saw who had done unholy and evil deeds, and from small beginnings had grown great and you fancied that from being miserable they had become happy and in their actions as in a mirror you seemed to see the universal neglect of the Gods not knowing how they make all things work together and contribute to the great whole And thinkest thou bold man that thou needest not to know this?—he who knows it not can never form any true idea of the happiness or unhappiness of life or hold any rational discourse respecting either If Cleinias and this our reverend company succeed in proving to you that you know not what you say of the Gods then will God help you but should you desire to hear more listen to what we say to the third opponent if you have any understanding whatsoever For I think that we have sufficiently proved the existence of the Gods and that they care for men —The other notion that they are appeased by the wicked and take gifts is what we must not concede to any one and what every man should disprove to the utmost of his power

Cle Very good let us do as you say

Ath Well then by the Gods themselves I conjure you to tell me—if they are to be propitiated how are they to be propitiated? Who are they and what is their nature? Must they not be at least rulers who have to order unceasingly the whole heaven?

Cle True

Ath And to what earthly rulers can they be compared or who to them? How in the less can we find an image of the greater? Are they charioteers of contending pairs of steeds or pilots of vessels? Perhaps they might be compared to the generals of armies or they might be likened to physicians providing against the diseases which [906] make war upon the body or to husbandmen observing anxiously the effects of the seasons on the growth of plants or perhaps to shepherds of flocks For as we acknowledge the world to be full of many goods and also of evils, and of more evils than goods, there is, as we affirm, an immortal conflict going on among us which requires marvellous watchfulness and in that conflict the Gods and demons are our allies, and we are their property Injustice and insolence and folly are the destruction of us, and justice and temperance and wisdom are our salvation and the place of these latter is in the life of the Gods, although some vestige of them may occasionally be discerned among mankind But upon this earth we know that there dwell souls possessing an unjust spirit, who may be compared to brute animals, which fawn upon their keepers, whether dogs or shepherds, or the best and most perfect masters for they in like manner as the voices of the wicked declare, prevail by flattery and prayers and incantations, and are allowed to make their gains with impunity And this sin, which is termed dishonesty is an evil of the same kind as what is termed disease in living bodies or pestilence in years or seasons of the year and in cities and governments has an other name, which is injustice.

[1] Cf Timaeus 42. Odyssey xix 43

Cle Quite true

Ath What else can he say who declares that the Gods are always lenient to the doers of unjust acts, if they divide the spoil with them? As if wolves were to toss a portion of their prey to the dogs, and they mollified by the gift, suffered them to tear the flocks Must not he who maintains that the Gods can be propitiated argue thus?

Cle Precisely so

Ath And to which of the above mentioned classes of guardians would any man compare the Gods without absurdity? Will he say that they are like pilots who are themselves turned away from their duty by libations of wine and the savour of fat, and at last overturn both ship and sailors?

Cl Assuredly not

Ath And surely they are not like charioteers who are bribed to give up the victory to other chariots?

Cl That would be a fearful image of the Gods.

Ath Nor are they like generals, or physicians, or husbandmen, or shepherds and no one would compare them to dogs who have been silenced by wolves

Cle A thing not to be spoken of [907] Ath And are not all the Gods the chiefest of all guardians, and do they not guard our highest interests?

Cle Yes the chiefest

Ath And shall we say that those who guard our noblest interests, and are the best of guardians are inferior in virtue to dogs, and to men even of moderate excellence who would never betray justice for the sake of gifts which unjust men impiously offer them?

Cle Certainly not nor is such a notion to be endured and he who holds this opinion may be fairly singled out and characterized as of all impious men the wickedest and most impious.

Ath Then are the three assertions—that the Gods exist, and that they take care of men and that they can never be persuaded to do injustice, now sufficiently demonstrated? May we say that they are?

Cle You have our entire assent to your words

Ath I have spoken with vehemence because I am zealous against evil men and I will tell you, dear Cleinias, why I am so I would not have the wicked think that, having the superiority in argument, they may do as they please and act according to their various imaginations about the Gods and this zeal has led me to speak too vehemently but if we have at all succeeded in persuading the men to hate themselves and love their opposites, the prelude of our laws about impiety will not have been spoken in vain

Cle So let us hope and even if we have failed the style of our argument will not discredit the lawgiver

Ath After the prelude shall follow a discourse, which will be the interpreter of the law this shall proclaim to all impious persons that they must depart from their ways and go over to the pious. And to those who disobey let the law about impiety be as follows —If a man is guilty of any impiety in word or deed any one who happens to be present shall give information to the magistrates in aid of the law and let the magistrates who first receive the information bring him before the appointed court according to the law and if a magistrate, after receiving information refuses to act, he shall be tried for impiety at the instance of any one who is willing to vindicate the laws and if any one be cast the court shall estimate the punishment of each act of impiety [908] and let all such criminals be imprisoned There shall be

Cf. Republ. ii. 365.

three prisons in the state the first of them is to be the common prison in the neighbourhood of the agora for the safe keeping of the generality of offenders another is to be in the neighbourhood of the nocturnal council [1] and is to be called the House of Reformation another to be situated in some wild and desolate region in the centre of the country shall be called by some name expressive of retribution Now men fall into impiety from three causes which have been already mentioned and from each of these causes arise two sorts of impiety in all six which are worth distinguishing and should not all have the same punishment For he who does not believe in the Gods and yet has a righteous nature hates the wicked and dislikes and refuses to do injustice and avoids unrighteous men and loves the righteous But they who besides believing that the world is devoid of Gods are intemperate and have at the same time good memories and quick wits are worse although both of them are unbelievers much less injury is done by the one than by the other The one may talk loosely about the Gods and about sacrifices and oaths and perhaps by laughing at other men he may make them like himself if he be not punished But the other who holds the same opinions and is called a clever man, is full of stratagem and deceit—men of this class deal in prophecy and jugglery of all kinds and out of their ranks sometimes come tyrants and demagogues and generals and hierophants of private mysteries and the Sophists as they are termed with their ingenious devices There are many kinds of unbelievers but two only for whom legislation is required one the hypocritical sort whose crime is deserving of death many times over while the other needs only bonds and admonition In like manner also the notion that the Gods take no thought of men produces two other sorts of crimes and the notion that they may be propitiated produces two more Assuming these divisions, let those who have been made what they are only from want of understanding and not from malice or an evil nature be placed by the judge in the House of Reformation [909] and ordered to suffer imprisonment during a period of not less than five years And in the meantime let them have no intercourse with the other citizens except with members of the nocturnal council and with them let them converse with a view to the improvement of their soul s health And when the time of their imprisonment has expired if any of them be of sound mind let him be restored to sane company but if not and if he be condemned a second time let him be punished with death As to that class of monstrous natures who not only believe that there are no Gods or that they are negligent or to be propitiated but in contempt of mankind conjure the souls of the living and say that they can conjure the dead and promise to charm the Gods with sacrifices and prayers, and will utterly overthrow individuals and whole houses and states for the sake of money—let him who is guilty of any of these things be condemned by the court to be bound according to law in the prison which is in the centre of the land and let no freeman ever approach him but let him receive the rations of food appointed by the guardians of the law from the hands of the public slaves and when he is dead let him be cast beyond the borders unburied and if any freeman assist in burying him, let him pay the penalty of impiety to any one who is willing to bring a suit against him But if he leaves behind him children who are fit to be citizens let the guardians of orphans take care of them just as they would of any other orphans from the day on which their father is convicted

In all these cases there should be one law which will make men in general less liable to transgress in word or deed and less foolish because they will not be allowed to practise religious rites contrary to law And let this be the simple form of the law —No man shall have sacred rites in a private house When he would sacrifice let him go to the temples and hand over his offerings to the priests and priestesses who see to the sanctity of such things and let him pray himself and let any one who pleases join with him in prayer The reason of this is as follows —Gods and temples are not easily instituted and to establish them rightly is the work of a mighty intellect And women especially and men too when they are sick or in danger or in any sort of difficulty or again on their receiving any good fortune [910] have a way of consecrating the occasion vowing sacrifices and promising shrines to Gods demigods and sons of Gods and when they are awakened by terrible apparitions and dreams or remember visions they find in altars and temples the remedies of them and will fill every house and village with them placing them in the open air or wherever they may have had such visions and with a view to all these cases we should obey the law The law has also re gard to the impious, and would not have them fancy that by the secret performance of these actions—by raising temples and by building altars in private houses, they can propitiate the God secretly with sacrifices and prayers, while they are really multiplying their crimes infinitely, bringing guilt from heaven upon themselves, and also upon those who permit them, and who are better men than they are; and the consequence is that the whole state reaps the fruit of their impiety, which, in a certain sense, is deserved. Assuredly God will not blame the legislator, who will enact the following law:—No one shall possess shrines of the Gods in private houses, and he who is found to possess them, and perform any sacred rites not publicly authorized—supposing the offender to be some man or woman who is not guilty of any other great and impious crime—shall be informed against by him who is acquainted with the fact, which shall be announced by him to the guardians of the law; and let them issue orders that he or she shall carry away their private rites to the public temples, and if they do not persuade them, let them inflict a penalty on them until they comply. And if a person be proven guilty of impiety, not merely from childish levity, but such as grown-up men may be guilty of, whether he have sacrificed publicly or privately to any Gods, let him be punished with death, for his sacrifice is impure. Whether the deed has been done in earnest, or only from childish levity, let the guardians of the law determine, before they bring the matter into court and prosecute the offender for impiety.

BOOK XI

[913] In the next place, dealings between man and man require to be suitably regulated. The principle of them is very simple:—Thou shalt not, if thou canst help, touch that which is mine, or remove the least thing which belongs to me without my consent; and may I be of a sound mind, and do to others as I would that they should do to me. First, let us speak of treasure trove:—May I never pray the Gods to find the hidden treasure which another has laid up for himself and his family, he not being one of my ancestors, nor lift, if I should find, such a treasure. And may I never have any dealings with those who are called diviners, and who in any way or manner counsel me to take up the deposit entrusted to the earth, for I should not gain so much in the increase of my possessions, if I take up the prize, as I should grow in justice and virtue of soul, if I abstain; and this will be a better possession to me than the other in a better part of myself; for the possession of justice in the soul is preferable to the possession of wealth. And of many things it is well said—"Move not the immovables," and this may be regarded as one of them. And we shall do well to believe the common tradition which says that such deeds prevent a man from having a family. Now as to him who is careless about having children and regardless of the legislator, taking up that which neither he deposited, nor any ancestor of his, without the consent of the depositor, violating the simplest and noblest of laws which was the enactment of no mean man:—"Take not up that which was not laid down by thee"—of him, I say, who despises these two legislators, and takes up, not small matter which he has not deposited, but perhaps a great heap of treasure, what he ought to suffer at the hands of the Gods, God only knows; but I would have the first person who sees him go and tell the wardens of the city, if the occurrence has taken place in the city, or if the occurrence has taken place in the agora he shall tell the wardens of the agora, or if in the country he shall tell the wardens of the country and their commanders. When information has been received the city shall send to Delphi, [914] and whatever the God answers about the money and the remover of the money, that the city shall do in obedience to the oracle; the informer, if he be a freeman, shall have the honour of doing rightly, and he who informs not, the dishonour of doing wrong; and if he be a slave who gives information, let him be freed, as he ought to be, by the state, which shall give his master the price of him; but if he do not inform he shall be punished with death. Next in order shall follow a similar law, which shall apply equally to matters great and small:—If a man happens to leave behind him some part of his property, whether intentionally or unintentionally, let him who may come upon the left property suffer it to remain, reflecting that such things are under the protection of the Goddess of ways, and are dedicated to her by the law. But if any one defies the law and takes the property home with him, let him, if the thing is of little worth, and the man who takes it a slave, be beaten with many stripes by him, being a person of not less than thirty years of age. Or if he be a freeman, in addition to being thought a mean person and a despiser of the laws, let him pay ten times the value of the treasure which he has moved to the leaver And if some one accuses another of having any thing which belongs to him whether little or much and the other admits that he has this thing but denies that the property in dispute belongs to the other, if the property be registered with the magistrates according to law the claimant shall summon the possessor who shall bring it before the magistrates and when it is brought into court if it be registered in the public registers to which of the litigants it belonged let him take it and go his way Or if the property be registered as belonging to some one who is not present whoever will offer sufficient surety on behalf of the absent person that he will give it up to him shall take it away as the representative of the other But if the property which is deposited be not registered with the magistrates let it remain until the time of trial with three of the eldest of the magistrates and if it be an animal which is deposited then he who loses the suit shall pay the magistrates for its keep and they shall determine the cause within three days

Cf. vi. 760.

Any one who is of sound mind may arrest his own slave and do with him whatever he will of such things as are lawful and he may arrest the runaway slave of any of his friends or kindred with a view to his safe keeping And if any one takes away him who is being carried off as a slave intending to liberate him he who is carrying him off shall let him go but he who takes him away shall give three sufficient sureties and if he give them and not without giving them he may take him away but if he take him away after any other manner he shall be deemed guilty of violence and being convicted shall pay as a penalty double the amount of the damages claimed to him who has been deprived of the slave [915] Any man may also carry off a freedman if he do not pay respect or sufficient respect to him who freed him Now the respect shall be that the freedman go three times in the month to the hearth of the person who freed him and offer to do whatever he ought so far as he can and he shall agree to make such a marriage as his former master approves He shall not be permitted to have more property than he who gave him liberty and what more he has shall belong to his master The freedman shall not remain in the state more than twenty years but like other foreigners[1] shall go away taking his entire property with him unless he has the consent of the magistrates and of his former master to remain. If a freedman or any other stranger has a property greater than the census of the third class at the expiration of thirty days from the day on which this comes to pass he shall take that which is his and go his way, and in this case he shall not be allowed to remain any longer by the magistrates And if any one disobeys this regulation and is brought into court and convicted he shall be punished with death and his property shall be confiscated Suits about these matters shall take place before the tribes unless the plaintiff and defendant have got rid of the accusation either before their neighbours or before judges chosen by them If a man lay claim to any animal or any thing else which he declares to be his let the possessor refer to the seller or to some honest and trustworthy person who has given or in some legitimate way made over the property to him if he be a citizen or a metic sojourning in the city within thirty days or if the property have been delivered to him by a stranger within five months of which the middle month shall include the summer solstice When goods are exchanged by selling and buying a man shall deliver them and receive the price of them at a fixed place in the agora and have done with the matter but he shall not buy or sell anywhere else nor give credit And if in any other manner or in any other place there be an exchange of one thing for another and the seller give credit to the man who buys from him he must do this on the understanding that the law gives no protection in cases of things sold not in accordance with these regulations[2] Again as to contributions any man who likes may go about collecting contributions as a friend among friends but if any difference arises about the collection he is to act on the understanding that the law gives no protection in such cases [916] He who sells anything above the value of fifty drachmas shall be required to remain in the city for ten days and the purchaser shall be informed of the house of the seller with a view to the sort of charges which are apt to arise in such cases and the restitutions which the law allows And let legal restitution be on this wise —If a man sells a slave who is in a consumption or who has the disease of the stone or of strangury or epilepsy or some other tedious and incurable disorder of body or mind which is not discernible to the ordinary man if the purchaser be a physician or trainer he shall have no right of restitution nor shall there be any right of restitution if the seller has told the truth before hand to the buyer But if a skilled person sells to another who is not skilled let the buyer appeal for restitut on within six months except in the case of epilepsy and then the appeal may be made within a year The cause shall be deter mined by such physicians as the parties may agree to choose and the defendant, if he lose the suit, shall pay double the price at which he sold. If a private person sell to another private person he shall have the right of restitution and the decision shall be given as before, but the defendant if he be cast, shall only pay back the price of the sla e. If a person sells a homi cide to another and they both know of the fact, let there be no restitution in such a case but if he do not know of the fact, there shall be a right of restitution, whenever the buyer makes the discovery and the decision shall rest with the five youngest guardians of the law and if the de cision be that the seller was cognisant of the fact, he shall purify the house of the purchaser according to the law of the interpreters, and shall pay back three times the purchase money

If a man exchanges e ther money for money r anything whatever for anything else either with or without life, let him gi e and receive them genuine and unadulterated in accordance w th the law And let us have a prelude about all this sort of roguery like the preludes of our other laws Every man should regard adultera tion as of one and the same class with false hood and dece t, concerning wh ch the many are too fond of say ng that at proper times and places the practice may often be right But they leave the occasion and the when and the where, un'efined and unsettled and from this want of defin teness in their langua e they do a great deal of harm to themsel es and to others No v a leg slator ought not to lea e the matter unde termined he ought to prescr be some l mit e ther greater or les Let this be the rule pre scribed —No one shall call the Gods to w tness when he says or does anyth ng false or deceit ful or dishonest unless he would be the most hateful of mank nd to them [917] And he is most hateful to them ho takes a false oath and pays no heed to the Gods and in the next de gree, he wh tells falsehood in the presence of his superiors Now better men are the superi ors of worse m n and in general elders are the super rs of th young wherefore also parents are the uper r of th r offspring and men of wo nen and h ld en and rulers of their sub ject for ll n en ought to reverence any one who i n po t on of authority and espe cially th se who re n state offices And this is the reason why I have spoken of these matters For every one who is guilty of adulteration in the agora tells a falsehood and deceives and when he invokes the Gods according to the customs and cautions of the wardens of the agora he does but swear without any respect for God or man Certainly it is an excellent rule not lightly to defile the names of the Gods, after the fashion of men in general who care little about piety and purity in their religious actions But if a man will not conform to this rule, let the law be as follows —He who sells anything in the agora shall not ask two prices for that which he sells but he shall ask one price and if he do not obtain this, he shall take a way his goods and on that day he shall not value them either at more or less and there shall be no praising of any goods or oath taken about them If a person disobeys this command any citizen who is present, not being less than thirty years of age, may with impunity chastise and beat the swearer but if instead of obeying the laws he takes no heed he shall be liable to the charge of having betrayed them If a man sells any adulterated goods and will not obey these regulations he who knows and can prove the fact and does prove it in the presence of the magistrates if he be a slave or a metic shall have the adulterated goods but if he be a citi zen and do not pursue the charge he shall be called a rogue, and deemed to have robbed the Gods of the agora or if he proves the charge, he shall dedicate the goods to the Gods of the agora He who is proved to have sold any adul terated goods in addition to losing the goods themselves shall be beaten with stripes—a stripe for a drachma, according to the pr ce of the goods and the herald shall proclaim in the agora the offence for which he is going to be beaten The wardens of the agora and the guard ians of the law shall obtain information from experienced persons about the rogueries and adulterations of the sellers and shall write up what the seller ought and ought not to do in each case and let them inscribe their laws on a column in front of the court of the wardens of the agora, that they may be clear instructors of those who have business in the agora [918] Enough has been said in what has preceded about the wardens of the city and if anything seems to be wanting let them communicate with the guardians of the law and write down the om ss on and place on a column in the court of the wardens of the city the primary and secondary regulat ons which are laid down for them about their office

After the practices of adulteration naturally follow the practices of retail trade Concerning these we will first of all give a word of counsel and reason and the law shall come afterwards Retail trade in a city is not by nature intended to do any harm but quite the contrary for is not he a benefactor who reduces the inequalities and incommensurabilities of goods to equality and common measure? And this is what the power of money accomplishes and the merchant may be said to be appointed for this purpose The hireling and the tavern keeper and many other occupations some of them more and others less seemly—alike have this object —they seek to satisfy our needs and equalize our possessions Let us then endeavour to see what has brought retail trade into ill-odour, and wherein lies the dishonour and unseemliness of it in order that if not entirely we may yet partially cure the evil by legislation To effect this is no easy matter and requires a great deal of virtue

Cleinias What do you mean?

Athenian Stranger Dear Cleinias the class of men is small—they must have been rarely gifted by nature and trained by education—who, when assailed by wants and desires are able to hold out and observe moderation and when they might make a great deal of money are sober in their wishes and prefer a moderate to a large gain But the mass of mankind are the very opposite their desires are unbounded and when they might gain in moderation they prefer gains without limit wherefore all that relates to retail trade and merchandise and the keeping of taverns is denounced and numbered among dishonourable things For if what I trust may never be and will not be we were to compel if I may venture to say a ridiculous thing the best men everywhere to keep taverns for a time or carry on retail trade, or do anything of that sort or if in consequence of some fate or necessity the best women were compelled to follow similar callings then we should know how agreeable and pleasant all these things are and if all such occupations were managed on incorrupt principles, they would be honoured as we honour a mother or a nurse But now that a man goes to desert places and builds houses which can only be reached by long journeys [919] for the sake of retail trade and receives strangers who are in need at the welcome resting place and gives them peace and calm when they are tossed by the storm or cool shade in the heat and then instead of behaving to them as friends and showing the duties of hospitality to his guests treats them as enemies and captives who are at his mercy and will not release them until they have paid the most unjust abominable, and extortionate ransom—these are the sort of practices and foul evils they are which cast a reproach upon the succour of adversity And the legislator ought always to be devising a remedy for evils of this nature There is an ancient saying which is also a true one— To fight against two opponents is a difficult thing as is seen in diseases and in many other cases And in this case also the war is against two enemies—wealth and poverty one of whom corrupts the soul of man with luxury while the other drives him by pain into utter shamelessness What remedy can a city of sense find against this disease? In the first place they must have as few retail traders as possible and in the second place, they must assign the occupation to that class of men whose corruption will be the least injury to the state and in the third place they must devise some way whereby the followers of these occupations themselves will not readily fall into habits of unbridled shamelessness and meanness

After this preface let our law run as follows and may fortune favour us —No landowner among the Magnetes whose city the God is restoring and resettling—no one that is of the 5040 families shall become a retail trader either voluntarily or involuntarily neither shall he be a merchant or do any service for private persons unless they equally serve him except for his father or his mother and their fathers and mothers and in general for his elders who are freemen and whom he serves as a freeman Now it is difficult to determine accurately the things which are worthy or unworthy of a freeman but let those who have obtained the prize of virtue give judgment about them in accordance with their feelings of right and wrong He who in any way shares in the illiberality of retail trades may be indicted for dishonouring his race by any one who likes before those who have been judged to be the first in virtue and if he appear to throw dirt upon his father's house by an unworthy occupation [920] let him be imprisoned for a year and abstain from that sort of thing and if he repeat the offence for two years and every time that he is convicted let the length of his imprisonment be doubled This shall be the second law —He who engages in retail trade must be either a metic or a stranger And a third law shall be —

[1] Cf Aristotle Politics 1 9 1 56ᵇ 40-1257ᵇ 17

In order that the retail trader who dwells in our city may be as good or as little bad as possible, the guardians of the law shall remember that they are not only guardians of those who may be easily watched and prevented from becoming lawless or bad, because they are well born and bred but still more should they have a watch over those who are of another sort, and follow pursuits which have a very strong tendency to make men bad And, therefore, in respect of the multifarious occupations of retail trade, that is to say in respect of such of them as are allowed to remain, because they seem to be quite necessary in a state—about these the guardians of the law should meet and take counsel with those who have experience of the several kinds of retail trade, as we before commanded concerning adulteration (which is a matter akin to this) and when they meet they shall consider what amount of receipts, after deducting expenses, will produce a moderate gain to the retail trades, and they shall fix in writing and strictly maintain what they find to be the right percentage of profit this shall be seen to by the wardens of the agora, and by the wardens of the city and by the wardens of the country And so retail trade will benefit every one, and do the least possible injury to those in the state who practise it.

When a man makes an agreement which he does not fulfil, unless the agreement be of a nature which the law or a vote of the assembly does not allow or which he has made under the influence of some unjust compulsion, or which he is prevented from fulfilling against his will by some unexpected chance, the other party may go to law with him in the courts of the tribes, for not having completed his agreement, if the parties are not able previously to come to terms before arbiters or before their neighbours. The class of craftsmen who have furnished human life with the arts is dedicated to Hephaestus and Athene and there is a class of craftsmen who preserve the works of all craftsmen by arts of defence, the votaries of Ares and Athene to which divinities they too are rightly dedicated All these continue through life serving the country and the people some of them are leaders in battle others make for hire implements and works, [921] and they ought not to deceive in such matters, out of respect to the Gods who are their ancestors. If any craftsman through indolence omit to execute his work in a given time not reverencing the God who gave him the means of life, but considering foolishly that he is his own God and will let him off easily in the first place, he shall suffer at the hands of the God, and in the second place, the law shall follow in a similar spirit. He shall owe to him who contracted with him the price of the works which he has failed in performing and he shall begin again and execute them gratis in the given time When a man undertakes a work, the law gives him the same advice which was given to the seller that he should not attempt to raise the price, but simply ask the value this the law enjoins also on the contractor for the craftsman assuredly knows the value of his work. Wherefore, in free states the man of art ought not to attempt to impose upon private individuals by the help of his art, which is by nature a true thing and he who is wronged in a matter of this sort, shall have a right of action against the party who has wronged him And if any one lets out work to a craftsman, and does not pay him duly according to the lawful agreement, disregarding Zeus the guardian of the city and Athene, who are the partners of the state, and overthrows the foundations of society for the sake of a little gain, in his case let the law and the Gods maintain the common bonds of the state. And let him who having already received the work in exchange, does not pay the price in the time agreed, pay double the price and if a year has elapsed although interest is not to be taken on loans, yet for every drachma which he owes to the contractor let him pay a monthly interest of an obol. Suits about these matters are to be decided by the courts of the tribes and by the way since we have mentioned craftsmen at all, we must not forget the other craft of war in which generals and tacticians are the craftsmen, who undertake voluntarily the work of our safety as other craftsmen undertake other public works—if they execute their work well the law will never tire of praising him who gives them those honours which are the just rewards of the soldier but if any one, having already received the benefit of any noble service in war does not make the due return of honour the law will blame him Let this then be the law having an ingredient of praise, [922] not compelling but advising the great body of the citizens to honour the brave men who are the saviours of the whole state whether by their courage or by their military skill—they should honour them, I say in the second place for the first and highest tribute of respect is to be given to those who are able above other men to honour the words of good legislators.

The greater part of the dealings between man and man have been now regulated by us with the exception of those that relate to orphans and the supervision of orphans by their guardians These follow next in order and must be regulated in some way But to arrive at them we must begin with the testamentary wishes of the dying and the case of those who may have happened to die intestate When I said Cleinias that we must regulate them I had in my mind the difficulty and perplexity in which all such matters are involved You cannot leave them unregulated for individuals would make regulations at variance with one another and repugnant to the laws and habits of the living and to their own previous habits, if a person were simply allowed to make any will which he pleased and this were to take effect in whatever state he may have been at the end of his life for most of us lose our senses in a manner and feel crushed when we think that we are about to die

Cle What do you mean Stranger?

Ath O Cleinias a man when he is about to die is an intractable creature and is apt to use language which causes a great deal of anxiety and trouble to the legislator

Cle In what way?

Ath He wants to have the entire control of all his property and will use angry words

Cle Such as what?

Ath O ye Gods he will say how monstrous that I am not allowed to give or not to give my own to whom I will—less to him who has been bad to me and more to him who has been good to me and whose badness and goodness have been tested by me in time of sickness or in old age and in every other sort of fortune!

Cle Well Stranger and may he not very fairly say so?

Ath In my opinion Cleinias the ancient legislators were too good natured and made laws without sufficient observation or consideration of human things

Cle What do you mean?

Ath I mean my friend that they were afraid of the testator s reproaches and so they passed a law to the effect that a man should be allowed to dispose of his property in all respects as he liked but you and I if I am not mistaken will have something better to say to our departing citizens [923]

Cle What?

Ath O my friends we will say to them hard is it for you who are creatures of a day to know what is yours—hard too as the Delphic oracle says to know yourselves at this hour Now I as the legislator regard you and your possessions not as belonging to yourselves, but as belonging to your whole family both past and future and yet more do I regard both family and possessions as belonging to the state wherefore if some one steals upon you with flattery when you are tossed on the sea of disease or old age and persuades you to dispose of your property in a way that is not for the best I will not, if I can help allow this but I will legislate with a view to the whole considering what is best both for the state and for the family esteeming as I ought the feelings of an individual at a lower rate and I hope that you will depart in peace and kindness towards us as you are going the way of all mankind and we will im*partially take care of all your concerns not neg*lecting any of them if we can possibly help Let this be our prelude and consolation to the living and dying Cleinias and let the law be as follows

He who makes a disposition in a testament, if he be the father of a family shall first of all inscribe as his heir any one of his sons whom he may think fit and if he gives any of his chil*dren to be adopted by another citizen* let the adoption be inscribed And if he has a son remaining over and above who has not been adopted upon any lot and who may be expected to be sent out to a colony according to law to him his father may give as much as he pleases of the rest of his property with the exception of the paternal lot and the fixtures on the lot And if there are other sons let him dis*tribute among them* what there is more than the lot in such portions as he pleases And if one of the sons has already a house of his own he shall not give him of the money nor shall he give money to a daughter who has been betrothed but if she is not betrothed he may give her money And if any of the sons or daughters shall be found to have another lot of land in the country which has accrued after the testament has been made they shall leave the lot which they have inherited to the heir of the man who has made the will If the testator has no sons but only daughters let him choose the husband of any one of his daughters whom he pleases and leave and inscribe him as his son and heir And if a man have lost his son when he was a child and before he could be reckoned among grown up men whether his own or an adopted son [924] let the testator make mention of the circumstance and inscribe whom he will to be his second son in hope of better fortune If the testator has no children at all he may select and give to any one whom he pleases the tenth part of the property which he has acquired but let him not be blamed if he gives all the rest to his adopted son, and makes a friend of him according to the law If the sons of a man require guardians, and the father when he dies leaves a will appointing guardians, those who have been named by him, whoever they are and whatever their number be, if they are able and willing to take charge of the children shall be recognized according to the provisions of the will. But if he dies and has made no will or a will in which he has appointed no guardians, then the next of kin, two on the father's and two on the mother's side, and one of the friends of the deceased, shall have the authority of guardians, whom the guardians of the law shall appoint when the orphans require guardians. And the fifteen eldest guardians of the law shall have the whole care and charge of the orphans, divided into threes according to seniority—a body of three for one year and then another body of three for the next year until the cycle of the five periods is complete and thus, as far as possible, is to continue always If a man dies, having made no will at all, and leaves sons who require the care of guardians, they shall share in the protection which is afforded by these laws.

And if a man dying by some unexpected fate leaves daughters behind him, let him pardon the legislator if when he gives them in marriage, he have a regard only to two out of three conditions—nearness of kin and the preservation of the lot, and omits the third condition, which a father would naturally consider for he would choose out of all the citizens a son for himself, and a husband for his daughter with a view to his character and disposition—the father I say shall forgive the legislator if he disregards this, which to him is an impossible consideration Let the law about these matters where practicable be as follows —If a man dies without making a will and leaves behind him daughters let his brother being the son of the same father or of the same mother having no lot, marry the daughter and have the lot of the dead man And if he have no brother but only a brother's son, in like manner let them marry if they be of a suitable age and if there be not even a brother's son, but only the son of a sister let them do likewise and so in the fourth degree if there be only the testator's father's brother or in the fifth degree, his father's brother's son, or in the sixth degree, the child of his father's sister. Let kindred be always reckoned in this way if a person leaves daughters the relationship shall proceed upwards through brothers and sisters, and brothers and sisters children [925] and first the males shall come, and after them the females in the same family The judge shall consider and determine the suitableness or unsuitableness of age in marriage he shall make an inspection of the males naked, and of the women naked down to the navel And if there be a lack of kinsmen in a family extending to grandchildren of a brother or to the grandchildren of a grandfather's children the maiden may choose with the consent of her guardians any one of the citizens who is willing and whom she wills, and he shall be the heir of the dead man and the husband of his daughter Circumstances vary and there may sometimes be a still greater lack of relations within the limits of the state and if any maiden has no kindred living in the city and there is some one who has been sent out to a colony and she is disposed to make him the heir of her father's possessions, if he be indeed of her kindred let him proceed to take the lot according to the regulation of the law but if he be not of her kindred she having no kinsmen within the city and he be chosen by the daughter of the dead man, and empowered to marry by the guardians, let him return home and take the lot of him who died intestate. And if a man has no children, either male or female and dies without making a will, let the previous law in general hold and let a man and a woman go forth from the family and share the deserted house, and let the lot belong absolutely to them and let the heiress in the first degree be a sister and in a second degree a daughter of a brother and in the third, a daughter of a sister in the fourth degree the sister of a father and in the fifth degree the daughter of a father's brother and in a sixth degree of a father's sister and these shall dwell with their male kinsmen according to the degree of relationship and right, as we enacted before Now we must not conceal from ourselves that such laws are apt to be oppressive and that there may sometimes be a hardship in the lawgiver commanding the kinsman of the dead man to marry his relation he may be thought not to have considered the innumerable hindrances which may arise among men in the execution of such ordinances for there may be cases in which the parties refuse to obey and are ready to do anything rather than marry when there is some bodily or mental malady or defect among those who are bidden to marry or be married Persons may fancy that the legislator never thought of this, but they are mistaken wherefore let us make a common prelude on behalf of the lawgiver and of his subjects the law begging the latter to forgive the legislator in that he having to take care of the common weal cannot order at the same time the various circumstances of individuals [926] and begging him to pardon them if naturally they are sometimes unable to fulfil the act which he in his ignorance imposes upon them

Cle And how Stranger can we act most fairly under the circumstances?

Ath There must be arbiters chosen to deal with such laws and the subjects of them

Cle What do you mean?

Ath I mean to say that a case may occur in which the nephew having a rich father will be unwilling to marry the daughter of his uncle he will have a feeling of pride and he will wish to look higher And there are cases in which the legislator will be imposing upon him the greatest calamity and he will be compelled to disobey the law if he is required for example to take a wife who is mad or has some other terrible malady of soul or body such as makes life intolerable to the sufferer Then let what we are saying concerning these cases be embodied in a law —If any one finds fault with the established laws respecting testaments both as to other matters and especially in what relates to marriage and asserts that the legislator if he were alive and present would not compel him to obey—that is to say would not compel those who are by our law required to marry or be given in marriage to do either—and some kinsman or guardian dispute this the reply is that the legislator left fifteen of the guardians of the law to be arbiters and fathers of orphans male or female and to them let the disputants have recourse and by their aid determine any matters of the kind admitting their decision to be final But if any one thinks that too great power is thus given to the guardians of the law let him bring his adversaries into the court of the select judges and there have the points in dispute determined And he who loses the cause shall have censure and blame from the legislator which by a man of sense is felt to be a penalty far heavier than a great loss of money

Thus will orphan children have a second birth After their first birth we spoke of their nurture and education and after their second birth when they have lost their parents we ought to take measures that the misfortune of orphanhood may be as little sad to them as possible In the first place we say that the guardians of the law are lawgivers and fathers to them not inferior to their natural fathers Moreover, they shall take charge of them year by year[1] as of their own kindred, and we have given both to them and to the children s own guardians a suitable admonition concerning the nurture of orphans [927] And we seem to have spoken opportunely in our former discourse when we said that the souls of the dead have the power after death of taking an interest in human affairs, about which there are many tales and traditions long indeed but true and seeing that they are so many and so ancient we must believe them and we must also believe the lawgivers who tell us that these things are true if they are not to be regarded as utter fools But if these things are really so in the first place men should have a fear of the Gods above who regard the loneliness of the orphans and in the second place of the souls of the departed who by nature incline to take an especial care of their own children and are friendly to those who honour and unfriendly to those who dishonour them Men should also fear the souls of the living who are aged and high in honour wherever a city is well ordered and prosperous their descendants cherish them and so live happily old persons are quick to see and hear all that relates to them and are propitious to those who are just in the fulfilment of such duties, and they punish those who wrong the orphan and the desolate considering that they are the greatest and most sacred of trusts To all which matters the guardian and magistrate ought to apply his mind if he has any and take heed of the nurture and education of the orphans seeking in every possible way to do them good for he is making a contribution to his own good and that of his children He who obeys the tale which precedes the law and does no wrong to an orphan will never experience the wrath of the legislator But he who is disobedient and wrongs any one who is bereft of father or mother shall pay twice the penalty which he would have paid if he had wronged one whose parents had been alive As touching other legislation concerning guardians in their relation to orphans or concerning magistrates and their superintendence of the guardians if they did not possess examples of the manner in which children of freemen should be brought up in the bringing up of their own children and of the care of their property in the care of their own or if they had not just laws fairly stated

Cf ix. 865

about these very things—there would have been reason in making laws for them, under the idea that they were a peculiar class, and we might distinguish and make separate rules for the life of those who are orphans and of those who are not orphans. But as the case stands, the condition of orphans with us is not different from the case of those who have a father though in regard to honour and dishonour and the attention given to them, the two are not usually placed upon a level. [928] Wherefore, touching the legislation about orphans, the law speaks in serious accents, both of persuasion and threatening, and such a threat as the following will be by no means out of place —He who is the guardian of an orphan of either sex, and he among the guardians of the law to whom the superintendence of this guardian has been assigned, shall love the unfortunate orphan as though he were his own child, and he shall be as careful and diligent in the management of his possessions as he would be if they were his own, or even more careful and diligent. Let every one who has the care of an orphan observe this law But any one who acts contrary to the law on these matters, if he be a guardian of the child, may be fined by a magistrate, or if he be himself a magistrate, the guardian may bring him before the court of select judges, and punish him, if convicted, by exacting a fine of double the amount of that inflicted by the court. And if a guardian appears to the relations of the orphan, or to any other citizen, to act negligently or dishonestly let them bring him before the same court, and whatever damages are given against him, let him pay fourfold, and let half belong to the orphan and half to him who procured the conviction. If any orphan arrives at years of discretion, and thinks that he has been ill-used by his guardians, let him within five years of the expiration of the guardianship be allowed to bring them to trial and if any of them be convicted, the court shall determine what he shall pay or suffer And if a magistrate shall appear to have wronged the orphan by neglect, and he be convicted, let the court determine what he shall suffer or pay to the orphan, and if there be dishonesty in addition to neglect, besides paying the fine, let him be deposed from his office of guardian of the law and let the state appoint another guardian of the law for the city and for the country in his room

Greater differences than there ought to be sometimes arise between fathers and sons, on the part either of fathers who will be of opinion that the legislator should enact that they may if they wish, lawfully renounce their son by the proclamation of a herald in the face of the world, or of sons who think that they should be allowed to indict their fathers on the charge of imbecility when they are disabled by disease or old age. These things only happen as a matter of fact, where the natures of men are utterly bad for where only half is bad, as, for example, if the father be not bad but the son be bad, or conversely no great calamity is the result of such an amount of hatred as this. In another state, a son disowned by his father would not of necessity cease to be a citizen, but in our state, of which these are to be the laws, [929] the disinherited must necessarily emigrate into another country for no addition can be made even of a single family to the 5040 households and, therefore, he who deserves to suffer these things must be renounced not only by his father who is a single person, but by the whole family and what is done in these cases must be regulated by some such law as the following —He who in the sad disorder of his soul has a mind, justly or unjustly to expel from his family a son whom he has begotten and brought up shall not lightly or at once execute his purpose but first of all he shall collect together his own kinsmen, extending to cousins, and in like manner his son s kinsmen by the mother s side, and in their presence he shall accuse his son, setting forth that he deserves at the hands of them all to be dismissed from the family and the son shall be allowed to address them in a similar manner and show that he does not deserve to suffer any of these things. And if the father persuades them, and obtains the suffrages of more than half of his kindred, exclusive of the father and mother and the offender himself—I say if he obtains more than half the suffrages of all the other grown-up members of the family of both sexes, the father shall be permitted to put away his son, but not otherwise And if any other citizen is willing to adopt the son who is put away no law shall hinder him for the characters of young men are subject to many changes in the course of their lives. And if he has been put away and in a period of ten years no one is willing to adopt him, let those who have the care of the superabundant population which is sent out into colonies, see to him, in order that he may be suitably provided for in the colony And if disease or age or harshness of temper or all these together makes a man to be more out of his mind than the rest of the world are—but this is not observable, except to those who live with him—and he, being mas-

they are mistaken wherefore let us make a common prelude on behalf of the lawgiver and of his subjects the law begging the latter to forgive the legislator in that he having to take care of the common weal cannot order at the same time the various circumstances of individuals [926] and begging him to pardon them if naturally they are sometimes unable to fulfil the act which he in his ignorance imposes upon them

Thus will orphan children have a second birth After their first birth we spoke of their nurture and education and after their second birth when they have lost their parents we ought to take measures that the misfortune of orphanhood may be as little sad to them as possible In the first place we say that the guardians of the law are lawgivers and fathers to them not inferior to their natural fathers. Moreover they shall take charge of them year by year[1] as of their own kindred and we have given both to them and to the children s own guardians a suitable admonition concerning the nurture of orphans [927] And we seem to have spoken opportunely in our former discourse when we said that the souls of the dead have the power after death of taking an interest in human affairs about which there are many tales and traditions long indeed but true and seeing that they are so many and so ancient we must believe them and we must also believe the lawgivers who tell us that these things are true if they are not to be regarded as utter fools. But if these things are really so in the first place men should have a fear of the Gods above who regard the loneliness of the orphans and in the second place of the souls of the departed, who by nature incline to take an especial care of their own children and are friendly to those who honour and unfriendly to those who dishonour them Men should also fear the souls of the living who are aged and high in honour wherever a city is well ordered and prosperous, their descendants cherish them and so live happily old persons are quick to see and hear all that relates to them and are propitious to those who are just in the fulfilment of such duties, and they punish those who wrong the orphan and the desolate considering that they are the greatest and most sacred of trusts To all which matters the guardian and magistrate ought to apply his mind if he has any and take heed of the nurture and education of the orphans, seeking in every possible way to do them good for he is making a contribution to his own good and that of his children He who obeys the tale which precedes the law and does no wrong to an orphan will never experience the wrath of the legislator But he who is disobedient, and wrongs any one who is bereft of father or mother shall pay twice the penalty which he would have paid if he had wronged one whose parents had been alive As touching other legislation concerning guardians in their relation to orphans or concerning magistrates and their superintendence of the guardians if they did not possess examples of the manner in which children of freemen should be brought up in the bringing up of their own children and of the care of their property in the care of their own or if they had not just laws fairly stated

about these very things—there would have been reason in making laws for them under the idea that they were a peculiar class, and we might distinguish and make separate rules for the life of those who are orphans and of those who are not orphans But as the case stands, the condition of orphans with us is not different from the case of those who have a father though in regard to honour and dishonour and the attention given to them the two are not usually placed upon a level [9 8] Wherefore, touching the legislation about orphans the law speaks in serious accents, both of persuasion and threatening and such a threat as the following will be by no means out of place —He who is the guardian of an orphan of either sex, and he among the guardians of the law to whom the superintendence of this guardian has been assigned, shall love the unfortunate orphan as though he were his own child and he shall be as careful and diligent in the management of his possessions as he would be if they were his own, or even more careful and diligent Let every one who has the care of an orphan observe this law But any one who acts contrary to the law on these matters, if he be a guardian of the child, may be fined by a magistrate or if he be himself a magistrate, the guardian may bring him before the court of select judges, and punish him, if convicted by exacting a fine of double the amount of that inflicted by the court. And if a guardian appears to the relations of the orphan, or to any other citizen to act negligently or dishonestly let them bring him before the same court, and whatever damages are given against him, let him pay fourfold and let half belong to the orphan and half to him who procured the conviction If any orphan arrives at years of discretion, and thinks that he has been ill used by his guardians let him within five years of the expiration of the guardianship be allowed to bring them to trial and if any of them be convicted, the court shall determine what he shall pay or suffer And if a magistrate shall appear to have wronged the orphan by neglect, and he be convicted let the court determine what he shall suffer or pay to the orphan and if there be dishonesty in addition to neglect, besides paying the fine let him be deposed from his office of guardian of the law and let the state appoint another guardian of the law for the city and for the country in his room

Greater differences than there ought to be sometimes arise between fathers and sons on the part either of fathers who will be of opinion that the legislator should enact that they may if they wish lawfully renounce their son by the proclamation of a herald in the face of the world, or of sons who think that they should be allowed to indict their fathers on the charge of imbecility when they are disabled by disease or old age. These things only happen as a matter of fact, where the natures of men are utterly bad for where only half is bad as, for example, if the father be not bad but the son be bad or conversely no great calamity is the result of such an amount of hatred as this In another state a son disowned by his father would not of necessity cease to be a citizen but in our state, of which these are to be the laws [9 9] the disinherited must necessarily emigrate into another country for no addition can be made even of a single family to the 5040 households and therefore, he who deserves to suffer these things must be renounced not only by his father who is a single person but by the whole family and what is done in these cases must be regulated by some such law as the following —He who in the sad disorder of his soul has a mind justly or unjustly to expel from his family a son whom he has begotten and brought up shall not lightly or at once execute his purpose but first of all he shall collect together his own kinsmen extending to cousins, and in like manner his son s kinsmen by the mother s side and in their presence he shall accuse his son setting forth that he deserves at the hands of them all to be dismissed from the family and the son shall be allowed to address them in a similar manner and show that he does not deserve to suffer any of these things And if the father persuades them and obtains the suffrages of more than half of his kindred exclusive of the father and mother and the offender himself—I say if he obtains more than half the suffrages of all the other grown up members of the family of both sexes the father shall be permitted to put away his son, but not otherwise And if any other citizen is willing to adopt the son who is put away no law shall hinder him for the characters of young men are subject to many changes in the course of their lives And if he has been put away and in a period of ten years no one is willing to adopt him, let those who have the care of the superabundant population which is sent out into colonies see to him in order that he may be suitably provided for in the colony And if disease or age or harshness of temper or all these together makes a man to be more out of his mind than the rest of the world are—but this is not observable except to those who live with him—and he being mas-

they are mistaken wherefore let us make a common prelude on behalf of the lawgiver and of his subjects the law begging the latter to forgive the legislator in that he having to take care of the common weal cannot order at the same time the various circumstances of individuals [926] and begging him to pardon them if naturally they are sometimes unable to fulfil the act which he in his ignorance imposes upon them

Cle And how Stranger can we act most fairly under the circumstances?

Ath There must be arbiters chosen to deal with such laws and the subjects of them

Cle What do you mean?

Ath I mean to say that a case may occur in which the nephew having a rich father will be unwilling to marry the daughter of his uncle he will have a feeling of pride and he will wish to look higher And there are cases in which the legislator will be imposing upon him the greatest calamity and he will be compelled to disobey the law if he is required for example to take a wife who is mad or has some other terrible malady of soul or body such as makes life intolerable to the sufferer Then let what we are saying concerning these cases be embodied in a law —If any one finds fault with the established laws respecting testaments both as to other matters and especially in what relates to marriage and asserts that the legislator if he were alive and present would not compel him to obey—that is to say would not compel those who are by our law required to marry or be given in marriage to do either—and some kinsman or guardian dispute this the reply is that the legislator left fifteen of the guardians of the law to be arbiters and fathers of orphans male or female and to them let the disputants have recourse and by their aid determine any matters of the kind admitting their decision to be final But if any one thinks that too great power is thus given to the guardians of the law let him bring his adversaries into the court of the select judges and there have the points in dispute determined And he who loses the cause shall have censure and blame from the legislator which by a man of sense is felt to be a penalty far heavier than a great loss of money

Thus will orphan children have a second birth After their first birth we spoke of their nurture and education and after their second birth when they have lost their parents we ought to take measures that the misfortune of orphanhood may be as little sad to them as possible In the first place, we say that the guardians of the law are lawgivers and fathers to them not inferior to their natural fathers. seem to be contrary to their nature.

Cle. Certainly.

Ath. We are right then, as I was saying, to say that we can possess no image which is more honoured by the Gods than that of a father or grandfather, or of a mother stricken in years; whom when a man honours, the heart of the God rejoices, and he is ready to answer their prayers. And truly the figure of an ancestor is a wonderful thing, far higher than that of a lifeless image. For the living, when they are honoured by us, join in our prayers, and when they are dishonoured, they utter imprecations against us; but lifeless objects do neither. And therefore, if a man makes a right use of his father and grandfather and other aged relations, he will have images which above all others will win him the favour of the Gods.

Cle. Excellent.

Ath. Every man of any understanding fears and respects the prayers of parents, knowing well that many times and to many persons they have been accomplished. Now these things being thus ordered by nature, [932] good men think it a blessing from heaven if their parents live to old age and reach the utmost limit of human life, or if taken away before their time they are deeply regretted by them; but to bad men parents are always a cause of terror. Wherefore let every man honour with every sort of lawful honour his own parents, agreeably to what has now been said. But if this prelude be an unmeaning sound in the ears of any one, let the law follow which may be rightly imposed in these terms:—If any one in this city be not sufficiently careful of his parents, and do not regard and gratify in every respect their wishes more than those of his sons and of his other offspring or of himself—let him who experiences this sort of treatment either come himself, or send some one to inform the three eldest guardians of the law and three of the women who have the care of marriages; and let them look to the matter and punish youthful evil-doers with stripes and bonds if they are under thirty years of age, that is to say, if they be men, or if they be women, let them undergo the same punishment up to forty years of age. But if, when they are still more advanced in years, they continue the same neglect of their parents, and do any hurt to any of them, let them be brought before a court in which every single one of the eldest citizens shall be the judges, and if the offender be convicted, let the court determine what he ought to pay or suffer, and any penalty may be imposed on him which a man can pay or suffer. If the person who has been wronged be unable to inform the magistrates, let any freeman who hears of his case inform, and if he do not, he shall be deemed base, and shall be liable to have a suit for damage brought against him by any one who likes. And if a slave inform, he shall receive freedom; and if he be the slave of the injurer or injured party, he shall be set free by the magistrates, or if he belong to any other citizen, the public shall pay a price on his behalf to the owner; and let the magistrates take heed that no one wrongs him out of revenge, because he has given information.

Cases in which one man injures another by poisons, and which prove fatal, have been already discussed; but about other cases in which a person intentionally and of malice harms another with meats, or drinks, or ointments, nothing has as yet been determined. For there are two kinds of poisons used among men, which cannot clearly be distinguished. There is the kind just now explicitly mentioned, [933] which injures bodies by the use of other bodies according to a natural law; there is also another kind which persuades the more daring class that they can do injury by sorceries, and incantations, and magic knots, as they are termed, and makes others believe that they above all persons are injured by the powers of the magician. Now it is not easy to know the nature of all these things; nor if a man do know can he readily persuade others to believe him. And when men are disturbed in their minds at the sight of waxen images fixed either at their doors, or in a place where three ways meet, or on the sepulchres of parents, there is no use in trying to persuade them that they should despise all such things because they have no certain knowledge about them. But we must have a law in two parts, concerning poisoning, in whichever of the two ways the attempt is made, and we must entreat, and exhort, and advise men not to have recourse to such practices, by which they scare the multitude out of their wits, as if they were children, compelling the legislator and the judge to heal the fears which the sorcerer arouses, and to tell them in the first place, that he who attempts to poison or enchant others knows not what he is doing, either as regards the body (unless he has a knowledge of medicine), or as regards his enchantments (unless he happens to be a prophet or diviner). Let the law, then, run as follows about poisoning or witchcraft:—He who employs poison to do any injury, not fatal, to a man himself, or to his

Cf. ix. 870, ff.

ter of his property, is the ruin of the house and his son doubts and hesitates about indicting his father for insanity let the law in that case ordain that he shall first of all go to the eldest guardians of the law and tell them of his father s misfortune and they shall duly look into the matter and take counsel as to whether he shall indict him or not And if they advise him to proceed they shall be both his witnesses and his advocates and if the father is cast he shall henceforth be incapable of ordering the least particular of his life let him be as a child dwelling in the house for the remainder of his days And if a man and his wife have an unfortunate incompatibility of temper ten of the guardians of the law who are impartial and ten of the women who regulate marriages[1] [930] shall look to the matter and if they are able to reconcile them they shall be formally reconciled but if their souls are too much tossed with passion they shall endeavour to find other partners Now they are not likely to have very gentle tempers and therefore we must endeavour to associate with them deeper and softer natures Those who have no children or only a few at the time of their separation should choose their new partners with a view to the procreation of children but those who have a sufficient number of children should separate and marry again in order that they may have some one to grow old with and that the pair may take care of one another in age If a woman dies leaving children male or female the law will advise rather than compel the husband to bring up the children without introducing into the house a step-mother But if he have no children then he shall be compelled to marry until he has begotten a sufficient number of sons to his family and to the state And if a man dies leaving a sufficient number of children the mother of his children shall remain with them and bring them up But if she appears to be too young to live virtuously without a husband let her relations communicate with the women who superintend marriage and let both together do what they think best in these matters if there is a lack of children let the choice be made with a view to having them two children one of either sex, shall be deemed sufficient in the eye of the law When a child is admitted to be the offspring of certain parents and is acknowledged by them but there is need of a decision as to which parent the child is to follow—in case a female slave have intercourse with a male slave or with a freeman or freedman the offspring shall always belong to the master of the female slave Again if a free woman have intercourse with a male slave the offspring shall belong to the master of the slave but if a child be born either of a slave by her master or of his mistress by a slave—and this be proven—the offspring of the woman and its father shall be sent away by the women who superintend marriage into another country and the guardians of the law shall send away the offspring of the man and its mother

Neither God nor a man who has understanding will ever advise any one to neglect his parents To a discourse concerning the honour and dishonour of parents a prelude such as the following about the service of the Gods will be a suitable introduction —There are ancient customs about the Gods which are universal, and they are of two kinds [931] some of the Gods we see with our eyes and we honour them of others we honour the images raising statues of them which we adore and though they are lifeless yet we imagine that the living Gods have a good will and gratitude to us on this account Now if a man has a father or mother or their fathers or mothers treasured up in his house stricken in years let him consider that no statue can be more potent to grant his requests than they are who are sitting at his hearth if only he knows how to show true service to them

Cle And what do you call the true mode of service?

Ath I will tell you O my friend for such things are worth listening to

Cle Proceed

Ath Oedipus as tradition says when dishonoured by his sons invoked on them curses which every one declares to have been heard and ratified by the Gods and Amyntor in his wrath invoked curses on his son Phoenix and Theseus upon Hippolytus and innumerable others have also called down wrath upon their children whence it is clear that the Gods listen to the imprecations of parents for the curses of parents are as they ought to be mighty against their children as no others are And shall we suppose that the prayers of a father or mother who is specially dishonoured by his or her children are heard by the Gods in accordance with nature and that if a parent is honoured by them and in the gladness of his heart earnestly entreats the Gods in his prayers to do them good he is not equally heard and that they do not minister to his request? If not they would be very unjust ministers of good and that we

and ridiculous if they attempt in a good natured manner to turn the laugh against our citizens? or do we draw the distinction of jest and earnest, and allow a man to make use of ridicule in jest and without anger about any thing or person though as we were saying not if he be angry and have a set purpose? We for bid earnest—that is unalterably fixed but we have still to say who are to be sanctioned or not to be sanctioned by the law in the employ ment of innocent humour A comic poet, or maker of iambic or satirical lyric verse, shall not be permitted to ridicule any of the citizens, either by word or likeness, either in anger or without anger And if any one is disobedient, the judges shall either at once expel him from the country or he shall pay a fine of three mi nae, which shall be dedicated to the God who presides over the contests [936] Those only who have received permission shall be allowed to write verses at one another but they shall be without anger and in jest, in anger and in seri ous earnest they shall not be allowed The de cision of this matter shall be left to the superin tendent of the general education of the young and whatever he may license, the writer shall be allowed to produce, and whatever he rejects let not the poet himself exhibit, or ever teach anybody else, slave or freeman, under the pen alty of being dishonoured, and held disobedient to the laws.

Now he is not to be pitied who is hungry or who suffers any bodily pain but he who is tem perate, or has some other virtue, or part of a virtue, and at the same time suffers from mis fortune it would be an extraordinary thing if such an one, whether slave or freeman, were utterly forsaken and fell into the extremes of poverty in any tolerably well-ordered city or government. Wherefore the legislator may safe ly make a law applicable to such cases in the following terms —Let there be no beggars in our state and if anybody begs, seeking to pick up a livelihood by unavailing prayers let the wardens of the agora turn him out of the agora, and the wardens of the city out of the city and the wardens of the country send him out of any other parts of the land across the border in or der that the land may be cleared of this sort of animal.

If a slave of either sex injure anything which is not his or her own, through inexperience, or some improper practice, and the person who suffers damage be not himself in part to blame, the master of the slave who has done the harm shall either make full satisfaction or give up the slave who has done the injury But if the master argue that the charge has arisen by col lusion between the injured party and the in jurer with the view of obtaining the slave let him sue the person who says that he has been injured for malpractices And if he gain a con viction let him receive double the value which the court fixes as the price of the slave and if he lose his suit let him make amends for the injury and give up the slave And if a beast of burden, or horse, or dog or any other animal injure the property of a neighbour the owner shall in like manner pay for the injury

If any man refuses to be a witness he who wants him shall summon him and he who is summoned shall come to the trial and if he knows and is willing to bear witness, let him bear witness, but if he says he does not know let him swear by the three divinities Zeus, and Apollo and Themis, that he does not and have no more to do with the cause. [937] And he who is summoned to give witness and does not answer to his summoner shall be liable for the harm which ensues according to law And if a person calls up as a witness any one who is act ing as a judge, let him give his witness but he shall not afterwards vote in the cause A free woman may give her witness and plead if she be more than forty years of age, and may bring an action if she have no husband but if her hus band be alive she shall only be allowed to bear witness. A slave of either sex and a child shall be allowed to give evidence and to plead but only in cases of murder and they must produce sufficient sureties that they will certainly re main until the trial in case they should be charged with false witness And either of the parties in a cause may bring an accusation of perjury against witnesses, touching their evi dence in whole or in part, if he asserts that such evidence has been given but the accusation must be brought previous to the final decision of the cause. The magistrates shall preserve the accusations of false witness, and have them kept under the seal of both parties and produce them on the day when the trial for false wit ness takes place If a man be twice convicted of false witness he shall not be required and if thrice, he shall not be allowed to bear witness and if he dare to witness after he has been con victed three times let any one who pleases in form against him to the magistrates and let the magistrates hand him over to the court, and if he be convicted he shall be punished with death And in any case in which the evidence is right ly found to be false, and yet to have given the servants or any injury whether fatal or not, to his cattle or his bees if he be a physician and be convicted of poisoning shall be punished with death or if he be a private person, the court shall determine what he is to pay or suffer But he who seems to be the sort of man who injures others by magic knots, or enchantments or incantations or any of the like practices if he be a prophet or diviner let him die and if not being a prophet he be convicted of witchcraft, as in the previous case, let the court fix what he ought to pay or suffer

When a man does another any injury by theft or violence for the greater injury let him pay greater damages to the injured man, and less for the smaller injury but in all cases whatever the injury may have been, as much as will compensate the loss And besides the compensation of the wrong let a man pay a further penalty for the chastisement of his offence [934] he who has done the wrong instigated by the folly of another through the lightheartedness of youth or the like, shall pay a lighter penalty but he who has injured another through his own folly when overcome by pleasure or pain in cowardly fear or lust, or envy or implacable anger, shall endure a heavier punishment Not that he is punished because he did wrong for that which is done can never be undone but in order that in future times he and those who see him corrected, may utterly hate injustice or at any rate abate much of their evil-doing Having an eye to all these things the law, like a good archer should aim at the right measure of punishment and in all cases at the deserved punishment In the attainment of this the judge shall be a fellow worker with the legislator whenever the law leaves to him to determine what the offender shall suffer or pay and the legislator, like a painter shall give a rough sketch of the cases in which the law is to be applied This is what we must do Megillus and Cleinias in the best and fairest manner that we can saying what the punishments are to be of all actions of theft and violence and giving laws of such a kind as the Gods and sons of Gods would have us give

If a man is mad he shall not be at large in the city, but his relations shall keep him at home in any way which they can, or if not let them pay a penalty—he who is of the highest class shall pay a penalty of one hundred drachmae whether he be a slave or a freeman whom he neglects and he of the second class shall pay four fifths of a mina and he of the third class three fifths and he of the fourth class two-fifths Now there are many sorts of madness, some arising out of disease, which we have already mentioned and there are other kinds, which originate in an evil and passionate temperament and are increased by bad education out of a slight quarrel this class of madmen will often raise a storm of abuse against one another and nothing of that sort ought to be allowed to occur in a well-ordered state Let this, then be the law about abuse which shall relate to all cases —No one shall speak evil of another and when a man disputes with another he shall teach and learn of the disputant and the company but he shall abstain from evil speaking for out of the imprecations which men utter against one another [935] and the feminine habit of casting aspersions on one another and using foul names out of words light as air in very deed the greatest enmities and hatreds spring up For the speaker gratifies his anger which is an ungracious element of his nature and nursing up his wrath by the entertainment of evil thoughts and exacerbating that part of his soul which was formerly civilized by education he lives in a state of savageness and moroseness and pays a bitter penalty for his anger And in such cases almost all men take to saying something ridiculous about their opponent and there is no man who is in the habit of laughing at another who does not miss virtue and earnestness altogether or lose the better half of greatness Wherefore let no one utter any taunting word at a temple or at the public sacrifices or at the games or in the agora or in a court of justice or in any public assembly And let the magistrate who presides on these occasions chastise an offender and he shall be blameless but if he fails in doing so he shall not claim the prize of virtue for he is one who heeds not the laws and does not do what the legislator commands And if in any other place any one indulges in these sort of revilings whether he has begun the quarrel or is only retaliating let any elder who is present support the law and control with blows those who indulge in passion which is another great evil and if he do not let him be liable to pay the appointed penalty And we say now that he who deals in reproaches against others cannot reproach them without attempting to ridicule them and this when done in a moment of anger is what we make matter of reproach against him But then do we admit into our state the comic writers[1] who are so fond of making man and ridiculous, if they attempt in a good-natured manner to turn the laugh against our citizens? or do we draw the distinction of jest and earnest, and allow a man to make use of ridicule in jest and without anger about any thing or person; though as we were saying, not if he be angry and have a set purpose? We forbid earnest—that is unalterably fixed; but we have still to say who are to be sanctioned or not to be sanctioned by the law in the employment of innocent humour. A comic poet, or maker of iambic or satirical lyric verse, shall not be permitted to ridicule any of the citizens, either by word or likeness, either in anger or without anger. And if any one is disobedient, the judges shall either at once expel him from the country, or he shall pay a fine of three minae, which shall be dedicated to the God who presides over the contests. [936] Those only who have received permission shall be allowed to write verses at one another; but they shall be without anger and in jest; in anger and in serious earnest they shall not be allowed. The decision of this matter shall be left to the superintendent of the general education of the young, and whatever he may license, the writer shall be allowed to produce, and whatever he rejects let not the poet himself exhibit, or ever teach anybody else, slave or freeman, under the penalty of being dishonoured, and held disobedient to the laws.

Now he is not to be pitied who is hungry, or who suffers any bodily pain, but he who is temperate, or has some other virtue, or part of a virtue, and at the same time suffers from misfortune; it would be an extraordinary thing if such an one, whether slave or freeman, were utterly forsaken and fell into the extremes of poverty in any tolerably well-ordered city or government. Wherefore the legislator may safely make a law applicable to such cases in the following terms:—Let there be no beggars in our state; and if anybody begs, seeking to make up a livelihood by unavailing prayers, let the wardens of the agora turn him out of the agora, and the wardens of the city out of the city, and the wardens of the country send him out of any other parts of the land across the border, in order that the land may be cleared of this sort of animal.

If a slave of either sex injure anything, which is not his or her own, through inexperience, or some improper practice, and the person who suffers damage be not himself in part to blame, the master of the slave who has done the harm shall either make full satisfaction, or give up the slave who has done the injury. But if the master argue that the charge has arisen by collusion between the injured party and the injurer, with the view of obtaining the slave, let him sue the person, who says that he has been injured, for malpractices. And if he gain a conviction, let him receive double the value which the court fixes as the price of the slave; and if he lose his suit, let him make amends for the injury, and give up the slave. And if a beast of burden, or horse, or dog, or any other animal, injure the property of a neighbour, the owner shall in like manner pay for the injury.

If any man refuses to be a witness, he who wants him shall summon him, and he who is summoned shall come to the trial; and if he knows and is willing to bear witness, let him bear witness, but if he says he does not know let him swear by the three divinities Zeus, and Apollo, and Themis, that he does not, and have no more to do with the cause. [937] And he who is summoned to give witness and does not answer to his summoner, shall be liable for the harm which ensues according to law. And if a person calls up as a witness any one who is acting as a judge, let him give his witness, but he shall not afterwards vote in the cause. A free woman may give her witness and plead, if she be more than forty years of age, and may bring an action if she have no husband; but if her husband be alive she shall only be allowed to bear witness. A slave of either sex and a child shall be allowed to give evidence and to plead, but only in cases of murder; and they must produce sufficient sureties that they will certainly remain until the trial, in case they should be charged with false witness. And either of the parties in a cause may bring an accusation of perjury against witnesses, touching their evidence in whole or in part, if he asserts that such evidence has been given; but the accusation must be brought previous to the final decision of the cause. The magistrates shall preserve the accusations of false witness, and have them kept under the seal of both parties, and produce them on the day when the trial for false witness takes place. If a man be twice convicted of false witness, he shall not be required, and if thrice, he shall not be allowed to bear witness; and if he dare to witness after he has been convicted three times, let any one who pleases inform against him to the magistrates, and let the magistrates hand him over to the court, and if he be convicted he shall be punished with death. And in any case in which the evidence is rightly found to be false, and yet to have given the victory to him who wins the suit and more than half the witnesses are condemned the decision which was gained by these means shall be rescinded and there shall be a discussion and a decision as to whether the suit was determined by that false evidence or not and in whichever way the decision may be given the previous suit shall be determined accordingly

There are many noble things in human life, but to most of them attach evils which are fated to corrupt and spoil them Is not justice noble which has been the civilizer of humanity? How then can the advocate of justice be other than noble? And yet upon this profession which is presented to us under the fair name of art has come an evil reputation In the first place we are told that by ingenious pleas and the help of an advocate the law enables a man to win a particular cause [938] whether just or unjust and that both the art, and the power of speech which is thereby imparted are at the service of him who is willing to pay for them Now in our state this so-called art whether really an art or only an experience and practice destitute of any art, ought if possible never to come into existence or if existing among us should listen to the request of the legislator and go away into another land and not speak contrary to justice If the offenders obey we say no more but for those who disobey the voice of the law is as follows —If any one thinks that he will pervert the power of justice in the minds of the judges and unseasonably litigate or advocate let any one who likes indict him for malpractices of law and dishonest advocacy and let him be judged in the court of select judges and if he be convicted let the court determine whether he may be supposed to act from a love of money or from contentiousness And if he is supposed to act from contentiousness the court shall fix a time during which he shall not be allowed to institute or plead a cause and if he is supposed to act as he does from love of money in case he be a stranger he shall leave the country and never return under penalty of death but if he be a citizen he shall die because he is a lover of money in whatever manner gained and equally if he be judged to have acted more than once from contentiousness he shall die

BOOK XII

[941] If a herald or an ambassador carry a false message from our city to any other or bring back a false message from the city to which he is sent or be proved to have brought back whether from friends or enemies, in his capacity of herald or ambassador what they have never said let him be indicted for having violated contrary to the law the commands and duties imposed upon him by Hermes and Zeus and let there be a penalty fixed which he shall suffer or pay if he be convicted

Theft is a mean and robbery a shameless thing and none of the sons of Zeus delight in fraud and violence or ever practised either Wherefore let no one be deluded by poets or mythologers into a mistaken belief of such things nor let him suppose when he thieves or is guilty of violence that he is doing nothing base but only what the Gods themselves do For such tales are untrue and improbable and he who steals or robs contrary to the law is never either a God or the son of a God of this the legislator ought to be better informed than all the poets put together Happy is he and may he be for ever happy who is persuaded and listens to our words but he who disobeys shall have to contend against the following law —If a man steal anything belonging to the public whether that which he steals be much or little he shall have the same punishment For he who steals a little steals with the same wish as he who steals much but with less power and he who takes up a greater amount not having deposited it is wholly unjust Wherefore the law is not disposed to inflict a less penalty on the one than on the other because his theft is less but on the ground that the thief may possibly be in one case still curable and may in another case be incurable If any one convict in a court of law a stranger or a slave of a theft of public property let the court determine what punishment he shall suffer or what penalty he shall pay bearing in mind that he is probably not incurable But the citizen who has been brought up as our citizens will have been if he be found guilty of robbing his country by fraud or violence whether he be caught in the act or not shall be punished with death for he is incurable.

[942] Now for expeditions of war much consideration and many laws are required the great principle of all is that no one of either sex should be without a commander nor should the mind of any one be accustomed to do any thing, either in jest or earnest, of his own motion, but in war and in peace he should look to and follow his leader, even in the least things being under his guidance; for example, he should stand or move, or exercise, or wash, or take his meals, or get up in the night to keep guard and deliver messages when he is bidden; and in the hour of danger he should not pursue and not retreat except by order of his superior; and in a word, not teach the soul or accustom her to know or understand how to do anything apart from others. Of all soldiers the life should be always and in all things as far as possible in common and together; there neither is nor ever will be a higher, or better, or more scientific principle than this for the attainment of salvation and victory in war. And we ought in time of peace from youth upwards to practise this habit of commanding others, and of being commanded by others; anarchy should have no place in the life of man or of the beasts who are subject to man. I may add that all dances ought to be performed with a view to military excellence; and agility and ease should be cultivated for the same object, and also endurance of the want of meats and drinks, and of winter cold and summer heat, and of hard couches; and, above all, care should be taken not to destroy the peculiar qualities of the head and the feet by surrounding them with extraneous coverings, and so hindering their natural growth of hair and soles. For these are the extremities, and of all the parts of the body whether they are preserved or not is of the greatest consequence; the one is the servant of the whole body, and the other the master, [943] in whom all the ruling senses are by nature set. Let the young man imagine that he hears in what has preceded the praises of the military life; the law shall be as follows:—He shall serve in war who is on the roll or appointed to some special service, and if any one is absent from cowardice, and without the leave of the generals, he shall be indicted before the military commanders for failure of service when the army comes home; and the soldiers shall be his judges; the heavy armed, and the cavalry, and the other arms of the service shall form separate courts; and they shall bring the heavy armed before the heavy armed, and the horsemen before the horsemen, and the others in like manner before their peers; and he who is found guilty shall never be allowed to compete for any prize of valour, or indict another for not serving on an expedition, or be an accuser at all in any military matters. Moreover, the court shall further determine what punishment he shall suffer, or what penalty he shall pay. When the suits for failure of service are completed, the leaders of the several kinds of troops shall again hold an assembly, and they shall adjudge the prizes of valour; and he who likes shall give judgment in his own branch of the service, saying nothing about any former expedition, nor producing any proof or witnesses to confirm his statement, but speaking only of the present occasion. The crown of victory shall be an olive wreath which the victor shall offer up at the temple of any war god whom he likes, adding an inscription for a testimony to last during life, that such an one has received the first, the second, or the third prize. If any one goes on an expedition, and returns home before the appointed time, when the generals have not withdrawn the army, he shall be indicted for desertion before the same persons who took cognisance of failure of service, and if he be found guilty, the same punishment shall be inflicted on him. Now every man who is engaged in any suit ought to be very careful of bringing false witness against any one, either intentionally or unintentionally, if he can help; for justice is truly said to be an honourable maiden, and falsehood is naturally repugnant to honour and justice. A witness ought to be very careful not to sin against justice, as for example in what relates to the throwing away of arms—he must distinguish the throwing them away when necessary, and not make that a reproach, or bring an action against some innocent person on that account. [944] To make the distinction may be difficult; but still the law must attempt to define the different kinds in some way. Let me endeavour to explain my meaning by an ancient tale:—If Patroclus had been brought to the tent still alive but without his arms (and this has happened to innumerable persons), the original arms, which the poet says were presented to Peleus by the Gods as a nuptial gift when he married Thetis, remaining in the hands of Hector, then the base spirits of that day might have reproached the son of Menoetius with having cast away his arms. Again, there is the case of those who have been thrown down precipices and lost their arms; and of those who at sea, and in stormy places, have been suddenly overwhelmed by floods of water; and there are numberless things of this kind which one might adduce by way of extenuation, and with the view of justifying a misfortune which is easily misrepresented. We must, therefore, endeav our to divide to the best of our power the greater and more serious evil from the lesser And a distinction may be drawn in the use of terms of reproach A man does not always deserve to be called the thrower away of his shield he may be only the loser of his arms For there is a great or rather absolute difference between him who is deprived of his arms by a sufficient force and him who voluntarily lets his shield go Let the law then be as follows —If a person having arms is overtaken by the enemy and does not turn round and defend himself but lets them go voluntarily or throws them away, choosing a base life and a swift escape rather than a courageous and noble and blessed death—in such a case of the throwing away of arms let justice be done but the judge need take no note of the case just now mentioned for the bad man ought always to be punished in the hope that he may be improved but not the unfortunate for there is no advantage in that And what shall be the punishment suited to him who has thrown away his weapons of defence? Tradition says that Caeneus the Thessalian was changed by a God from a woman into a man but the converse miracle cannot now be wrought or no punishment would be more proper than that the man who throws away his shield should be changed into a woman[1] This however is impossible and therefore let us make a law as nearly like this as we can—that he who loves his life too well shall be in no danger for the remainder of his days but shall live for ever under the stigma of cowardice And let the law be in the following terms —When a man is found guilty of disgracefully throwing away his arms in war no general or military officer shall allow him to serve as a soldier, or give him any place at all in the ranks of soldiers [945] and the officer who gives the coward any place shall suffer a penalty which the public examiner shall exact of him and if he be of the highest class he shall pay a thousand drachmae or if he be of the second class five minae or if he be of the third three minae or if he be of the fourth class one mina And he who is found guilty of cowardice shall not only be dismissed from manly dangers, which is a disgrace appropriate to his nature, but he shall pay a thousand drachmae if he be of the highest class and five minae if he be of the second class and three if he be of the third class and a mina like the preceding if he be of the fourth class

Cf. vii. 796.

What regulations will be proper about examiners, seeing that some of our magistrates are elected by lot and for a year and some for a longer time and from selected persons? Of such magistrates who will be a sufficient censor or examiner, if any of them weighed down by the pressure of office or his own inability to support the dignity of his office be guilty of any crooked practice? It is by no means easy to find a magistrate who excels other magistrates in virtue but still we must endeavour to discover some censor or examiner who is more than man For the truth is that there are many elements of dissolution in a state as there are also in a ship, or in an animal they all have their cords and girders and sinews—one nature diffused in many places and called by many names and the office of examiner is a most important element in the preservation and dissolution of states For if the examiners are better than the magistrates and their duty is fulfilled justly and without blame then the whole state and country flourishes and is happy but if the examination of the magistrates is carried on in a wrong way then by the relaxation of that justice which is the uniting principle of all constitutions every power in the state is rent asunder from every other they no longer incline in the same direction but fill the city with faction, and make many cities out of one[2] and soon bring all to destruction Wherefore the examiners ought to be admirable in every sort of virtue Let us invent a mode of creating them which shall be as follows —Every year after the summer solstice the whole city shall meet in the common precincts of Helios and Apollo and shall present to the God three men out of their own number in the manner following [946]—Each citizen shall select not himself but some other citizen whom he deems in every way the best and who is not less than fifty years of age And out of the selected persons who have the greatest number of votes, they shall make a further selection until they reduce them to one half if they are an even number but if they are not an even number they shall subtract the one who has the smallest number of votes and make them an even number and then leave the half which have the greater number of votes And if two persons have an equal number of votes and thus increase the number beyond one half they shall withdraw the younger of the two and do away with the excess and then including all the rest they shall again vote until there are left three having an unequal number of votes But if all the three, or two out of the three, have equal votes, let them commit the election to good fate and fortune, and separate off by lot the first, and the second, and the third these they shall crown with an olive wreath and give them the prize of excellence, at the same time proclaiming to all the world that the city of the Magnetes, by the providence of the Gods, is again preserved, and presents to the Sun and to Apollo her three best men as first fruits, to be a common offering to them, according to the ancient law as long as their lives answer to the judgment formed of them. And these shall appoint in their first year twelve examiners, to continue until each has completed seventy five years, to whom three shall afterwards be added yearly and let these divide all the magistracies into twelve parts, and prove the holders of them by every sort of test to which a freeman may be subjected and let them live while they hold office in the precinct of Helios and Apollo, in which they were chosen, and let each one form a judgment of some things individually and of others in company with his colleagues and let him place a writing in the agora about each magistracy and what the magistrate ought to suffer or pay according to the decision of the examiners. And if a magistrate does not admit that he has been justly judged, let him bring the examiners before the select judges, and if he be acquitted by their decision, let him, if he will accuse the examiners themselves if however he be convicted and have been condemned to death by the examiners, let him die (and of course he can only die once) —but any other penalties which admit of being doubled let him suffer twice over

And now let us pass under review the examiners themselves what will their examination be, [947] and how conducted? During the life of these men, whom the whole state counts worthy of the rewards of virtue they shall have the first seat at all public assemblies and at all Hellenic sacrifices and sacred missions, and other public and holy ceremonies in which they share. The chiefs of each sacred mission shall be selected from them, and they only of all the citizens shall be adorned with a crown of laurel they shall all be priests of Apollo and Helios and one of them, who is judged first of the priests created in that year shall be high priest and they shall write up his name in each year to be a measure of time as long as the city lasts and after their death they shall be laid out and carried to the grave and entombed in a manner different from the other citizens They shall be decked in a robe all of white, and there shall be no crying or lamentation over them but a chorus of fifteen maidens, and another of boys, shall stand around the bier on either side hymning the praises of the departed priests in alternate responses, declaring their blessedness in song all day long and at dawn a hundred of the youths who practise gymnastic exercises, and whom the relations of the departed shall choose, shall carry the bier to the sepulchre, the young men marching first, dressed in the garb of warriors—the cavalry with their horses, the heavy armed with their arms and the others in like manner And boys near the bier and in front of it shall sing their national hymn and maidens shall follow behind and with them the women who have passed the age of childbearing next, although they are interdicted from other burials, let priests and priestesses follow unless the Pythian oracle forbid them for this burial is free from pollution. The place of burial shall be an oblong vaulted chamber underground constructed of tufa, which will last for ever having stone couches placed side by side And here they will lay the blessed person and cover the sepulchre with a circular mound of earth and plant a grove of trees around on every side but one and on that side the sepulchre shall be allowed to extend for ever and a new mound will not be required. Every year they shall have contests in music and gymnastics, and in horsemanship in honour of the dead These are the honours which shall be given to those who at the examination are found blameless but if any of them trusting to the scrutiny being over should after the judgment has been given manifest the wickedness of human nature let the law ordain that he who pleases shall indict him, [948] and let the cause be tried in the following manner In the first place, the court shall be composed of the guardians of the law and to them the surviving examiners shall be added as well as the court of select judges and let the pursuer lay his indictment in this form—he shall say that so-and so is unworthy of the prize of virtue and of his office and if the defendant be convicted let him be deprived of his office and of the burial and of the other honours given him But if the prosecutor do not obtain the fifth part of the votes, let him, if he be of the first class, pay twelve minae and eight if he be of the second class, and six if he be of the third class, and two minae if he be of the fourth class

The so-called decision of Rhadamanthus is worthy of all admiration He knew that the men of his own time believed and had no doubt that there were Gods, which was a reasonable belief in those days because most men were the sons of Gods,[1] and according to tradition he was one himself He appears to have thought that he ought to commit judgment to no man but to the Gods only and in this way suits were simply and speedily decided by him For he made the two parties take an oath respecting the points in dispute, and so got rid of the matter speedily and safely But now that a certain portion of mankind do not believe at all in the existence of the Gods and others imagine that they have no care of us and the opinion of most men and of the worst men is that in return for a small sacrifice and a few flattering words they will be their accomplices in purloining large sums and save them from many terrible punishments the way of Rhadamanthus is no longer suited to the needs of justice for as the opinions of men about the Gods are changed the laws should also be changed — in the granting of suits a rational legislation ought to do away with the oaths of the parties on either side—he who obtains leave to bring an action should write down the charges but should not add an oath and the defendant in like manner should give his denial to the magistrates in writing and not swear for it is a dreadful thing to know when many lawsuits are going on in a state that almost half the people who meet one another quite unconcernedly at the public meals and in other companies and relations of private life are perjured Let the law then be as follows —A judge who is about to give judgment shall take an oath and he who is choosing magistrates for the state shall either vote on oath or with a voting tablet which he brings from a temple [949] so too the judge of dances and of all music and the superintendents and umpires of gymnastic and equestrian contests and any matters in which as far as men can judge, there is nothing to be gained by a false oath but all cases in which a denial confirmed by an oath clearly results in a great advantage to the taker of the oath shall be decided without the oath of the parties to the suit and the presiding judges shall not permit either of them to use an oath for the sake of persuading nor to call down curses on himself and his race nor to use unseemly supplications or womanish laments But they shall ever be teaching and learning what is just in auspicious words and he who does otherwise shall be supposed to speak beside the point and the judges shall again bring him back to the question at issue. On the other hand strangers in their dealings with strangers shall as at present have power to give and receive oaths for they will not often grow old in the city or leave a fry of young ones like themselves to be the sons and heirs of the land

As to the initiation of private suits let the manner of deciding causes between all citizens be the same as in cases in which any freeman is disobedient to the state in minor matters of which the penalty is not stripes imprisonment, or death But as regards attendance at choruses or processions or other shows and as regards public services whether the celebration of sacrifice in peace or the payment of contributions in war—in all these cases first comes the necessity of providing a remedy for the loss and by those who will not obey there shall be security given to the officers whom the city and the law empower to exact the sum due and if they forfeit their security let the goods which they have pledged be sold and the money given to the city but if they ought to pay a larger sum the several magistrates shall impose upon the disobedient a suitable penalty and bring them before the court, until they are willing to do what they are ordered

Now a state which makes money from the cultivation of the soil only and has no foreign trade must consider what it will do about the emigration of its own people to other countries and the reception of strangers from elsewhere About these matters the legislator has to consider and he will begin by trying to persuade men as far as he can The intercourse of cities with one another is apt to create a confusion of manners strangers are always suggesting novelties to strangers [950] When states are well governed by good laws the mixture causes the greatest possible injury but seeing that most cities are the reverse of well-ordered the confusion which arises in them from the reception of strangers and from the citizens themselves rushing off into other cities when any one either young or old desires to travel anywhere abroad at whatever time is of no consequence. On the other hand the refusal of states to receive others and for their own citizens never to go to other places is an utter impossibility and to the rest of the world is likely to appear ruthless and uncivilized it is a practice adopted by people who use harsh words such as xenelasia or banishment of strangers, and who have harsh and morose ways as men think And to be thought or not to be thought well of

Cf. iv 704.

by the rest of the world is no light matter for the many are not so far wrong in their judgment of who are bad and who are good as they are removed from the nature of virtue in themselves. Even bad men have a divine instinct which guesses rightly and very many who are utterly depraved form correct notions and judgments of the differences between the good and bad. And the generality of cities are quite right in exhorting us to value a good reputation in the world, for there is no truth greater and more important than this—that he who is really good (I am speaking of the man who would be perfect) seeks for reputation with but not without, the reality of goodness And our Cretan colony ought also to acquire the fairest and noblest reputation for virtue from other men and there is every reason to expect that if the reality answers to the idea, she will be one of the few well-ordered cities which the sun and the other Gods behold Wherefore, in the matter of journeys to other countries and the reception of strangers we enact as follows —In the first place, let no one be allowed to go anywhere at all into a foreign country who is less than forty years of age and no one shall go in a private capacity but only in some public one as a herald, or on an embassy or on a sacred mission. Going abroad on an expedition or in war is not to be included among travels of the class authorized by the state. To Apollo at Delphi and to Zeus at Olympia and to Nemea and to the Isthmus, citizens should be sent to take part in the sacrifices and games there dedicated to the Gods and they should send as many as possible, and the best and fairest that can be found, and they will make the city renowned at holy meetings in time of peace [951] procuring a glory which shall be the converse of that which is gained in war and when they come home they shall teach the young that the institutions of other states are inferior to their own. And they shall send spectators of another sort, if they have the consent of the guardians, being such citizens as desire to look a little more at leisure at the doings of other men and these no law shall hinder For a city which has no experience of good and bad men or intercourse with them, can never be thoroughly and perfectly civilized nor again can the citizens of a city properly observe the laws by habit only and without an intelligent understanding of them And there always are in the world a few inspired men whose acquaintance is beyond price and who spring up quite

Cf. Rep. bk. x. 619.

as much in ill-ordered as in well-ordered cities. These are they whom the citizens of a well ordered city should be ever seeking out, going forth over sea and over land to find him who is incorruptible—that he may establish more firmly institutions in his own state which are good already and amend what is deficient for without this examination and enquiry a city will never continue perfect any more than if the examination is ill-conducted

Clinias How can we have an examination and also a good one?

Athenian Stranger In this way In the first place, our spectator shall be of not less than fifty years of age he must be a man of reputation especially in war if he is to exhibit to other cities a model of the guardians of the law but when he is more than sixty years of age he shall no longer continue in his office of spectator And when he has carried on his inspection during as many out of the ten years of his office as he pleases, on his return home let him go to the assembly of those who review the laws. This shall be a mixed body of young and old men who shall be required to meet daily between the hour of dawn and the rising of the sun They shall consist, in the first place, of the priests who have obtained the rewards of virtue and in the second place, of guardians of the law the ten eldest being chosen the general superintendent of education shall also be a member as well the last appointed as those who have been released from the office and each of them shall take with him as his companion a young man, whomsoever he chooses, between the ages of thirty and forty These shall be always holding conversation and discourse about the laws of their own city or about any specially [952] good ones which they may hear to be existing elsewhere also about kinds of knowledge which may appear to be of use and will throw light upon the examination or of which the want will make the subject of laws dark and uncertain to them. Any knowledge of this sort which the elders approve, the younger men shall learn with all diligence and if any one of those who have been invited appear to be unworthy the whole assembly shall blame him who invited him. The rest of the city shall watch over those among the young men who distinguish themselves having an eye upon them, and especially honouring them if they succeed but dishonouring them above the rest if they turn out to be inferior This is the assembly to which he who has visited the institutions of other men, unsealed. And if a person will not allow the searcher to make his search he who is prevented shall go to law with him estimating the value of the goods after which he is searching and if the other be convicted he shall pay twice the value of the article. If the master be absent from home, the dwellers in the house shall let him search the unsealed property and on the sealed property the searcher shall set another seal, and shall appoint any one whom he likes to guard them durin five days and if the master of the house be absent during a longer time, he shall take with him the wardens of the city and so make his search opening the sealed property as well as the unsealed and then together with the members of the family and the wardens of the city he shall seal them up again as they were before There shall be a limit of time in the case of disputed things and he who has had possession of them during a certain time shall no longer be liable to be disturbed As to houses and lands there can be no dispute in this state of ours but if a man has any other possessions which he has used and openly sho n in the city and in the agora and in the temples, and no one has put in a claim to them and some one says that he was looking for them during this time, and the possessor is proved to have made no concealment, if they have continued for a year the one ha ing the goods and the other looking for them, the claim of the seeker shall not be allowed after the expiration of the year or if he does not use or show the lost property in the market or in the city but only in the country and no one offers himself as the owner during five years, at the expiration of the five years the claim shall be barred for ever after- or if he uses them in the city but within the house, then the appointed time of claiming the goods shall be three years or ten years if he has them in the country in private And if he has them in another land there shall be no limit of time or prescription, but when ever the owner finds them he may claim them

If any one prevents another by force from being present at a trial whether a principal party or his witnesses if the person prevented be a sla e, whether his own or belonging to another the suit shall be incomplete and invalid but if he who is prevented be a freeman besides the suit being incomplete [955] the other who has prevented him shall be imprisoned for a year and shall be prosecuted for kidnapping by any one who pleases. And if any one hinders by force a r val competitor in gymnastic or music, or any other sort of contest, from being present at the contest, let him who has a mind inform the presiding judges, and they shall liberate him who is desirous of competing and if they are not able and he who hinders the other from competing wins the prize, then they shall give the prize of victory to him who is prevented and inscribe him as the conqueror in any temples which he pleases and he who hinders the other shall not be permitted to make any offering or inscription having reference to that contest, and in any case he shall be liable for damages, whether he be defeated or whether he conquer

If any one knowingly receives anything which has been stolen, he shall undergo the same punishment as the thief and if a man receives an exile he shall be punished with death Every man should regard the friend and enemy of the state as his own friend and enemy and if any one makes peace or war with another on his own account, and without the authority of the state, he, like the receiver of the exile shall undergo the penalty of death And if any fraction of the city declare war or peace against any the generals shall indict the authors of this proceeding and if they are convicted death shall be the penalty Those who serve their country ought to serve without receiving gifts and there ought to be no excusing or approving the saying, Men should receive gifts as the reward of good, but not of evil deeds" for to know which we are doing and to stand fast by our knowledge, is no easy matter The safest course is to obey the law which says, Do no service for a bribe, and let him who disobeys if he be convicted, simply die With a view to taxation for various reasons every man ought to have had his property valued and the tribesmen should likewise bring a register of the yearly produce to the wardens of the country that in this way there may be two valuations and the public officers may use annually whichever on consideration they deem the best whether they prefer to take a certain portion of the whole value, or of the annual revenue, after subtracting what is paid to the common tables

Touching offerings to the Gods a moderate man should observe moderation in what he offers Now the land and the hearth of the house of all men is sacred to all Gods where fore let no man dedicate them a second time to the Gods Gold and silver whether possessed by private persons or in temples, are in other cities provocative of envy [956] and ivory the product of a dead body is not a proper offering brass and iron again are instruments of

on his return home shall straightway go and if he have discovered any one who has anything to say about the enactment of laws or education or nurture or if he have himself made any observations let him communicate his discoveries to the whole assembly And if he be seen to have come home neither better nor worse let him be praised at any rate for his enthusiasm and if he be much better let him be praised so much the more, and not only while he lives but after his death let the assembly honour him with fitting honours But if on his return home he appear to have been corrupted pretending to be wise when he is not let him hold no communication with any one whether young or old and if he will hearken to the rulers then he shall be permitted to live as a private individual but if he will not let him die if he be convicted in a court of law of interfering about education and the laws And if he deserve to be indicted and none of the magistrates indict him let that be counted as a disgrace to them when the rewards of virtue are decided

Let such be the character of the person who goes abroad and let him go abroad under these conditions In the next place the stranger who comes from abroad should be received in a friendly spirit Now there are four kinds of strangers of whom we must make some mention—the first is he who comes and stays throughout the summer [1] this class are like birds of passage taking wing in pursuit of commerce and flying over the sea to other cities while the season lasts he shall be received in market places and harbours and public buildings near the city but outside by those magistrates who are appointed to superintend these matters and they shall take care that a stranger whoever he be duly receives justice but he shall not be allowed to make any innovation [953] They shall hold the intercourse with him which is necessary and this shall be as little as possible The second kind is just a spectator who comes to see with his eyes and hear with his ears the festivals of the Muses such ought to have entertainment provided them at the temples by hospitable persons and the priests and ministers of the temples should see and attend to them But they should not remain more than a reasonable time let them see and hear that for the sake of which they came and then go away neither having suffered nor done any harm The priests shall be their judges if any of them receive or do any wrong up to the sum of fifty drachmae but if any greater charge be brought in such cases the suit shall come before the wardens of the agora. The third kind of stranger is he who comes on some public business from another land and is to be received with public honours He is to be received only by the generals and commanders of horse and foot and the host by whom he is entertained in conjunction with the Prytanes shall have the sole charge of what concerns him There is a fourth class of persons answering to our spectators who come from another land to look at ours In the first place such visits will be rare and the visitor should be at least fifty years of age he may possibly be wanting to see something that is rich and rare in other states, or himself to show something in like manner to another city Let such an one then go unbidden to the doors of the wise and rich being one of them himself let him go for example, to the house of the superintendent of education, confident that he is a fitting guest of such a host or let him go to the house of some of those who have gained the prize of virtue and hold discourse with them both learning from them and also teaching them and when he has seen and heard all he shall depart as a friend taking leave of friends and be honoured by them with gifts and suitable tributes of respect These are the customs according to which our city should receive all strangers of either sex who come from other countries and should send forth her own citizens showing respect to Zeus the God of hospitality not forbidding strangers at meals and sacrifices as is the manner which prevails among the children of the Nile nor driving them away by savage proclamations

When a man becomes surety let him give the security in a distinct form acknowledging the whole transaction in a written document, and in the presence of not less than three witnesses if the sum be under a thousand drachmae and of not less than five witnesses if the sum be above a thousand drachmae [954] The agent of a dishonest or untrustworthy seller shall himself be responsible both the agent and the principal shall be equally liable If a person wishes to find anything in the house of another he shall enter naked or wearing only a short tunic and without a girdle having first taken an oath by the customary Gods that he expects to find it there he shall then make his search and the other shall throw open his house and allow him to search things both sealed and

And if a person will not allow the searcher to make his search he who is prevented shall go to law with him, estimating the value of the goods after which he is searching and if the other be convicted he shall pay twice the value of the article. If the master be absent from home, the dwellers in the house shall let him search the unsealed property and on the sealed property the searcher shall set another seal, and shall appoint any one whom he likes to guard them during five days and if the master of the house be absent during a longer time, he shall take with him the wardens of the city and so make his search opening the sealed property as well as the unsealed and then together with the members of the family and the wardens of the city he shall seal them up again as they were before. There shall be a limit of time in the case of disputed things, and he who has had possession of them during a certain time shall no longer be liable to be disturbed As to houses and lands there can be no dispute in this state of ours but if a man has any other possessions which he has used and openly shown in the city and in the agora and in the temples, and no one has put in a claim to them and some one says that he was looking for them during this time, and the possessor is proved to have made no concealment, if they have continued for a year the one having the goods and the other looking for them, the claim of the seeker shall not be allowed after the expiration of the year or if he does not use or show the lost property in the market or in the city but only in the country and no one offers himself as the owner during five years, at the expiration of the five years the claim shall be barred for ever after or if he uses them in the city but within the house, then the appointed time of claiming the goods shall be three years, or ten years if he has them in the country in private And if he has them in another land there shall be no limit of time or prescription, but whenever the owner finds them he may claim them

If any one prevents another by force from being present at a trial whether a principal party or his witnesses if the person prevented be a slave, whether his own or belonging to another the suit shall be incomplete and invalid but if he who is prevented be a freeman besides the suit being incomplete, [955] the other who has prevented him shall be imprisoned for a year and shall be prosecuted for kidnapping by any one who pleases. And if any one hinders by force a rival competitor in gymnastic or music, or any other sort of contest, from being present at the contest, let him who has a mind inform the presiding judges, and they shall liberate him who is desirous of competing and if they are not able and he who hinders the other from competing wins the prize then they shall give the prize of victory to him who is prevented and inscribe him as the conqueror in any temples which he pleases and he who hinders the other shall not be permitted to make any offering or inscription having reference to that contest, and in any case he shall be liable for damages, whether he be defeated or whether he conquer to the party who wins the suit the whole property of him who loses, with the exception of mere necessaries, and the assignment shall be made through the herald immediately after each decision in the hearing of the judges and when the month arrives following the month in which the courts are sitting (unless the gainer of the suit has been previously satisfied) the court shall follow up the case, and hand over to the winner the goods of the loser but if they find that he has not the means of paying, and the sum deficient is not less than a drachma, the insolvent person shall not have any right of going to law with any other man until he have satisfied the debt of the winning party but other persons shall still have the right of bringing suits against him And if any one after he is condemned refuses to acknowledge the authority which condemned him let the magistrates who are thus deprived of their authority bring him before the court of the guardians of the law and if he be cast, let him be punished with death, as a subverter of the whole state and of the laws

Thus a man is born and brought up, and after this manner he begets and brings up his own children, and has his share of dealings with other men, and suffers if he has done wrong to any one, and receives satisfaction if he has been wronged, and so at length in due time he grows old under the protection of the laws, and his end comes in the order of nature. Concerning the dead of either sex, the religious ceremonies which may fittingly be performed, whether appertaining to the Gods of the under world or of this, shall be decided by the interpreters with absolute authority Their sepulchres are not to be in places which are fit for cultivation, and there shall be no monuments in such spots, either large or small, but they shall occupy that part of the country which is naturally adapted for receiving and concealing the bodies of the dead with as little hurt as possible to the living No man, living or dead, shall deprive the living of the sustenance which the earth, their foster-parent, is naturally inclined to provide for them. And let not the mound be piled higher than would be the work of five men completed in five days nor shall the stone which is placed over the spot be larger than would be sufficient to receive the praises of the dead included in four heroic lines. [959] Nor shall the laying out of the dead in the house continue for a longer time than is sufficient to distinguish between him who is in a trance only and him who is really dead and speaking generally the third day after death will be a fair time for carrying out the body to the sepulchre. Now we must believe the legislator when he tells us that the soul is in all respects superior to the body and that even in life what makes each one of us to be what we are is only the soul and that the body follows us about in the likeness of each of us and therefore, when we are dead, the bodies of the dead are quite rightly said to be our shades or images for the true and immortal being of each one of us which is called the soul goes on her way to other Gods, before them to give an account—which is an inspiring hope to the good but very terrible to the bad, as the laws of our fathers tell us and they also say that not much can be done in the way of helping a man after he is dead. But the living—he should be helped by all his kindred that while in life he may be the holiest and justest of men and after death may have no great sins to be punished in the world below If this be true a man ought not to waste his substance under the idea that all this lifeless mass of flesh which is in process of burial is connected with him, he should consider that the son, or brother or the beloved one, whoever he may be, whom he thinks he is laying in the earth, has gone away to complete and fulfil his own destiny and that his duty is rightly to order the present, and to spend moderately on the lifeless altar of the Gods below But the legislator does not intend moderation to be taken in the sense of meanness. Let the law then, be as follows —The expenditure on the entire funeral of him who is of the highest class, shall not exceed five minae and for him who is of the second class, three minae, and for him who is of the third class, two minae and for him who is of the fourth class, one mina, will be a fair limit of expense The guardians of the law ought to take especial care of the different ages of life, whether childhood or manhood, or any other age. And at the end of all let there be some one guardian of the law presiding, who shall be chosen by the friends of the deceased to superintend and let it be glory to him to manage with fairness and moderation what relates to the dead and a discredit to him if they are not well managed. Let the laying out and other ceremonies be in accordance with custom but to the statesman who adopts custom as his law we must give way in certain particulars It would be monstrous for war but of wood let a man bring what offerings he likes provided it be a single block, and in like manner of stone, to the public temples of woven work let him not offer more than one woman can execute in a month White is a colour suitable to the Gods especially in woven works but dyes should only be used for the adornments of war The most divine of gifts are birds and images and they should be such as one painter can execute in a single day And let all other offerings follow a similar rule

Now that the whole city has been divided into parts of which the nature and number have been described and laws have been given about all the most important contracts as far as this was possible the next thing will be to have justice done The first of the courts shall consist of elected judges[1] who shall be chosen by the plaintiff and the defendant in common these shall be called arbiters rather than judges And in the second court there shall be judges of the villages and tribes corresponding to the twelvefold division of the land and before these the litigants shall go to contend for greater damages if the suit be not decided before the first judges the defendant, if he be defeated the second time shall pay a fifth more than the damages mentioned in the indictment and if he find fault with his judges and would try a third time let him carry the suit before the select judges and if he be again defeated let him pay the whole of the damages and half as much again And the plaintiff if when defeated before the first judges he persist in going on to the second shall if he wins receive in addition to the damages a fifth part more and if defeated he shall pay a like sum but if he is not satisfied with the previous decision and will insist on proceeding to a third court then if he win he shall receive from the defendant the amount of the damages and as I said before half as much again and the plaintiff if he lose shall pay half of the damages claimed Now the assignment by lot of judges to courts and the completion of the number of them and the appointment of servants to the different magistrates and the times at which the several causes should be heard and the votings and delays and all the things that necessarily concern suits and the order of causes and the time in which answers have to be put in and parties are to appear—of these and other things akin to these we have indeed already spoken but there is no harm in repeating what is right twice or thrice —All lesser and easier matters which the elder legislator has omitted may be supplied by the younger one [957] Private courts will be sufficiently regulated in this way and the public and state courts and those which the magistrates must use in the administration of their several offices exist in many other states Many very respectable institutions of this sort have been framed by good men and from them the guardians of the law may by reflection derive what is necessary for the order of our new state, considering and correcting them and bringing them to the test of experience until every detail appears to be satisfactorily determined and then putting the final seal upon them and making them irreversible, they shall use them for ever afterwards As to what relates to the silence of judges and the ab*stinence from words of evil omen and the re*verse and the different notions of the just and good and honourable which exist in our own as compared with other states they have been partly mentioned already and another part of them will be mentioned hereafter as we draw near the end To all these matters he who would be an equal judge shall justly look and he shall possess writings about them that he may learn them For of all kinds of knowledge the knowledge of good laws has the greatest power of improving the learner otherwise there would be no meaning in the divine and admirable law possessing a name akin to mind (νοῦς νόμος) And of all other words such as the praises and censures of individuals which occur in poetry and also in prose whether written down or uttered in daily conversation whether men dispute about them in the spirit of contention or weakly assent to them as is often the case—of all these the one sure test is the writings of the legislator which the righteous judge ought to have in his mind as the antidote of all other words, and thus make himself and the city stand upright procuring for the good the continuance and increase of justice, and for the bad on the other hand a conversion from ignorance and intemperance and in general from all unrighteousness as far as their evil minds can be healed but to those whose web of life is in reality finished giving death which is the only remedy for souls in their condition as I may say truly again and again And such judges and chiefs of judges will be worthy of receiving praise [958] from the whole city

When the suits of the year are completed the following laws shall regulate their execution —In the first place the judge shall assign ing with them, may be truly called the salvation of all.

Cle. Yes, Quite so.

Ath. Yes, indeed but with what is that intellect concerned which, mingling with the senses, is the salvation of ships in storms as well as in fair weather? In a ship, when the pilot and the sailors unite their perceptions with the piloting mind, do they not save both themselves and their craft?

Cle. Very true.

Ath. We do not want many illustrations about such matters —What aim would the general of an army or what aim would a physician propose to himself, if he were seeking to attain salvation?

Cle. Very good.

[962] Ath. Does not the general aim at victory and superiority in war and do not the physician and his assistants aim at producing health in the body?

Cle. Certainly

Ath. And a physician who is ignorant about the body that is to say who knows not that which we just now called health, or a general who knows not victory or any others who are ignorant of the particulars of the arts which we mentioned, cannot be said to have understanding about any of these matters.

Cle. They cannot.

Ath. And what would you say of the state? If a person proves to be ignorant of the aim to which the statesman should look, ought he, in the first place, to be called a ruler at all and further will he ever be able to preserve that of which he does not even know the aim?

Cle. Impossible.

Ath. And therefore, if our settlement of the country is to be perfect, we ought to have some institution, which, as I was saying, will tell what is the aim of the state, and will inform us how we are to attain this, and what law or what man will advise us to that end Any state which has no such institution is likely to be devoid of mind and sense, and in all her actions will proceed by mere chance.

Cle. Very true.

Ath. In which, then, of the parts or institutions of the state is any such guardian power to be found? Can we say?

Cle. I am not quite certain, Stranger but I have a suspicion that you are referring to the assembly which you just now said was to meet at night.

Ath. You understand me perfectly Cleinias and we must assume, as the argument implies, that this council possesses all virtue and the beginning of virtue is not to make mistakes by guessing many things, but to look steadily at one thing and on this to fix all our aims.

Cle. Quite true.

Ath. Then now we shall see why there is nothing wonderful in states going astray—the reason is that their legislators have such different aims nor is there anything wonderful in some laying down as their rule of justice, that certain individuals should bear rule in the state, whether they be good or bad, and others that the citizens should be rich, not caring whether they are the slaves of other men or not. The tendency of others, again, is towards freedom and some legislate with a view to two things at once—they want to be at the same time free and the lords of other states but the wisest men, as they deem themselves to be, look to all these and similar aims, and there is no one of them which they exclusively honour and to which they would have all things look.

[963] Cle Then, Stranger our former assertion will hold, for we were saying that laws generally should look to one thing only and this, as we admitted was rightly said to be virtue.

Ath Yes.

Cle And we said that virtue was of four kinds?

Ath Quite true.

Cle And that mind was the leader of the four and that to her the three other virtues and all other things ought to have regard?

Ath. You follow me capitally Cleinias, and I would ask you to follow me to the end, for we have already said that the mind of the pilot, the mind of the physician and of the general look to that one thing to which they ought to look and now we may turn to mind political, of which, as of a human creature, we will ask a question —O wonderful being, and to what are you looking? The physician is able to tell his single aim in life, but you, the superior as you declare yourself to be of all intelligent beings, when you are asked are not able to tell Can you, Megillus, and you, Cleinias, say distinctly what is the aim of mind political in return for the many explanations of things which I have given you?

Cle We cannot, Stranger

Ath Well but ought we not to desire to see it, and to see where it is to be found?

Cle For example, where?

Ath For example we were saying that there

example that he should command any man to weep or abstain from weeping over the dead but he may forbid cries of lamentation and not allow the voice of the mourner to be heard out side the house [960] also, he may forbid the bringing of the dead body into the open streets or the processions of mourners in the streets and may require that before daybreak they should be outside the city Let these, then be our laws relating to such matters and let him who obeys be free from penalty but he who disobeys even a single guardian of the law shall be punished by them all with a fitting penalty Other modes of burial or again the denial of burial which is to be refused in the case of robbers of temples and parricides and the like, have been devised and are embodied in the pre ceding laws so that now our work of legisla tion is pretty nearly at an end but in all cases the end does not consist in doing something or acquiring something or establishing some thing—the end will be attained and finally accomplished when we have provided for the perfect and lasting continuance of our institu tions until then our creation is incomplete

Cle That is very good Stranger but I wish you would tell me more clearly what you mean

Ath O Cleinias many things of old time were well said and sung and the saying about the Fates was one of them

Cle What is it?

Ath The saying that Lachesis or the giver of the lots is the first of them and that Clotho or the spinster is the second of them and that Atropos or the unchanging one is the third of them and that she is the preserver of the things which we have spoken and which have been compared in a figure to things woven by fire they both (i e Atropos and the fire) pro ducing the quality of unchangeableness I am speaking of the things which in a state and gov ernment give not only health and salvation to the body but law, or rather preservation of the law in the soul and, if I am not mistaken this seems to be still wanting in our laws we have still to see how we can implant in them this irre versible nature

Cle It will be no small matter if we can only discover how such a nature can be implanted in anything

Ath But it certainly can be so much I clearly see

Cle Then let us not think of desisting until we have imparted this quality to our laws for it is ridiculous after a great deal of labour has been spent to place a thing at last on an inse cure foundation

Megillus I approve of your suggestion and am quite of the same mind with you

Cle Very good And now what according to you is to be the salvation of our government and of our laws and how is it to be effected?

Ath Were we not saying that there must be in our city a council which was to be of this sort [961]—The ten oldest guardians of the law and all those who have obtained prizes of virtue were to meet in the same assembly and the council was also to include those who had visited foreign countries in the hope of hearing something that might be of use in the preservation of the laws and who having come safely home and having been tested in these same matters had proved themselves to be worthy to take part in the assembly —each of the members was to select some young man of not less than thirty years of age he himself judging in the first instance whether the young man was worthy by nature and educa tion and then suggesting him to the others, and if he seemed to them also to be worthy they were to adopt him but if not the decision at which they arrived was to be kept a secret from the citizens at large and more especially from the rejected candidate The meeting of the council was to be held early in the morning when everybody was most at leisure from all other business whether public or private— was not something of this sort said by us before?

Cle True

Ath Then returning to the council I would say further that if we let it down to be the an chor of the state our city having everything which is suitable to her will preserve all that we wish to preserve

Cle What do you mean?

Ath Now is the time for me to speak the truth in all earnestness

Cle Well said and I hope that you will ful fil your intention

Ath Know Cleinias that everything in all that it does has a natural saviour as of an animal the soul and the head are the chief saviours

Cle Once more, what do you mean?

Ath The well being of those two is obviously the preservation of every living thing

Cle How is that?

Ath The soul besides other things contains mind and the head besides other things con tains sight and hearing and the mind min gling with the noblest of the senses and becom

Cf Republic x 620

ing with them, may be truly called the salvation of all.

Cle Yes, Quite so.

Ath Yes, indeed but with what is that intelligence concerned which, mingling with the senses, is the salvation of ships in storms as well as in fair weather? In a ship when the pilot and the sailors unite their perceptions with the piloting mind, do they not save both themselves and their craft?

Cle Very true.

Ath We do not want many illustrations about such matters —What aim would the general of an army or what aim would a physician propose to himself, if he were seeking to attain salvation?

Cle Very good.

[962] Ath Does not the general aim at victory and superiority in war and do not the physician and his assistants aim at producing health in the body?

Cle Certainly

Ath And a physician who is ignorant about the body that is to say who knows not that which we just now called health, or a general who knows not victory or any others who are ignorant of the particulars of the arts which we mentioned, cannot be said to have understanding about any of these matters.

Cle They cannot.

Ath And what would you say of the state? If a person proves to be ignorant of the aim to which the statesman should look, ought he, in the first place, to be called a ruler at all and further will he ever be able to preserve that of which he does not even know the aim?

Cle Impossible.

Ath And therefore, if our settlement of the country is to be perfect, we ought to have some institution, which, as I was saying, will tell what is the aim of the state, and will inform us how we are to attain this, and what law or what man will advise us to that end. Any state which has no such institution is likely to be devoid of mind and sense, and in all her actions will proceed by mere chance.

Cle Very true.

Ath In which, then, of the parts or institutions of the state is any such guardian power to be found? Can we say?

Cle I am not quite certain, Stranger but I have a suspicion that you are referring to the assembly which you just now said was to meet at night.

Ath You understand me perfectly Cleinias and we must assume, as the argument implies, that this council possesses all virtue and the beginning of virtue is not to make mistakes by guessing many things, but to look steadily at one thing and on this to fix all our aims.

Cle Quite true.

Ath Then now we shall see why there is nothing wonderful in states going astray—the reason is that their legislators have such different aims nor is there anything wonderful in some laying down as their rule of justice, that certain individuals should bear rule in the state whether they be good or bad, and others that the citizens should be rich not caring whether they are the slaves of other men or not. The tendency of others, again, is towards freedom and some legislate with a view to two things at once—they want to be at the same time free and the lords of other states but the wisest men, as they deem themselves to be, look to all these and similar aims, and there is no one of them which they exclusively honour and to which they would have all things look.

[963] Cle Then, Stranger our former assertion will hold, for we were saying that laws generally should look to one thing only and this, as we admitted, was rightly said to be virtue.

Ath Yes.

Cle And we said that virtue was of four kinds?

Ath Quite true.

Cle And that mind was the leader of the four and that to her the three other virtues and all other things ought to have regard?

Ath You follow me capitally Cleinias, and I would ask you to follow me to the end, for we have already said that the mind of the pilot, the mind of the physician and of the general look to that one thing to which they ought to look and now we may turn to mind political, of which, as of a human creature, we will ask a question —O wonderful being, and to what are you looking? The physician is able to tell his single aim in life, but you, the superior as you declare yourself to be, of all intelligent beings, when you are asked are not able to tell. Can you, Megillus, and you, Cleinias, say distinctly what is the aim of mind political, in return for the many explanations of things which I have given you?

Cle We cannot, Stranger

Ath Well, but ought we not to desire to see it, and to see where it is to be found?

Cle For example, where?

Ath For example, we were saying that there are four kinds of virtue, and as there are four of them each of them must be one

Cle Certainly

Ath And further all four of them we call one for we say that courage is virtue and that prudence is virtue and the same of the two others as if they were in reality not many but one that is virtue

Cle Quite so

Ath There is no difficulty in seeing in what way the two differ from one another and have received two names and so of the rest But there is more difficulty in explaining why we call these two and the rest of them by the single name of virtue

Cle How do you mean?

Ath I have no difficulty in explaining what I mean Let us distribute the subject into questions and answers

Cle Once more what do you mean?

Ath Ask me what is that one thing which I call virtue and then again speak of as two one part being courage and the other wisdom I will tell you how that occurs —One of th m has to do with fear in this the beasts also participate and quite young children—I mean courage for a courageous temper is a gift of nature and not of reason But without reason there never has been or is or will be a wise and understanding soul it is of a different nature

Cle That is true

Ath I have now told you in what way the two are different and do you in return tell me in what way they are one and the same [964] Suppose that I ask you in what way the four are one, and when you have answered me you will have a right to ask of me in return in what way they are four and then let us proceed to enquire whether in the case of things which have a name and also a definition to them true knowledge consists in knowing the name only and not the definition Can he who is good for anything be ignorant of all this without discredit where great and glorious truths are concerned?

Cle I suppose not

Ath And is there anything greater to the legislator and the guardian of the law and to him who thinks that he excels all other men in virtue and has won the palm of excellence than these very qualities of which we are now speaking—courage, temp rance wisdom justice?

Cle How can there be anything greater?

Ath And ought not the interpreters, the teachers the lawgivers the guardians of th other citizens to excel the rest of mankind an perfectly to show him who desires to learn an know or whose evil actions require to be pun ished and reproved what is the nature of vir tue and vice? Or shall some poet who ha found his way into the city or some chanc person who pretends to be an instructor o youth show himself to be better than him wh has won the prize for every virtue? And ca we wonder that when the guardians are no adequate in speech or action and have no ade quate knowledge of virtue the city being un guarded should experience the common fate o cities in our day?

Cle Wonder! no

Ath Well then, must we do as we said? O can we give our guardians a more precis knowledge of virtue in speech and action than the many have? or is there any way in which our city can be made to resemble the head and senses of rational beings because possessing such a guardian power?

Cle What Stranger is the drift of your comparison?

Ath Do we not see that the city is the trunk, and are not the younger guardians, who are chosen for their natural gifts, placed in the head of the state having their souls all full of eyes with which they look about the whole city? They keep watch and hand over their perceptions to the memory and inform the elders of all that happens in the city [965] and those whom we compared to the mind because they have many wise thoughts—that is to say the old men—take counsel and making use of the younger men as their ministers and advising with them—in this way both together truly preserve the whole state —Shall this or some other be the order of our state? Are all our citizens to be equal in acquirements or shall there be special persons among them who have received a more careful training and education?

Cle That they should be equal my good sir, is impossible

Ath Then we ought to proceed to some more exact training than any which has preceded

Cle Certainly

Ath And must not that of which we are in need be the one to which we were just now alluding?

Cle Very true

Ath Did we not say that the workman or guardian if he be perfect in every respect, ought not only to be able to see the many aims,

[1] Cf. Laches 196

but he should press onward to the one? this he should know and knowing order all things with a view to it.

Cle True.

Ath And can any one have a more exact way of considering or contemplating anything, than the being able to look at one idea gathered from many different things?

Cle Perhaps not.

Ath Not "Perhaps not," but "Certainly not," my good sir is the right answer. There never has been a truer method than this discovered by any man.

Cle I bow to your authority Stranger let us proceed in the way which you propose.

Ath Then, as would appear we must compel the guardians of our divine state to perceive, in the first place, what that principle is which is the same in all the four—the same, as we affirm, in courage and in temperance, and in justice and in prudence, and which, being one we call as we ought, by the single name of virtue. To this my friends, we will if you please, hold fast, and not let go until we have sufficiently explained what that is to which we are to look, whether to be regarded as one, or as a whole, or as both, or in whatever way. Are we likely ever to be in a virtuous condition, if we cannot tell whether virtue is many or four or one? Certainly if we take counsel among ourselves, we shall in some way contrive that this principle has a place amongst us but if you have made up your mind that we should let the matter alone we will Cle We must not, Stranger by the God of strangers I swear that we must not, for in our opinion you speak most truly but we should like to know how you will accomplish your purpose.

[966] Ath Wait a little before you ask and let us, first of all, be quite agreed with one another that the purpose has to be accomplished.

Cle Certainly it ought to be if it can be.

Ath Well, and about the good and the honourable, are we to take the same view? Are our guardians only to know that each of them is many or also how and in what way they are one?

Cle They must consider also in what sense they are one.

Ath And are they to consider only and to be unable to set forth what they think?

Cle Certainly not that would be the state of a slave.

Ath And may not the same be said of all good things—that the true guardians of the laws ought to know the truth about them, and to be able to interpret them in words, and carry them out in action, judging of what is and of what is not well, according to nature?

Cle Certainly

Ath Is not the knowledge of the Gods which we have set forth with so much zeal one of the noblest sorts of knowledge —to know that they are and know how great is their power as far as in man lies We do indeed excuse the mass of the citizens, who only follow the voice of the laws, but we refuse to admit as guardians any who do not labour to obtain every possible evidence that there is respecting the Gods our city is forbidden and not allowed to choose as a guardian of the law or to place in the select order of virtue, him who is not an inspired man, and has not laboured at these things

Cle It is certainly just, as you say that he who is indolent about such matters or incapable should be rejected, and that things honourable should be put away from him.

Ath Are we assured that there are two things which lead men to believe in the Gods, as we have already stated

Cle What are they?

Ath One is the argument about the soul, which has been already mentioned—that it is the eldest and most divine of all things, to which motion attaining generation gives perpetual existence the other was an argument from the order of the motion of the stars, and of all things under the dominion of the mind which ordered the universe If a man look upon the world not lightly or ignorantly there was never any one so godless who did not experience an effect opposite to that which the many imagine. [967] For they think that those who handle these matters by the help of astronomy and the accompanying arts of demonstration, may become godless, because they see, as far as they can see things happening by necessity and not by an intelligent will accomplishing good.

Cle But what is the fact?

Ath Just the opposite, as I said, of the opinion which once prevailed among men, that the sun and stars are without soul Even in those days men wondered about them, and that which is now ascertained was then conjectured by some who had a more exact knowledge of them—that if they had been things without soul and had no mind, they could never have dwelling in the citadel of the land might become perfect guardians such as we have never seen in all our previous life by reason of the saving virtue which is in them moved with numerical exactness so wonderful and even at that time some ventured to hazard the conjecture that mind was the orderer of the universe But these same persons again mistaking the nature of the soul which they conceived to be younger and not older than the body once more overturned the world or rather I should say themselves for the bodies which they saw moving in heaven all appeared to be full of stones and earth and many other lifeless substances and to these they assigned the causes of all things Such studies gave rise to much atheism and perplexity and the poets took occasion to be abusive—comparing the philosophers to she dogs uttering vain howlings and talking other nonsense of the same sort But now as I said the case is reversed

Cle How so?

Ath No man can be a true worshipper of the Gods who does not know these two principles —that the soul is the eldest of all things which are born and is immortal and rules over all bodies moreover as I have now said several times he who has not contemplated the mind of nature which is said to exist in the stars and gone through the previous training and seen the connection of music with these things and harmonized them all with laws and institutions is not able to give a reason of such things as have a reason [2] And he who is unable to acquire this in addition to the ordinary virtues of a [968] citizen can hardly be a good ruler of a whole state but he should be the subordinate of other rulers Wherefore Cleinias and Megillus let us consider whether we may not add to all the other laws which we have discussed this further one—that the nocturnal assembly of the magistrates which has also shared in the whole scheme of education proposed by us shall be a guard set according to law for the salvation of the state Shall we propose this?

Cle Certainly my good friend we will if the thing is in any degree possible

Ath Let us make a common effort to gain such an object for I too will gladly share in the attempt Of these matters I have had much experience and have often considered them and I dare say that I shall be able to find others who will also help

Cle I agree Stranger that we should proceed along the road in which God is guiding us and how we can proceed rightly has now to be investigated and explained

Ath O Megillus and Cleinias about these matters we cannot legislate further until the council is constituted when that is done, then we will determine what authority they shall have of their own but the explanation of how this is all to be ordered would only be given rightly in a long discourse

Cle What do you mean and what new thing is this?

Ath In the first place a list would have to be made out of those who by their ages and studies and dispositions and habits are well fitted for the duty of a guardian In the next place it will not be easy for them to discover themselves what they ought to learn or become the disciple of one who has already made the discovery Furthermore to write down the times at which and during which they ought to receive the several kinds of instruction would be a vain thing for the learners themselves do not know what is learned to advantage until the knowledge which is the result of learning has found a place in the soul of each And so these details although they could not be truly said to be secret might be said to be incapable of being stated beforehand because when stated they would have no meaning

Cle What then are we to do Stranger under these circumstances?

Ath As the proverb says the answer is no secret but open to all of us [969]—We must risk the whole on the chance of throwing as they say thrice six or thrice ace and I am willing to share with you the danger by stating and explaining to you my views about education and nurture which is the question coming to the surface again The danger is not a slight or ordinary one and I would advise you Cleinias, in particular to see to the matter for if you order rightly the city of the Magnetes or whatever name God may give it you will obtain the greatest glory or at any rate you will be thought the most courageous of men in the estimation of posterity Dear companions, if this our divine assembly can only be established to them we will hand over the city none of the present company of legislators as I may call them would hesitate about that And the state will be perfected and become a waking reality which a little while ago we attempted to create as a dream and in idea only mingling together reason and mind in one image in the hope that our citizens might be duly mingled and rightly educated and being educated and rest of one of the friends of the party then in exile, at the time when they themselves were in exile and misfortune.

As I observed these incidents and the men engaged in public affairs, the laws too and the customs, the more closely I examined them and the farther I advanced in life, the more difficult it seemed to me to handle public affairs aright. [d] For it was not possible to be active in politics without friends and trustworthy supporters; and to find these ready to my hand was not an easy matter, since public affairs at Athens were not carried on in accordance with the manners and practices of our fathers; nor was there any ready method by which I could make new friends. The laws too, written and unwritten, were being altered for the worse, and the evil was growing with startling rapidity. The result was that, though at first I had been full of a strong impulse towards political life, [e] as I looked at the course of affairs and saw them being swept in all directions by contending currents, my head finally began to swim; and, though I did not stop looking to see if there was any likelihood of improvement in these symptoms and in the general course of public life, [326a] I postponed action till a suitable opportunity should arise. Finally, it became clear to me with regard to all existing communities, that they were one and all misgoverned. For their laws have got into a state that is almost incurable, except by some extraordinary reform with good luck to support it. And I was forced to say, when praising true philosophy, that it is by this that men are enabled to see what justice in public and private life really is. Therefore, I said, there will be no cessation of evils for the sons of men, [b] till either those who are pursuing a right and true philosophy receive sovereign power in the States, or those in power in the States by some dispensation of providence become true philosophers.

With these thoughts in my mind I came to Italy and Sicily on my first visit. My first impressions on arrival were those of strong disapproval—disapproval of the kind of life which was there called the life of happiness, stuffed full as it was with the banquets of the Italian Greeks and Syracusans, who ate to repletion twice every day and were never without a partner for the night; [c] and disapproval of the habits which this manner of life produces. For with these habits formed early in life, no man under heaven could possibly attain to wisdom—human nature is not capable of such an extraordinary combination. Temperance also is out of the question for such a man; and the same applies to virtue generally. No city could remain in a state of tranquillity under any laws whatsoever, when men think it right to squander all their property in extravagant excesses, [d] and consider it a duty to be idle in everything else except eating and drinking and the laborious prosecution of debauchery. It follows necessarily that the constitutions of such cities must be constantly changing; tyrannies, oligarchies and democracies succeeding one another, while those who hold the power cannot so much as endure the name of any form of government which maintains justice and equality of rights.

With a mind full of these thoughts, on the top of my previous convictions, [e] I crossed over to Syracuse—led there perhaps by chance—but it really looks as if some higher power was even then planning to lay a foundation for all that has now come to pass with regard to Dion and Syracuse—and for further troubles too, I fear, unless you listen to the advice which is now for the second time offered by me. What do I mean by saying that my arrival in Sicily at that moment proved to be the foundation [327a] on which all the sequel rests? I was brought into close intercourse with Dion who was then a young man, and explained to him my views as to the ideals at which men should aim, advising him to carry them out in practice. In doing this I seem to have been unaware that I was, in a fashion, without knowing it, contriving the overthrow of the tyranny which subsequently took place. For Dion, who rapidly assimilated my teaching as he did all forms of knowledge, listened to me with an eagerness which I had never seen equalled in any young man, [b] and resolved to live for the future in a better way than the majority of Italian and Sicilian Greeks, having set his affection on virtue in preference to pleasure and self-indulgence. The result was that until the death of Dionysios he lived in a way which rendered him somewhat unpopular among those whose manner of life was that which is usual in the courts of despots.

After that event he came to the conclusion that this conviction, [c] which he himself had gained under the influence of good teaching, was not likely to be confined to himself. Indeed, he saw it being actually implanted in other minds—not many perhaps, but certainly in some; and he thought that, with the aid of the Gods, Dionysios might perhaps become one of these, and that, if such a thing did come to pass,

The Seventh Letter

Plato to the relatives and friends of Dion Welfare

You write to me that I must consider your views the same as those of Dion [324a] and you urge me to aid your cause so far as I can in word and deed My answer is that if you have the same opinion and desire as he had I consent to aid your cause but if not I shall think more than once about it Now what his purpose and desire was I can inform you from no mere conjecture but from positive knowledge For when I made my first visit to Sicily being then about forty years old Dion was of the same age as Hipparinos is now and the opinion which he then formed was that which he always retained [b] I mean the belief that the Syracusans ought to be free and governed by the best laws So it is no matter for surprise if some God should make Hipparinos adopt the same opinion as Dion about forms of government But it is well worth while that you should all old as well as young hear the way in which this opinion was formed and I will attempt to give you an account of it from the beginning For the present is a suitable opportunity

In my youth I went through the same experience as many other men I fancied that if early in life I became my own master [c] I should at once embark on a political career And I found myself confronted with the following occurrences in the public affairs of my own city The existing constitution being generally condemned a revolution took place and fifty one men came to the front as rulers of the revolutionary government namely eleven in the city and ten in the Peiraeus—each of these bodies being in charge of the market and municipal matters—while thirty were appointed rulers with full powers over public affairs as a whole [d] Some of these were relatives and acquaintances of mine and they at once invited me to share in their doings as something to which I had a claim The effect on me was not surprising in the case of a young man I considered that they would of course so manage the State as to bring men out of a bad way of life into a good one So I watched them very closely to see what they would do

And seeing as I did that in quite a short time they made the former government seem by comparison something precious as gold—for among other things they tried to send a friend of mine [e] the aged Socrates whom I should scarcely scruple to describe as the most upright man of that day with some other persons to carry off one of the citizens by force to [325a] execution in order that whether he wished it or not he might share the guilt of their conduct but he would not obey them risking all consequences in preference to becoming a partner in their iniquitous deeds—seeing all these things and others of the same kind on a considerable scale I disapproved of their proceedings and withdrew from any connection with the abuses of the time

Not long after that a revolution terminated the power of the thirty and the form of government as it then was And once more though with more hesitation I began to be moved by the desire to take part in public and political affairs [b] Well even in the new government unsettled as it was events occurred which one would naturally view with disapproval and it was not surprising that in a period of revolution excessive penalties were inflicted by some persons on political opponents, though those who had returned from exile at that time showed very considerable forbearance But once more it happened that some of those in power brought my friend Socrates whom I have mentioned to trial before a court of law [c] laying a most iniquitous charge against him and one most inappropriate in his case for it was on a charge of impiety that some of them prosecuted and others condemned and executed the very man who would not participate in the iniquitous ar had come upon me for faint heartedness and cowardice.

On my arrival to cut a long story short I found the court of Dionysios full of intrigues and of attempts to create in the [c] sovereign ill feeling against Dion I combated these as far as I could but with very little su cess and in the fourth month or thereabouts charging Dion w th conspiracy to seize the throne, Dionysios put him on board a small boat and expelled him from Syracuse with ignominy All of us who were Dion s friends were afraid that he might take vengeance on one or other of us as an accomplice in Dion s conspiracy With regard to me, there was even a rumour current in Syracuse that I had been put to death by Dionysios as the cause of all that had occurred [d] Perceiving that we were all in this state of mind and apprehending that our fears might lead to some serious consequence, he now tried to win all of us over by kindness me in particular he encouraged, bidding me be of good cheer and entreating me on all grounds to remain For my flight from him was not likely to redound to his credit, but my staying might do so Therefore, he made a great pretence of entreating me. And we know that the entreaties of sovereigns are mixed with compulsion. [e] So to secure his object he proceeded to render my departure imposs ble, bringing me into the acropolis and establishing me in quarters from which not a single ship s captain would have taken me away against the will of Dionysios, nor indeed without a special messenger sent by him to order my removal Nor was there a single merchant or a single official in charge of points of departure from the country who would have allowed me to depart unaccompanied, and would not have promptly seized me and taken me back to Dionysios, especially since a statement had now been circulated contradicting the previous rumours and giving out that Dionysios was becoming extraordinarily [330a] attached to Plato. What were the facts bout this attachment? I must tell the truth. As time went on, and as intercourse made him acquainted with my disposition and character he did become more and more attached to me, and wished me to praise him more than I praised Dion, and to look upon him as more specially my friend than D on, and he was extraordinarily eager about this sort of thing But when confronted w th the one way in which this might have been done, if it was to be done at all, [b] he hrank from coming into close and intimate relations w th me as a pupil and listener to my discourses on philosophy fearing the danger suggested by mischief makers, that he might be ensnared and so Dion would prove to have accomplished all his object. I endured all this patiently retaining the purpose with which I had come and the hope that he might come to desire the philosophic life. But his resistance prevailed against me

The time of my first visit to Sicily and my stay there was taken up with all these incidents [c] On a later occasion I left home and again came on an urgent summons from Dionysios But before giving the motives and particulars of my conduct then and showing how suitable and right it was I must first, in order that I may not treat as the main point what is only a side issue, give you my advice as to what your acts should be in the present position of affairs afterwards, to satisfy those who put the question why I came a second time, I will deal fully with the facts about my second visit what I have now to say is this.

He who advises a sick man whose manner of life is prejudicial to health, [d] is clearly bound first of all to change his patient s manner of life and if the patient is willing to obey him he may go on to give him other advice But if he is not willing I shall consider one who declines to advise such a patient to be a man and a physician, and one who gives in to him to be unmanly and unprofessional In the same way with regard to a State whether it be under a single ruler or more than one, if, while the government is being carried on methodically and in a right course, [e] it asks advice about any details of policy it is the part of a wise man to advise such people But when men are travelling altogether outside the path of right government and flatly refuse to move in the right path and start by giving notice to their adviser that he must leave the government alone and make no change in it under penalty of death—if such men [331a] should order their counsellors to pander to their wishes and desires and to advise them in what way their object may most readily and easily be once for all accomplished, I should consider as unmanly one who accepts the duty of giving such forms of advice, and one who refuses it to be a true man

Holding these views whenever anyone consults me about any of the weightiest matters affecting his own life as, for instance, the acquisition of property or the proper treatment of body or [b] mind if it seems to me that his daily life rests on any system, or if he seems likely to listen to advice about the things on the result would be a life of unspeakable happiness both for himself and for the rest of the Syracusans Further he thought it essential that I should come to Syracuse by all manner of means and with the utmost possible speed to be his partner in these plans [d] remembering in his own case how readily intercourse with me had produced in him a longing for the noblest and best life And if it should produce a similar effect on Dionysios as his aim was that it should, he had great hope that without bloodshed loss of life and those disastrous events which have now taken place he would be able to introduce the true life of happiness throughout the whole territory

Holding these sound views Dion persuaded Dionysios to send for me he also wrote himself entreating me to come by all manner of means and with the utmost possible speed [e] before certain other persons coming in contact with Dionysios should turn him aside into some way of life other than the best What he said though perhaps it is rather long to repeat was as follows What opportunities he said shall we wait for, greater than those now offered to us by Providence? [328a] And he described the Syracusan empire in Italy and Sicily his own influential position in it and the youth of Dionysios and how strongly his desire was directed towards philosophy and education His own nephews and relatives he said, would be readily attracted towards the principles and manner of life described by me and would be most influential in attracting Dionysios in the same direction so that now if ever we should see the accomplishment of every hope that the same persons might actually become both philosophers and the rulers of great States [b] These were the appeals addressed to me and much more to the same effect

My own opinion so far as the young men were concerned and the probable line which their conduct would take, was full of apprehension—for young men are quick in forming desires which often take directions conflicting with one another But I knew that the character of Dion s mind was naturally a stable one and had also the advantage of somewhat advanced years

Therefore I pondered the matter and was in two minds as to whether I ought to listen to entreaties and go or how I ought to act and finally the scale turned in favour of the view that if ever anyone was to try to carry out in practice my ideas about [c] laws and constitutions now was the time for making the attempt for if only I could fully convince one man I should have secured thereby the accomplishment of all good things

With these views and thus nerved to the task, I sailed from home, not in the spirit which some imagined but principally through a feeling of shame with regard to myself lest I might some day appear to myself wholly and solely a mere man of words one who would never of his own will lay his hand to any act Also there was reason to think that I should be betraying first and foremost my friendship and comradeship with Dion, [d] who in very truth was in a position of considerable danger If therefore anything should happen to him, or if he were banished by Dionysios and his other enemies and coming to us as exile addressed this question to me Plato I have come to you as a fugitive, not for want of hoplites nor because I had no cavalry for defence against my enemies but for want of words and power of persuasion which I knew to be a special gift of yours enabling you to lead young men into the path of goodness and justice and to establish in every case relations of friendship and comradeship among them [e] It is for the want of this assistance on your part that I have left Syracuse and am here now And the disgrace attaching to your treatment of me is a small matter But philosophy—whose praises you are always singing while you say she is held in dishonour by the rest of mankind—must we not say that philosophy along with me has now been betrayed so far as your action was concerned? [329a] Had I been living at Megara you would certainly have come to give me your aid towards the objects for which I asked it or you would have thought yourself the most contemptible of mankind But as it is do you think that you will escape the reputation of cowardice by making excuses about the distance of the journey the length of the sea voyage and the amount of labour involved? Far from it. To reproaches of this kind what creditable reply could I have made? Surely none

[b] I took my departure therefore, acting so far as a man can act, in obedience to reason and justice and for these reasons leaving my own occupations, which were certainly not discreditable ones to put myself under a tyranny which did not seem likely to harmonise with my teaching or with myself By my departure I secured my own freedom from the displeasure of Zeus Xenios and made myself clear of any charge on the part of philosophy which would have been exposed to detraction if any disgrace

levling a tribute for the barbarians. This was the language and these the exhortations given by us, the conspirators against Dionysios according to the charges circulated from various sources—charges which, prevailing as they did with Dionysios, caused the expulsion of Dion and reduced me to a state of apprehension But when—to summarise great events which happened in no great time—Dion returned from the Peloponnese [b] and Athens, his advice to Dionysios took the form of action.

To proceed—when Dion had twice over delivered the city and restored it to the citizens, the Syracusans went through the same changes of feeling towards him as Dionysios had gone through, when Dion attempted first to educate him and train him to be a sovereign worthy of supreme power and, when that was done, to be his coadjutor in all the details of his career Dionysios listened to those who circulated slanders to the effect that Dion was aiming at the tyranny in all the steps which [c] he took at that time, his intention being that Dionysios, when his mind had fallen under the spell of culture, should neglect the government and leave it in his hands and that he should then appropriate it for himself and treacherously depose Dionysios. These slanders were victorious on that occasion they were so once more when circulated among the Syracusans, winning a victory which took an extraordinary course and proved disgraceful to its authors. The story of what then took place is one which deserves careful attention on the part of those who are [d] inviting me to deal with the present situation.

I, an Athenian and friend of Dion, came as his ally to the court of Dionysios, in order that I might create good will in place of a state of war in my conflict with the authors of these slanders I was worsted. When Dionysios tried to persuade me by offers of honours and wealth to attach myself to him, and with a view to give a decent colour to Dion's expulsion to be a witness and friend on his side, he failed completely in his attempt. Later on, [e] when Dion returned from exile, he took with him from Athens two brothers, who had been his friends not from community in philosophic study but with the ordinary companionship common among most friends, which they form as the result of relations of hospitality and the intercourse which occurs when one man initiates the other in the mysteries. It was from this kind of intercourse and from services connected with his return that these two helpers in his restoration became his companions. Having come to Sicily [333 a] when they perceived that Dion had been misrepresented to the Sicilian Greeks whom he had liberated as one that plotted to become monarch, they not only betrayed their companion and friend, but shared personally in the guilt of his murder standing by his murderers as supporters with weapons in their hands. The guilt and impiety of their conduct I neither excuse nor do I dwell upon it. For many others make it their business to harp upon it, [b] and will make it their business in the future. But I do take exception to the statement that, because they were Athenians, they have brought shame upon this city For I say that he too is an Athenian who refused to betray this same Dion, when he had the offer of riches and many other honours. For his was no common or vulgar friendship but rested on community in liberal education, and this is the one thing to which a wise man will put his trust far more than in ties of personal and bodily kinship So the two murderers of Dion were not of sufficient importance to be causes of disgrace [c] to this city as though they had been men of any note.

All this has been said with a view to counselling the friends and family of Dion And in addition to this I give for the third time to you the same advice and counsel which I have given twice before to others—not to enslave Sicily nor any other State to despots—this is my counsel —but to put it under the rule of laws—for the other course is better neither for the enslavers nor for the enslaved, [d] for themselves, their children's children and descendants the attempt is in every way fraught with disaster It is only small and mean natures that are bent upon seizing such gains for themselves, natures that know nothing of goodness and justice, divine as well as human, in this life and in the next.

These are the lessons which I tried to teach, first to Dion, secondly to Dionysios, and now for the third time to you. Do you obey me, thinking of Zeus the Preserver the patron of third ventures, and looking at the lot of Dionysios and Dion, of whom the one who disobeyed me is living in dishonour [e] while he who obeyed me has died honourably For the one thing which is wholly right and noble is to strive for that which is most honourable for a man's self and for his country and to face the consequences whatever they may be. For none of us can escape death, nor if a man could do so, would it, as the vulgar suppose, make him happy For nothing evil or good, which is worth which he consults me, I advise him with readiness, and do not content myself with giving him a merely perfunctory answer But if a man does not consult me at all or evidently does not intend to follow my advice, I do not take the initiative in advising such a man, and will not use compulsion to him, even if he be my own son I would advise a slave under such circumstances, and would use compulsion to him if he were unwilling [c] To a father or mother I do not think that piety allows one to offer compulsion unless they are suffering from an attack of insanity and if they are following any regular habits of life which please them but do not please me, I would not offend them by offering useless advice nor would I flatter them or truckle to them, providing them with the means of satisfying desires which I myself would sooner die than cherish The wise man should go through life with the same attitude of mind towards his country If she should appear to him to be following a policy which is not a [d] good one he should say so provided that his words are not likely either to fall on deaf ears or to lead to the loss of his own life But force against his native land he should not use in order to bring about a change of constitution, when it is not possible for the best constitution to be introduced without driving men into exile or putting them to death he should keep quiet and offer up prayers for his own welfare and for that of his country

These are the principles in accordance with which I should advise you as also, jointly with Dion I advised Dionysios bidding him in the first place to live his daily life in a way that would make him as far as possible master of himself and able to [e] gain faithful friends and supporters in order that he might not have the same experience as his father For his father having taken under his rule many great cities of Sicily which had been utterly destroyed by the barbarians was not able to found them afresh and to establish in them trustworthy governments carried on by his own supporters [332a] either by men who had no ties of blood with him or by his brothers whom he had brought up when they were younger and had raised from humble station to high office and from poverty to immense wealth Not one of these was he able to work upon by persuasion, instruction services and ties of kindred so as to make him a partner in his rule and he showed himself inferior to Darius with a sevenfold inferiority For Darius did not put his trust in brothers or in men whom he had brought up, but only in his confederates in the overthrow of the Mede and Eunuch [b] and to these he assigned portions of his empire, seven in number each of them greater than all Sicily, and they were faithful to him and did not attack either him or one another Thus he showed a pattern of what the good lawgiver and king ought to be for he drew up laws by which he has secured the Persian empire in safety down to the present time

Again to give another instance, the Athenians took under their rule very many cities not founded by themselves, which had been hard hit by the barbarians but were still in existence, and maintained their rule over these for seventy years [c] because they had in each of them men whom they could trust But Dionysios, who had gathered the whole of Sicily into a single city and was so clever that he trusted no one, only secured his own safety with great difficulty For he was badly off for trustworthy friends and there is no surer criterion of virtue and vice than this whether a man is or is not destitute of such friends

This then was the advice which Dion and I gave to Dionysios since, [d] owing to the bringing up which he had received from his father he had had no advantages in the way of education or of suitable lessons in the first place and in the second place that after starting in this way, he should make friends of others among his connections who were of the same age and were in sympathy with his pursuit of virtue but above all that he should be in harmony with himself for this it was of which he was remarkably in need This we did not say in plain words for that would not have been safe but in covert language we maintained that every man in this way would save both himself and those whom he was leading [e] and if he did not follow this path he would do just the opposite of this. And after proceeding on the course which we described and making himself a wise and temperate man if he were then to found again the cities of Sicily which had been laid waste and bind them together by laws and constitutions so as to be loyal to him and to one another in their resistance to the attacks of the barbarians he would we told him [333a] make his father s empire not merely double what it was but many times greater For if these things were done, his way would be clear to a more complete subjugation of the Carthaginians than that which befell them in Gelon s time whereas in our own day his father had followed the opposite course of know that in times of civil strife there is no respite from trouble till the victors make an end of feeding their grudge by combats and banishments and executions, and of wreaking their vengeance on their enemies [337a] They should master themselves and enacting impartial laws, framed not to gratify themselves more than the conquered party should compel men to obey these by two restraining forces, respect and fear fear because they are the masters and can display superior force respect, because they rise superior to pleasures and are willing and able to be servants to the laws. There is no other way save this for terminating the troubles of a city that is [b] in a state of civil strife but a constant continuance of internal disorders, struggles, hatred and mutual distrust is the common lot of cities which are in that plight

Therefore, those who have for the time being gained the upper hand when they desire to secure their position must by their own act and choice select from all Hellas men whom they have ascertained to be the best for the purpose. These must in the first place be men of mature years, who have children and wives at home, and, as far as possible, a long line of ancestors of good repute, and all must be possessed of sufficient property For a city of ten thousand householders their numbers should be [c] fifty that is enough. These they must induce to come from their own homes by entreaties and the promise of the highest honours and having induced them to come they must entreat and command them to draw up laws after binding themselves by oath to show no partiality either to conquerors or to conquered but to give equal and common rights to the whole State.

When laws have been enacted what every thing then hinges on is this [d] If the conquerors show more obedience to the laws than the conquered the whole State will be full of security and happiness, and there will be an escape from all your troubles. But if they do not, then do not summon me or any other helper to aid you against those who do not obey the counsel I now give you. For this course is akin to that which Dion and I attempted to carry out with our hearts set on the welfare of Syracuse It is indeed a second best course. The first and best was that scheme of welfare to all mankind which we attempted to carry out with the co-operation of Dionysios but some chance, mightier than men, [e] brought it to nothing Do you now with good fortune attending you and with Heaven's help try to bring your efforts to a happier issue.

Let this be the end of my advice and injunction and of the narrative of my first visit to Dionysios Whoever wishes may next hear of my second journey and voyage, and learn that it was a reasonable and suitable proceeding My first period of residence in Sicily was occupied in the way which I related [338a] before giving my advice to the relatives and friends of Dion After those events I persuaded Dionysios by such arguments as I could to let me go and we made an agreement as to what should be done when peace was made for at that time there was a state of war in Sicily Dionysios said that, when he had put the affairs of his empire in a position of greater safety for himself he would send for Dion and me again and he desired that Dion should regard what had befallen him not as an exile, [b] but as a change of residence. I agreed to come again on these conditions

When peace had been made, he began sending for me he requested that Dion should wait for another year but begged that I should by all means come Dion now kept urging and entreating me to go For persistent rumours came from Sicily that Dionysios was now once more possessed by an extraordinary desire for philosophy For this reason Dion pressed me urgently not to decline his invitation But though I was well aware that as regards philosophy such symptoms were not uncommon [c] in young men still it seemed to me safer at that time to part company altogether with Dion and Dionysios and I offended both of them by replying that I was an old man and that the steps now being taken were quite at variance with the previous agreement

After this, it seems, Archytes came to the court of Dionysios. Before my departure I had brought him and his Tarentine [d] circle into friendly relations with Dionysios There were some others in Syracuse who had received some instruction from Dion and others had learnt from these, getting their heads full of erroneous teaching on philosophical questions These, it seems, were attempting to hold discussions with Dionysios on questions connected with such subjects, in the idea that he had been fully instructed in my views. Now he is not at all devoid of natural gifts for learning, and he has a great craving for honour and glory What was said probably pleased him and he felt some shame when it became clear that he had not taken advantage of [e] my teaching during my visit For these reasons he conceived a desire for more definite instruction, and his love of glory was an additional incentive to him. The mentioning at all [335a] belongs to things soulless but good or evil will be the portion of every soul either while attached to the body or when separated from it

And we should in very truth always believe those ancient and sacred teachings, which declare that the soul is immortal that it has judges, and suffers the greatest penalties when it has been separated from the body Therefore also we should consider it a lesser evil to suffer great wrongs and outrages than to do them The covetous man, impoverished as he is in the soul turns a deaf ear to this teaching [b] or if he hears it he laughs it to scorn with fancied superiority and shamelessly snatches for himself from every source whatever his bestial fancy supposes will provide for him the means of eating or drinking or glutting himself with that slavish and gross pleasure which is falsely called after the goddess of love He is blind and cannot see in those acts of plunder which are accompanied by impiety what heinous guilt is attached to each wrongful deed and that the offender must drag with him the burden of this impiety while he moves about on earth and when he has travelled beneath the earth on a journey which has every circumstance of shame and misery [c]

It was by urging these and other like truths that I convinced Dion and it is I who have the best right to be angered with his murderers in much the same way as I have with Dionysios For both they and he have done the greatest injury to me and I might almost say to all mankind they by slaying the man that was willing to act righteously and he by refusing to act righteously during the whole of his rule [d] when he held supreme power in which rule if philosophy and power had really met together it would have sent forth a light to all men Greeks and barbarians establishing fully for all the true belief that there can be no happiness either for the community or for the individual man unless he passes his life under the rule of righteousness with the guidance of wisdom either possessing these virtues in himself or living under the rule of godly men and having received a right training and education in morals [e] These were the aims which Dionysios injured and for me everything else is a trifling injury compared with this

The murderer of Dion has without knowing it done the same as Dionysios For as regards Dion I know right well so far as it is possible for a man to say anything positively about other men that if he had got the supreme power he would never have turned his mind to any other form of rule [336a] but that dealing first with Syracuse, his own native land when h had made an end of her slavery clothed her in bright apparel and given her the garb of freedom he would then by every means in his power have ordered aright the lives of his fel*low-citizens* by suitable and excellent laws and the thing next in order which he would have set his heart to accomplish was to found again all the States of Sicily and make them free from the barbarians driving out some and subduing others an easier task for him than it was for Hiero [b] If these things had been accomplished by a man who was just and brave and temperate and a philosopher the same belief with regard to virtue would have been established among the majority which if Dionysios had been won over would have been established, I might almost say among all mankind and would have given them salvation But now some higher power or avenging fiend has fallen upon them inspiring them with lawlessness godlessness and acts of recklessness issuing from ignorance the seed from which all evils for all mankind take root and grow and will in future bear the bitterest harvest for those who brought them into being This ignorance it was which in that second venture wrecked and ruined everything

[c] And now for good luck s sake let us on this third venture abstain from words of ill omen But, nevertheless I advise you his friends to imitate in Dion his love for his country and his temperate habits of daily life and to try with better auspices to carry out his wishes—what these were you have heard from me in plain words And whoever among you can*not live* the simple Dorian life according to the customs of your forefathers [d] but follows the manner of life of Dion s murderers and of the Sicilians do not invite this man to join you or expect him to do any loyal or salutary act but invite all others to the work of resettling all the States of Sicily and establishing equality under the laws summoning them from Sicily itself and from the whole Peloponnese—and have no fear even of Athens for there, also are men who excel all mankind in their devotion to virtue and in hatred of the reckless acts of those who shed the blood of friends

But if after all this is work for a future time, whereas immediate action is called for by the disorders of all sorts and [e] kinds which arise every day from your state of civil strife, every man to whom Providence has given even a moderate share of right intelligence ought to temper but a mere surface colouring of opinions penetrating like sunburn only skin deep when they see how great the range of studies is, [e] how much labour is involved in it and how necessary to the pursuit it is to have an orderly regulation of the daily life, come to the conclusion that the thing is difficult and impossible for them, [341a] and are actually incapable of carrying out the course of study while some of them persuade themselves that they have sufficiently studied the whole matter and have no need of any further effort This is the sure test and is the safest one to apply to those who live in luxury and are incapable of continuous effort it ensures that such a man shall not throw the blame upon his teacher but on himself, because he cannot bring to the pursuit all the qualities necessary to it Thus it came about that I said to Dionysios what I did say on that occasion.

I did not, however give a complete exposition, nor did Dionysios ask for one [b] For he professed to know many and those the most important, points and to have a sufficient hold of them through instruction given by others I hear also that he has since written about what he heard from me, composing what professes to be his own handbook, very different so he says, from the doctrines which he heard from me but of its contents I know nothing I know indeed that others have written on the same subjects but who they are, is more than they know themselves Thus much, at least, I can say about all writers, [c] past or future, who say they know the things to which I devote myself whether by hearing the teaching of me or of others, or by their own discoveries—that according to my view it is not possible for them to have any real skill in the matter There neither is nor ever will be a treatise of mine on the subject. For it does not admit of exposition like other branches of knowledge but after much converse about the matter itself and a life lived together suddenly a light, as it were is kindled in one soul by a flame that leaps to it from another [d] and thereafter sustains itself Yet this much I know—that if the things were written or put into words it would be done best by me, and that, if they were written badly I should be the person most pained Again if they had appeared to me to admit adequately of writing and exposition, what task in life could I have performed nobler than this to write what is of great service to mankind and to bring the nature of things into the light for all [e] to see? But I do not think it a good thing for men that there should be a disquisition as it is called on this topic—except for some few who are able with a little teaching to find it out for themselves As for the rest, it would fill some of them quite illogically with a mistaken feeling of contempt and others with lofty and vain glorious expectations as though they had learnt some thing high and mighty

[342a] On this point I intend to speak a little more at length for perhaps, when I have done so things will be clearer with regard to my present subject. There is an argument which holds good against the man who ventures to put anything whatever into writing on questions of this nature it has often before been stated by me, and it seems suitable to the present occasion

For everything that exists there are three instruments by which the knowledge of it is necessarily imparted fourth there is the knowledge itself [b] and as fifth we must count the thing itself which is known and truly exists The first is the name the second the definition the third the image and the fourth the knowledge If you wish to learn what I mean, take these in the case of one instance and so understand them in the case of all A circle is a thing spoken of and its name is that very word which we have just uttered The second thing belonging to it is its definition made up of names and verbal forms For that which has the name round annular or circle, might be de*fined as that which has the distance from its cir*cumference to its centre everywhere equal [c] Third, comes that which is drawn and rubbed out again, or turned on a lathe and broken up —none of which things can happen to the circle itself—to which the other things mentioned have reference for it is something of a different order from them Fourth comes knowledge intelligence and right opinion about these things Under this one head we must group everything which has its existence, not in words nor in bodily shapes but in souls—from which it is clear that it is something different from the nature of the circle itself and from the three things mentioned before [d] Of these things intelligence comes closest in kinship and likeness to the fifth and the others are farther distant.

The same applies to straight as well as to circular form to colours to the good the beautiful the just, to all bodies whether manufactured or coming into being in the course of nature, to fire water and all such things, to every living being, to character in souls, and to all things done and suffered For in the case of all these real reasons why he had learnt nothing during my previous visit have just been set forth in the preceding narrative Accordingly now that I was safe at home and had refused his second invitation as I just now related Dionysios seems to have felt all manner of anxiety lest certain people should suppose that I was unwilling to visit him again [339a] because I had formed a poor opinion of his natural gifts and character and because knowing as I did his manner of life I disapproved of it

It is right for me to speak the truth and make no complaint if anyone after hearing the facts forms a poor opinion of my philosophy and thinks that the tyrant was in the right Dionysios now invited me for the third time sending a trireme to ensure me comfort on the voyage he sent also Archedemo —one of those who had spent some time with Archytes [b] and of whom he supposed that I had a higher opinion than of any of the Sicilian Greeks—and with him other men of repute in Sicily These all brought the same report that Dionysios had made remarkable progress in philosophy He also sent a very long letter knowing as he did my relations with Dion and Dion s eagerness also that I should take ship and go to Syracuse. The letter was framed in its opening sentences to meet all these conditions and the tenor of it was as follows [c] Dionysios to Plato here followed the customary greeting and immediately after it he said If in compliance with our request you come now in the first place Dion s affairs will be dealt with in whatever way you yourself desire I know that you will desire what is reasonable and I shall consent to it But if not none of Dion s affairs will have results in accordance with your wishes with regard either to Dion himself or to other matters This he said in these words [d] the rest it would be tedious and inopportune to quote Other letters arrived from Archytes and the Tarentines praising the philosophical studies of Dionysios and saying that, if I did not now come I should cause a complete rupture in their friendship with Dionysios which had been brought about by me and was of no small importance to their political interests

When this invitation came to me at that time in such terms and those who had come from Sicily and Italy were trying to drag me thither while my friends at Athens were literally pushing me out with their urgent entreaties [e] it was the same old tale—that I must not betray Dion and my Tarentine friends and supporters Also I myself had a lurking feeling that there was nothing surprising in the fact that a young man quick to learn hearing talk of the great truths of philosophy should feel a craving for the higher life I thought therefore that I must put the matter definitely to the test to see whether his desire was genuine or the reverse, and on no account leave such an impulse unaided nor make myself responsible for such a deep and real disgrace, [340a] if the reports brought by anyone were really true. So blindfolding myself with this reflection I set out, with many fears and with no very favourable anticipations, as was natural enough However I went, and my action on this occasion at any rate was really a case of the third to the Preserver" for I had the good fortune to return safely and for this I must, next to the God thank Dionysios because, though many wished to make an end of me, he prevented them and paid some proper respect to my situation

[b] On my arrival I thought that first I must put to the test the question whether Dionysios had really been kindled with the fire of philosophy or whether all the reports which had come to Athens were empty rumours Now there is a way of putting such things to the test which is not to be despised and is well suited to monarchs especially to those who have got their heads full of erroneous teaching which immediately on my arrival I found to be very much the case with Dionysios One should show such men what philosophy is in all its extent what the range of studies is by which it is approached [c] and how much labour it involves. For the man who has heard this, if he has the true philosophic spirit and that godlike temperament which makes him akin to philosophy and worthy of it thinks that he has been told of a marvellous road lying before him that he must forthwith press on with all his strength and that life is not worth living if he does anything else After this he uses to the full his own powers and those of his guide in the path, and relaxes not his efforts till he has either reached the end of the whole course of study or gained such power that he is not incapable of directing his steps without the aid of a guide [d] This is the spirit and these are the thoughts by which such a man guides his life carrying out his work whatever his occupation may be but throughout it all ever cleaving to philosophy and to such rules of diet in his daily life as will give him inward sobriety and therewith quickness in learning a good memory and reasoning power the kind of life which is opposed to this he consistently hates Those who have not the true philosophic gression will know well that, if Dionysios or anyone else, great or small, has written a treatise on the highest matters and the first principles of things, he has, so I say, neither heard nor learnt any sound teaching about the subject of his treatise; otherwise, he would have had the same reverence for it, which I have, and would have shrunk from putting it forth into a world of discord and uncomeliness. For he wrote it, not as an aid to memory—since there is no risk of forgetting it, [e] if a man's soul has once laid hold of it; for it is expressed in the shortest of statements—but if he wrote it at all, it was from a mean craving for honour, either putting it forth as his own invention, or to figure as a man possessed of culture, of which he was not worthy if his heart was set on the credit of possessing it. [345a] If then Dionysios gained this culture from the one lesson which he had from me, we may perhaps grant him the possession of it, though how he acquired it—God wot, as the Theban says, for I gave him the teaching, which I have described, on that one occasion and never again.

The next point which requires to be made clear to anyone who wishes to discover how things really happened, is the reason why it came about that I did not continue my teaching in a second and third lesson and yet oftener. Does Dionysios, after a single lesson, [b] believe himself to know the matter, and has he an adequate knowledge of it, either as having discovered it for himself or learnt it before from others, or does he believe my teaching to be worthless, or, thirdly, to be beyond his range and too great for him, and himself to be really unable to live as one who gives his mind to wisdom and virtue? For if he thinks it worthless, he will have to contend with many who say the opposite, and who would be held in far higher repute as judges than Dionysios. If, on the other hand, he thinks he has discovered or learnt the things and that they are worth having as part of a liberal education, how could he, unless he is an extraordinary person, [c] have so recklessly dishonoured the master who has led the way in these subjects? How he dishonoured him, I will now state.

Up to this time he had allowed Dion to remain in possession of his property and to receive the income from it. But not long after the foregoing events, as if he had entirely forgotten his letter to that effect, he no longer allowed Dion's trustees to send him remittances to the Peloponnese, on the pretence that the owner of the property was not Dion but Dion's son, his own nephew, [d] of whom he himself was legally the trustee. These were the actual facts which occurred up to the point which we have reached. They had opened my eyes as to the value of Dionysios' desire for philosophy, and I had every right to complain, whether I wished to do so or not. Now by this time it was summer and the season for sea voyages; therefore I decided that I must not be vexed with Dionysios rather than with myself and those who had forced me to come for the third time into the [e] strait of Scylla, that once again I might

To fell Charybdis measure back my course, but must tell Dionysios that it was impossible for me to remain after this outrage had been put upon Dion. He tried to soothe me and begged me to remain, not thinking it desirable for himself that I should arrive post haste in person as the bearer of such tidings. When his entreaties produced no effect, he promised that he himself would provide me with transport. [346a] For my intention was to embark on one of the trading ships and sail away, being indignant and thinking it my duty to face all dangers, in case I was prevented from going—since plainly and obviously I was doing no wrong, but was the party wronged.

Seeing me not at all inclined to stay, he devised the following scheme to make me stay during that sailing season. On the next day he came to me and made a plausible proposal: "Let us put an end," [b] he said, "to these constant quarrels between you and me about Dion and his affairs. For your sake I will do this for Dion. I require him to take his own property and reside in the Peloponnese, not as an exile, but on the understanding that it is open for him to migrate here, when this step has the joint approval of himself, me, and you his friends; and this shall be open to him on the understanding that he does not plot against me. You and your friends and Dion's friends here must be sureties for him in this, and he must give you security. Let the funds which he receives be deposited in the Peloponnese and at [c] Athens, with persons approved by you, and let Dion enjoy the income from them but have no power to take them out of deposit without the approval of you and your friends. For I have no great confidence in him, that, if he has this property at his disposal, he will act justly towards me, for it will be no small amount; but I have more confidence in you and your friends. See if this satisfies you, and no one [e] if he has not some how or other got hold of the four things first mentioned, can ever be completely a partaker of knowledge of the fifth Further, on account of the weakness of language these (i e the four) attempt to show what each thing is like, [343a] not less than what each thing is For this reason no man of intelligence will venture to express his philosophical views in language especially not in language that is unchangeable which is true of that which is set down in written characters

Again you must learn the point which comes next Every circle of those which are by the act of man drawn or even turned on a lathe is full of that which is opposite to the fifth thing For everywhere it has contact with the straight. But the circle itself, we say has nothing in it either smaller or greater of that which is its opposite We say also that the name is not a thing of permanence for any of them [b] and that nothing prevents the things now called round from being called straight and the straight things round so for those who make changes and call things by opposite names nothing will be less permanent (than a name) Again with regard to the definition if it is made up of names and verbal forms the same remark holds that there is no sufficiently durable permanence in it And there is no end to the instances of the ambiguity from which each of the four suffers but the greatest of them is that which we mentioned a little earlier that whereas there are two things that which has real being [c] and that which is only a quality when the soul is seeking to know not the quality but the essence each of the four presenting to the soul by word and in act that which it is not seeking (i e the quality) a thing open to refutation by the senses being merely the thing presented to the soul in each particular case whether by statement or the act of showing fills one may say every man with puzzlement and perplexity

Now in subjects in which by reason of our defective education, we have not been accustomed even to search for the truth but are satisfied with whatever images are presented to us we are not held up to ridicule by one another the questioned by questioners [d] who can pull to pieces and criticise the four things But in subjects where we try to compel a man to give a clear answer about the fifth, any one of those who are capable of overthrowing an antagonist gets the better of us and makes the man who gives an exposition in speech or writing or in replies to questions appear to most of his hearers to know nothing of the things on which he is attempting to write or speak for they are sometimes not aware that it is not the mind of the writer or speaker which is proved to be at fault but the defective nature of each of the four instruments The process however of dealing with all of these, [e] as the mind moves up and down to each in turn does after much effort give birth in a well-constituted mind to knowledge of that which is well constituted But if a man is ill-constituted by nature (as the state of the soul is naturally in the majority both in its capacity for learning and in what is called moral character)—or it may have become so by deterioration—not even Lynceus could endow such men with the power [344a] of sight

In one word the man who has no natural kinship with this matter cannot be made akin to it by quickness of learning or memory for it cannot be engendered at all in natures which are foreign to it Therefore, if men are not by nature and kinship allied to justice and all other things that are honourable though they may be good at learning and remembering other knowledge of various kinds—or if they have the kinship but are slow learners and have no memory —none of all these will ever learn to the full the truth about virtue and vice [b] For both must be learnt together and together also must be learnt by complete and long continued study as I said at the beginning the true and the false about all that has real being After much effort as names definitions sights and other data of sense are brought into contact and friction one with another in the course of scrutiny and kindly testing by men who proceed by question and answer without ill will, with a sudden flash there shines forth understanding about every problem and an intelligence whose efforts reach the furthest limits of human powers [c] Therefore every man of worth when dealing with matters of worth will be far from exposing them to ill feeling and misunderstanding among men by committing them to writing In one word then it may be known from this that if one sees written treatises composed by anyone either the laws of a lawgiver or in any other form whatever these are not for that man the things of most worth if he is a man of worth but that his treasures are laid up in the fairest spot that he possesses But if these things were worked at by him as things of real worth [d] and committed to writing then surely not gods but men have themselves bereft him of his wits

Anyone who has followed this discourse and

Plato he said I am trying to convince our friend Dionysios that, if I am able to bring Heracleides before us to defend himself on the charges which have been made against him, and if he decides that Heracleides must no longer live in Sicily he should be allowed (this is my point) to take his son and wife and sail to the Peloponnese and reside there, [d] taking no action there against Dionysios and enjoying the income of his property I have already sent for him and will send for him again and if he comes in obedience either to my former message or to this one—well and good. But I beg and entreat Dionysios that, if anyone finds Heracleides either in the country or here, no harm shall come to him, [e] but that he may retire from the country till Dionysios comes to some other decision Do you agree to this? he added addressing Dionysios I agree," he replied, that even if he is found at your house, no harm shall be done to him beyond what has now been said

On the following day Eurybios and Theodotes came to me in the evening both greatly disturbed. Theodotes said, Plato you were present yesterday during the promises made by Dionysios to me and to you about Heracleides?" Certainly I replied Well," he continued, at this moment peltasts are scouring the country seeking to arrest Heracleides and he must be somewhere in this neighbourhood. [349a] For Heaven s sake come with us to Dionysios." So we went and stood in the presence of Dionysios and those two stood shedding silent tears, while I said 'These men are afraid that you may take strong measures with regard to Heracleides contrary to what was agreed yesterday For it seems that he has returned and has been seen somewhere about here." On hearing this he blazed up and turned all colours as a man would in a rage. [b] Theodotes, falling before him in tears, took his hand and entreated him to do nothing of the sort. But I broke in and tried to encourage him, saying Be of good cheer Theodotes Dionysios will not have the heart to take any fresh step contrary to his promises of yesterday Fixing his eye on me, and assuming his most autocratic air he said, "To you I promised nothing small or great." "By the gods, I said you did promise that forbearance for which our friend here now appeals. With these words I turned away and went out. After this he continued the hunt for Heracleides, [c] and Theodotes, sending messages, urged Heracleides to take flight. Dionysios sent out Teisias and some peltasts with orders to pursue him. But Heracleides, as it was said was just in time by a small fraction of a day in making his escape into Carthaginian territory

After this Dionysios thought that his long cherished scheme not to restore Dion s property would give him a plausible excuse for hostility towards me and first of all he sent me out of the acropolis, [d] finding a pretext that the women were obliged to hold a sacrificial service for ten days in the garden in which I had my lodging He therefore ordered me to stay outside in the house of Archedemos during this period While I was there, Theodotes sent for me and made a great outpouring of indignation at these occurrences throwing the blame on Dionysios. Hearing that I had been to see Theodotes he regarded this as another excuse, [e] sister to the previous one, for quarrelling with me Sending a messenger he enquired if I had really been conferring with Theodotes on his invitation Certainly I replied Well continued the messenger he ordered me to tell you that you are not acting at all well in preferring always Dion and Dion s friends to him And he did not send for me to return to his house, as though it were now clear that Theodotes and Heracleides were my friends, and he my enemy He also thought that I had no kind feelings towards him because the property of Dion was now entirely done for [350a] After this I resided outside the acropolis among the mercenaries Various people then came to me, among them those of the ships crews who came from Athens my own fellow citizens, and reported that I was evil spoken of among the peltasts, and that some of them were threatening to make an end of me if they could get hold of me. Accordingly I devised the following plan for my safety

I sent to Archytes and my other friends in Taras, telling them the plight I was in Finding some excuse for an embassy from their city [b] they sent a thirty-oared galley with Lamiscos, one of themselves who came and entreated Dionysios about me, saying that I wanted to go and that he should on no account stand in my way He consented and allowed me to go giving me money for the journey But for Dion s property I made no further request, nor was any of it restored

I made my way to the Peloponnese to Olympia where I found Dion a spectator at the Games, and told him what had occurred Calling Zeus to be his witness he at once urged me with my relatives and friends to make prepara on these conditions remain for the present year [d] and at the next season you shall depart taking the property with you I am quite sure that Dion will be grateful to you if you accomplish so much on his behalf

When I heard this proposal I was vexed but after reflection said I would let him know my view of it on the following day We agreed to that effect for the moment and afterwards when I was by myself I pondered the matter in much distress The first reflection that came up leading the way in my self-communing was this [e] Come suppose that Dionysios intends to do none of the things which he has mentioned but that, after my departure he writes a plausible letter to Dion, and orders several of his creatures to write to the same effect telling him of the proposal which he has now made to me, making out that he was willing to do what he proposed [347a] but that I refused and completely neglected Dion s interests Further suppose that he is not willing to allow my departure and without giving personal orders to any of the merchants makes it clear as he easily can to all that he does not wish me to sail will anyone consent to take me as a passenger when I leave the house of Dionysios?

For in addition to my other troubles I was lodging at that time in the garden which surrounds his house from which even the gatekeeper would have refused to let me go unless an order had been sent to him from Dionysios Suppose however that I wait for the year I shall be able to write word of these things to Dion stating the position in which I am and the steps which I am trying to take And if Dionysios does any of the things which he says, [b] I shall have accomplished something that is not altogether to be sneered at for Dion s property is at a fair estimate perhaps not less than a hundred talents If however the prospect which I see looming in the future takes the course which may reasonably be expected I know not what I shall do with myself Still it is perhaps necessary to go on working for a year, and to attempt to prove by actual fact the machinations of Dionysios

Having come to this decision on the following day I said to Dionysios [c] I have decided to remain But I continued I must ask that you will not regard me as empowered to act for Dion but will along with me write a letter to him stating what has now been decided and enquire whether this course satisfies him If it does not and if he has other wishes and demands, he must write particulars of them as soon as possible, and you must not as yet take any hasty step with regard to his interests

This was what was said and this was the agreement which was made almost in these words Well after this the trading ships took their departure, and it was no longer possible for me to take mine [d] when Dionysios if you please, addressed me with the remark that half the property must be regarded as belonging to Dion and half to his son Therefore, he said he would sell it, and when it was sold would give half to me to take away and would leave half on the spot for the son This course, he said was the most just This proposal was a blow to me and I thought it absurd to argue any longer with him however I said that we must wait for Dion s letter and then once more write to tell him of this new proposal [e] His next step was the brilliant one of selling the whole of Dion s property using his own discretion with regard to the manner and terms of the sale and the selection of the purchasers He spoke not a word to me about the matter from beginning to end and I followed his example and never talked to him again about Dion s affairs for I did not think that I could do any good by doing so This is the history so far of my efforts to come to the rescue of philosophy and of my friends

[348a] After this Dionysios and I went on with our daily life I with my eyes turned abroad like a bird yearning to fly from its perch and he always devising some new way of scaring me back and of keeping a tight hold on Dion s property However we gave out to all Sicily that we were friends Dionysios now deserting the policy of his father attempted to lower the pay of the older members of his body guard. The soldiers were furious and assembling in great numbers declared that they would not submit [b] He attempted to use force to them shutting the gates of the acropolis but they charged straight for the walls yelling out an unintelligible and ferocious war cry Dionysios took fright and conceded all their demands and more to the peltasts then assembled

A rumour soon spread that Heracleides had been the cause of all the trouble Hearing this, Heracleides kept out of the way Dionysios was trying to get hold of him [c] and being unable to do so sent for Theodotes to come to him in his garden It happened that I was walking in the garden at the same time. I neither know nor did I hear the rest of what passed between them, but what Theodotes said to Dionysios in my presence I know and remember

tions for taking vengeance [c] on Dionysios—our ground for action being the breach of faith to a guest—so he put it and regarded it while his own was his unjust expulsion and banishment Hearing this, I told him that he might call my friends to his aid, if they wished to go But for myself I continued you and others in a way forced me to be the sharer of Dionysios table and hearth and his associate in the acts of religion He probably believed the current slanders, that I was plotting with you against him and his despotic rule yet feelings of scruple prevailed with him [d] and he spared my life Again I am hardly of the age for being comrade in arms to anyone also I stand as a neutral between you if ever you desire friendship and wish to benefit one another so long as you aim at injuring one another call others to your aid This I said because I was disgusted with my misguided journeyings to Sicily and my ill fortune there But they disobeyed me and would not listen to my attempts at reconciliation and so brought on their own heads all the evils which have since taken place [e] For if Dionysios had restored to Dion his property or been reconciled with him on any terms none of these things would have happened so far as human foresight can foretell Dion would have easily been kept in check by my wishes and influence But now rushing upon one another they have caused universal disaster

[351a] Dion s aspiration however was the same that I should say my own or that of any other right minded man ought to be With regard to his own power his friends and his country the ideal of such a man would be to win the greatest power and honour by rendering the greatest services And this end is not attained if a man gets riches for himself his supporters and his country, by forming plots and getting together conspirators being all the while a poor creature not master of himself overcome by the cowardice which fears to fight against pleasures [b] nor is it attained if he goes on to kill the men of substance, whom he speaks of as the enemy and to plunder their possessions and invites his confederates and supporters to do the same, with the object that no one shall say that it is his fault if he complains of being poor The same is true if anyone renders services of this kind to the State and receives honours from her for distributing by decrees the property of the few among the many—or if being in charge of the affairs of a great State which rules over many small ones [c] he unjustly appropriates to his own State the possessions of the small ones For neither a Dion nor any other man will, with his eyes open make his way by steps like these to a power which will be fraught with destruction to himself and his descendants for all time but he will advance towards constitutional government and the framing of the just est and best laws reaching these ends without executions and murders even on the smallest scale

This course Dion actually followed thinking it preferable to suffer iniquitous deeds rather than to do them but while taking precautions against them he nevertheless when he had reached the climax of victory over his enemies [d] took a false step and fell a catastrophe not at all surprising For a man of piety temperance and wisdom when dealing with the impious would not be entirely blind to the character of such men but it would perhaps not be surprising if he suffered the catastrophe that might befall a good ship s captain who would not be entirely unaware of the approach of a storm, but might be unaware of its extraordinary and startling violence and might therefore be overwhelmed by its force The same thing caused Dion s downfall For he was not unaware that his assailants were thoroughly bad men but he was unaware how high a pitch of infatuation and of general wickedness and greed they had reached [e] This was the cause of his downfall which has involved Sicily in countless sorrows

[352a] As to the steps which should be taken after the events which I have now related my advice has been given pretty fully and may be regarded as finished and if you ask my reasons for recounting the story of my second journey to Sicily it seemed to me essential that an account of it must be given because of the strange and paradoxical character of the incidents If in this present account of them they appear to anyone more intelligible and seem to anyone to show sufficient grounds in view of the circumstances the present statement is adequate and not too lengthy
